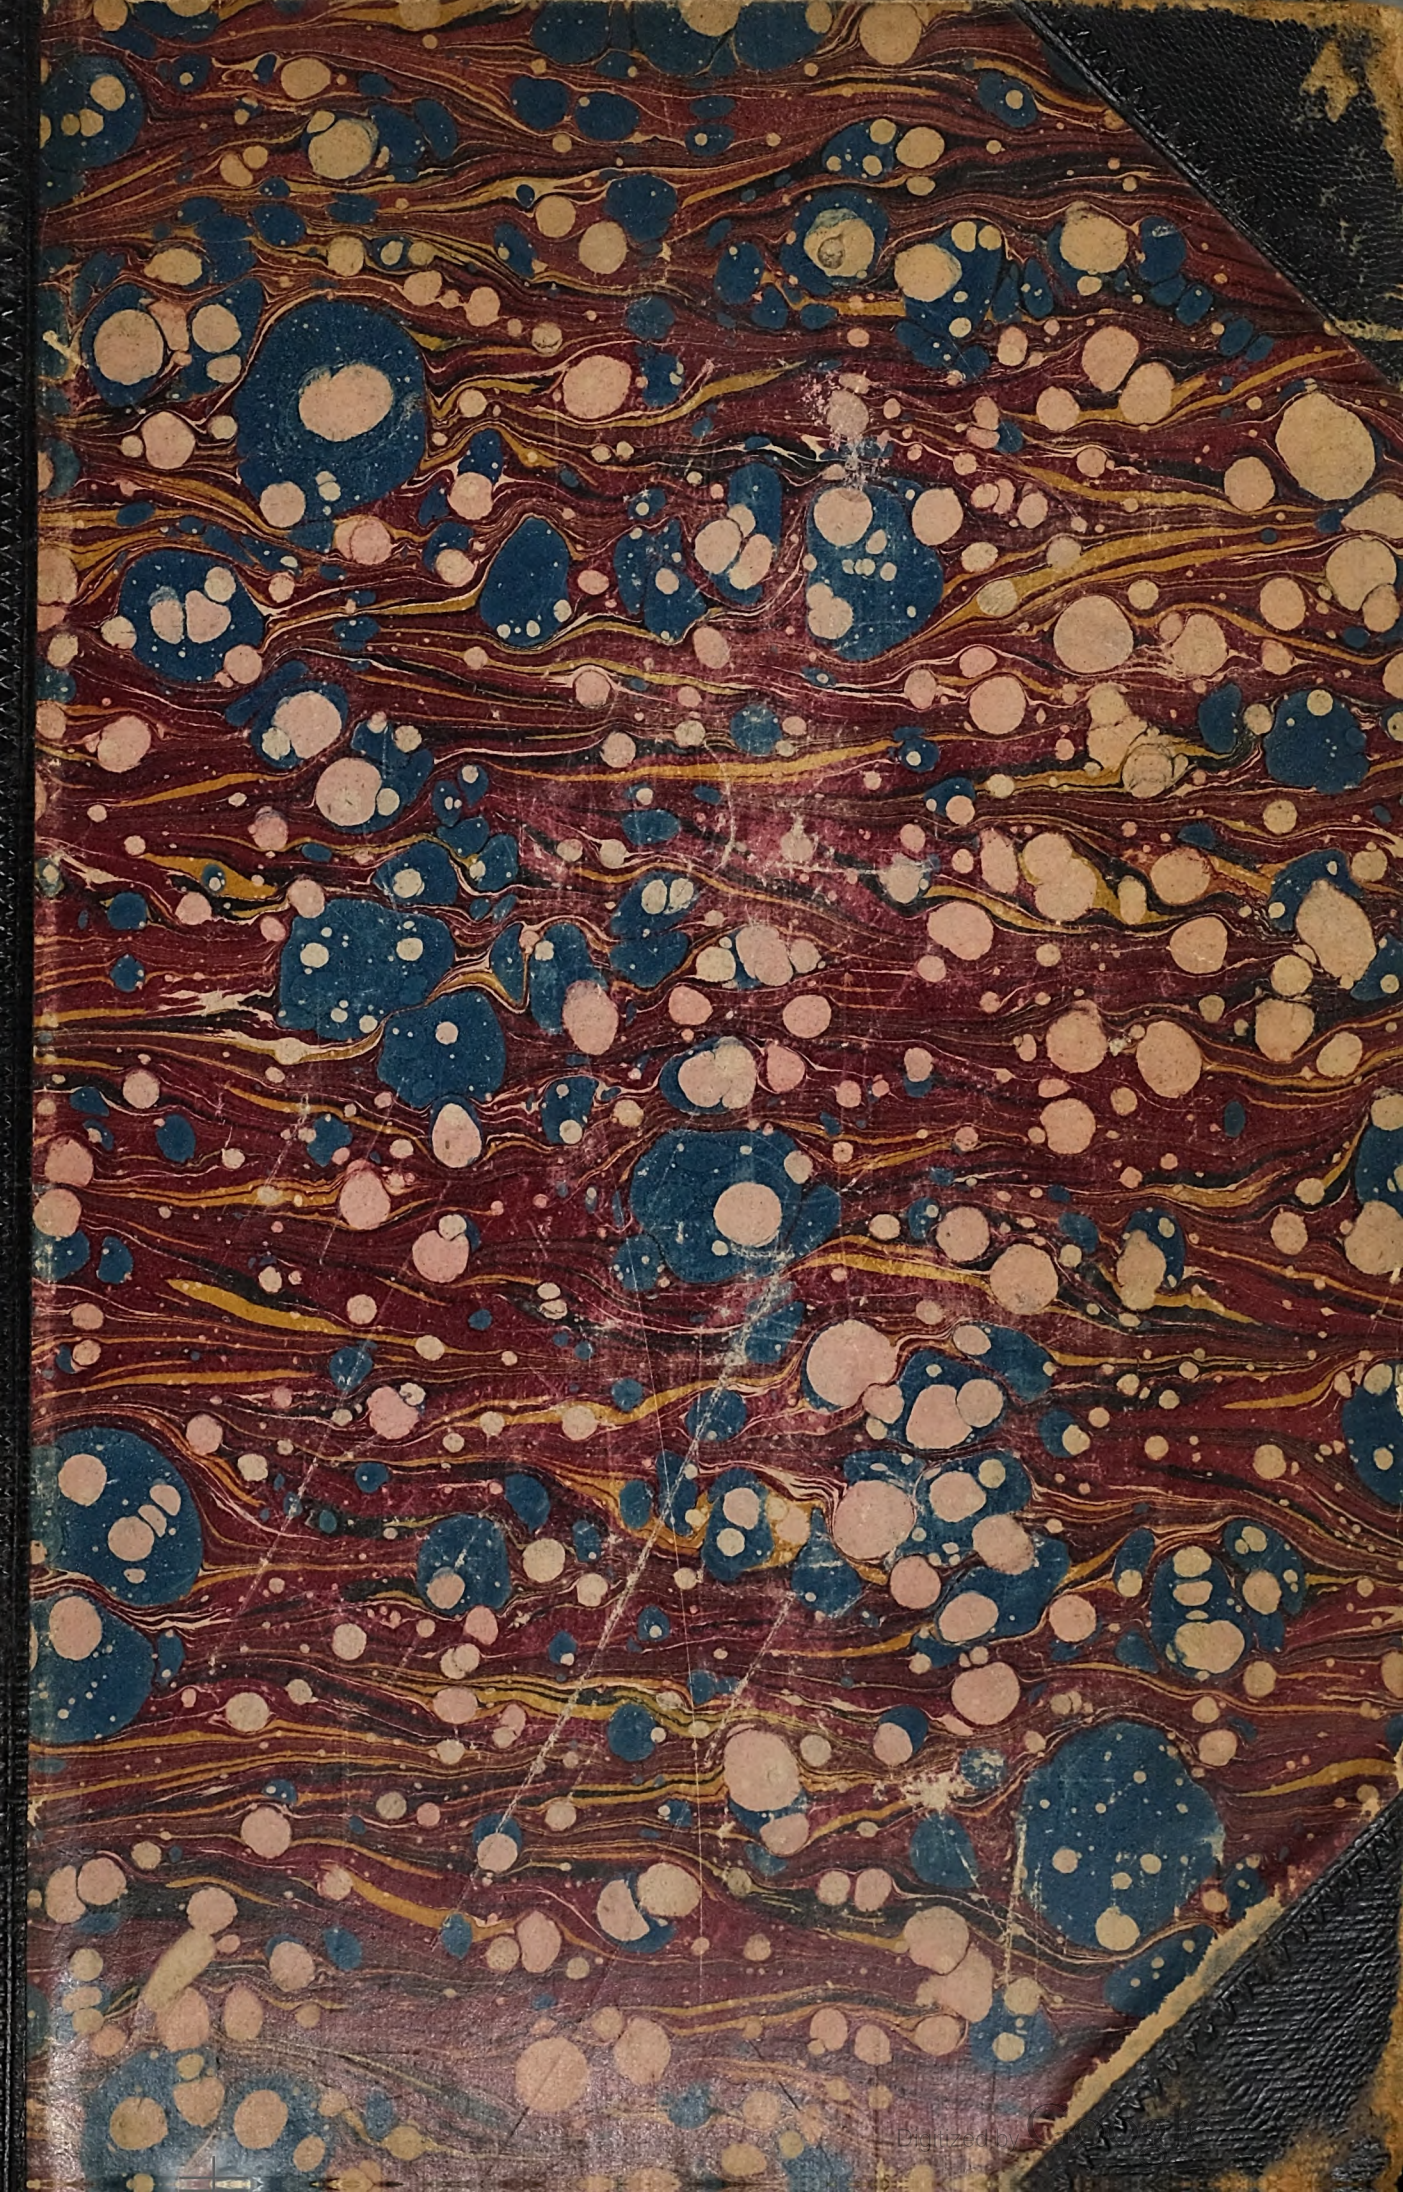
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Per. 256 d. 768

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 287.—Vol. X. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 30, 1894. [Price One Penny.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS.

4/- EACH. LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. 4/- EACH.

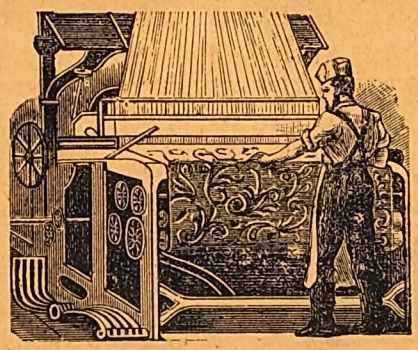
THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 stamps, we will forward direct from our looms to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.



GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says: "unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our Customers:

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.

M. Lock writes:—"I received the Carpets, Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.

Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. Hargreaves.

Established 1872. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY,

31. OLD STREET. ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

All communications respecting Advertisements for "Short Stories" should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

NO MORE DANGER FROM DROWNING

Either from Accident, Inability to swim, or from Cramp, when wearing the

"MINNOW" LIFE BELT

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN, and CHILDREN.

This invention is of the utmost simplicity, being a belt which can be inflated in less than a minute, and it is so constructed that in the event of accidents, the wearer is turned into a floating position, with face well out of the water. The objection to most of the appliances at present in the market is their bulkiness and difficulty in immediately insuring aid; this has been carefully considered, and, without incommoding a swimmer, combines at the same time the maximum of security with a minimum of difficulty. The belt can be carried conveniently in the pocket, ready for immediate wear; it weighs from eight ounces, according to size, is made of the best and strongest materials, will bear a pressure of 200 to 300 lbs., and withstand any climate. To those visiting the seaside it will be found most valuable; parents can with perfect confidence allow their children to bathe without fear of danger. It will also prove invaluable to anyone yachting or boating, also to those learning to swim; and to passengers making ocean voyages this safeguard is an absolute necessity. The value of the invention is attested by its large sale, the very flattering testimonials received by the patentee from all parts of the world, and the Belts being used not only on some of H.M. ships, and by coast-guardsmen, but also by yachtsmen, and others connected with the sea. Worn as an ordinary belt. State size of waist. Price 7s. 6d. for a 21-inch belt; each additional inch 3d. extra. Post-free U.K. Cash to accompany all orders. Cheques to be crossed "Bank of Liverpool."

For further particulars, apply—

W. R. HARGREAVES, Waterloo, nr. Liverpool.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

BODLEIAN P 16 MAR 1981 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 287.—Vol. X. FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 30, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A PORTRAIT.

IT is a theory of mine that one cannot paint a good portrait from mere sittings of the subject before one. The nature as well as the features of the model, must require study. One should know something of the soul as well as of the superficies. And so, as I was to paint the portrait of Mrs. Adriance, a woman of rare charm, I felt the necessity of some careful observation. Her guest for the purpose, I had, of course, the better opportunity of making it; and the hospitality, being a matter of business, hardly invested me with the sacred character of guest, or invested her with any of the shielding that should ordinarily surround one's hostess.

Mrs. Adriance was a woman of luxurious beauty, and of a toilet that was its fit setting. If I say that her husband was her slave, I have no word left to describe the condition of her servants; but in her house, which was superb, she reigned an unlimited despot, and her word, her wish, was law. She had many whims, each of which she followed till she worked it out and there was no shred of it left: now it was charity, now it was religion, now it was fashion, now it was literature, now it was art. Whatever whim she pursued borrowed for the time some of the beauty of the beautiful creature who pursued it, and seemed as admirable as she was—at least in the eyes of Mr. Adriance. In my own eyes—well, beginning as her abject servant, I had spent but a few days under her roof when I found myself thinking that, if I painted Mrs. Adriance as I saw her, the picture would be unpleasant enough to exceed the domain of art.

Nothing opens the eyes sometimes like a good prejudice. If I had not become aware of Mrs. Adriance's opposition to the marriage of her husband's niece for no other reason than that the girl was agreeable to herself, a pleasant piece of furniture in the house, and she did not choose to make a break in the way of life which she enjoyed, I might not have seen her so clearly myself. No one played Chopin as this sensitive Irene did; no one read verses with the same delicate inflections and musical voice; no one sympathised with her in all her freaks and caprices as this young girl did; no one had such taste to criticise and suggest concerning a ribbon or a ruffle, and let Irene's fingers twinkle for a moment in the lace or among the puffs and bows, and no French milliner could have done better.

It was plainly impossible for Mrs. Adriance to spare Irene. Who would see the point of the last social gossip with her? With whom should she exchange the swift glance? With whom should she talk over her friends and enemies? Life would be coming to an end soon enough, anyway; let things be as they were till sickness and age and death touch them with necessary transforming hand; why go out of the way and bring about unpleasant changes. No; let Irene stay where she was well off and made others so.

"And why did Irene wish to marry, anyway?" she would continue. "It would only be a temporary delight, and after that, weariness."

Doubtless very much in love now, in a year the enchantment would be gone and the bridal satin would be only sackcloth and ashes. No, it was as much for Irene's sake as for that of any one else that Mrs. Adriance opposed the whole affair.

And then the man was poor. It was true that was a trouble which Mrs. Adriance could remedy if she would, out of her abundant wealth; but if Irene chose to throw herself away, not a farthing would Mrs. Adriance contribute toward her doing so; she, at any rate, would not make herself responsible for helping on the sacrifice. Besides—see how selfish it was of Irene!

How singularly selfish to wish to leave this home where she was so acceptable, so agreeable, actually so necessary, where an aunt valued her as few women did their husband's relatives, where her uncle found her of such use, where she filled all the chinks and corners, where nothing could replace her or make up for her loss—how very selfish of her to wish to go off with a young man who must needs absorb her entirely to himself! She couldn't really believe such selfishness was possible to Irene, and therefore she couldn't really believe that Irene positively wished to marry the young man. And if she didn't wish it, what was the use of talking any more about it? It was not a matter of genuine love, but a mere phase of sentimentality. And as for the rest, how could Irene expect to be happy with a man of such a nature as Gervais's?

She had really put it to Irene. What manner of man was it who was willing to take her from her home of luxury, surrounded by the beauty of a palace, waited on by liveried servants, fed on all but nectar and ambrosia, to live in narrow lodgings, to wait on herself and him too, to dine on the joint warmed over—if there was even a joint at all! He must be a person both without calculation and without heart—without calculation certainly to foresee the want and work and worry to which he should bring her—without heart, to be willing to accept such sacrifice from her. What happiness could she expect in life in so selfish a creature as that? Or, on the other hand, if he had calculation—if he thought that, by securing Irene, he was also putting himself in the way of securing a portion of her uncle's money—well, then, he was warned in time. Nothing under such circumstances would be given to Irene; the whole fortune would be applied to Charities; and this was irrevocable, and he might as well understand it now as any time! He did understand it, perfectly.

"You can't think all that your aunt has said," he asked Irene eagerly one evening, "can make any difference?"

"Oh, no," she sighed, "oh, no, none—none in—our—love."

"In what then?" he demanded, his splendid grey eyes glittering like a young eagle's. "Does happiness depend on velvet carpets and gilt chairs and Dresden china figures? Upon a course of games or sweetmeats, or the right wines? Upon Paris hats and dresses?"

"Oh, no, no," sighed Irene again. "Why do you speak so?"

"I am sorry to speak so abruptly, my darling," he said, coming to her side. "But if your happiness lies in none of these things, then our life together can be blest enough. My salary will provide a home, and its simplicity——"

"Would be dear to me!" cried Irene. "Oh, it's not that. It's none

No one played Chopin as this sensitive Irene did.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

of these things! But she has been so good to me, always so sweet and kind and anxious for my happiness, as everyone sees, and she needs me so—and I cannot find it in my heart to pain her——"

"But you can pain me!" he cried, starting to his feet hurriedly. "It amounts to this then, that you love her more than me!"

"Oh, no, no," cried Irene again, breaking down in sobs. "That is impossible! And I can't see—I don't feel—I don't know what to do!"

She, too, it was plain, shared the general worship and absorption. "She has cast her eyes upon you!" exclaimed Gervais. "The basilisk!" And so things drifted on, apparently much as before. But there are always currents underneath the tide.

My eminence as a portrait painter—not to put too fine a point on it—allowed me to work unquestioned, and at my own time. And as Mrs. Adriance knew my ideas concerning the necessity of studying the character of my sitter, she revealed herself on one occasion after this semi-confidential fashion. Thus I did not feel called upon to show her my sketches for her picture, nor the outlines of Irene that I made furtively, finding it not easy to obtain the precise transparency of tint beside which the sea-shell's pink was opaque, my pencil fascinated, too, with the exquisite droop of eye and lip where all melancholy seemed to linger.

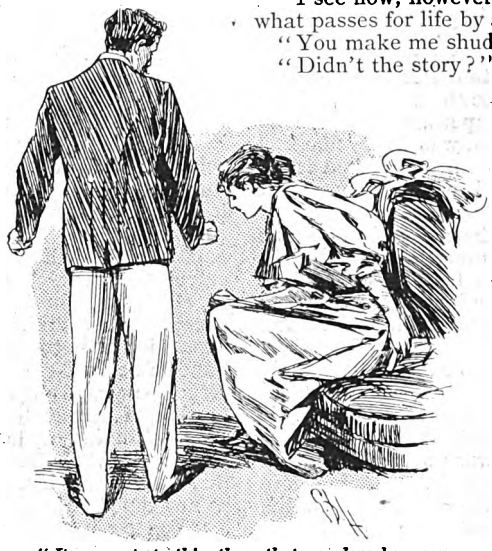
But while I was still pursuing my studies, Mrs. Adriance was evolving new opportunities for them.

"It is really out of the question," she said, "to allow things to go on in this way any longer, Irene. There is no state much worse than a prolonged engagement. One can attend to no duties properly, with all one's interest elsewhere. It keeps one in a condition of bristling electricity.

"You are absorbed and abstracted in Gervais now, and I feel it. We all feel it. One must bring the matter to an end, either by marriage or by dismissal. And in this case, Irene, I am sure your good sense will direct you as to the proper course."

"Oh!" cried Irene, all the pink flush mounting and deepening and then dying away in deadly pallor. "You can't mean——"

"Yes, assuredly," said Mrs. Adriance, calmly opening and shutting her great fan of crimson ostrich feathers. "I mean that your wisest way is to tell Gervais to cease to see you or care for you."



"It amounts to this, then, that you love her more than me!"

"As if—as if he could!" cried Irene, in a burst of passion, which was like a revelation.

"My dear! Such vehemence! I could not believe you capable of the shocking taste of it. Surely it is best that Gervais should make the effort. You, who are usually so self-forgetful—it surprises me that you should fail to see this injury you are doing Gervais by the continuance of the hopeless affair. He is simply wasting his youth and all his young manhood, and the happiness he might secure elsewhere by marrying a young woman in his own station of life."

"His own station?" cried Irene, trembling like an aspen leaf. "Is that not the same as ours?"

"Oblige me, Irene, by not repeating my words. It strikes me there is a difference between your uncle's position with his rank and influence and social weight—to say nothing of myself—and that of a penniless clerk on a salary! It might strike another so. There is a difference. If Gervais married a person accustomed to no more than he could give, he would have a chance for happiness, a reason for saving his salary, a home that would interest him and occupy him, and prevent his rushing to dissipation." One could see that every word went through Irene like a stab. "Don't make me any reply, my dear. But when you go to your room, think of it calmly, judiciously, with an eye to Gervais's best good, as I have, and I am sure you can come but to one decision. I would not see him again. I would return his letters, his trifling gifts, and put an end to the whole vexatious business at once."

As the king said, so was it done.

I was toying with my pencils a day or two afterward, when Mrs. Adriance came up, and rang presently for Irene, who brought her a book containing some fanciful arabesque designs which Mrs. Adriance wished me to see. The book was "The Thousand Nights and One Night."

Mrs. Adriance threw herself back in the depths of the wicker chair, unwinding the scarf and lace she had on her head. "Now I am your sitter, sir," she said. "And, Irene, read me something, anything, so that I shall not go to sleep. I want some vivacity in the picture!" And Irene, opening the book at random, and with a faltering voice, began reading the tale of the young prince whose beautiful wife leaves him at night, and whom he discovers to be a vampire at her horrid feast.

"What did you understand a vampire to be, before this reading?" I asked at its conclusion.

"A bat of some sort," said Mrs. Adriance hesitatingly.

"I never quite knew. I associate the idea with that of the ghoul who devours the dead."

"But it is revolting!"

"I see now, however, that it is one of the dead who obtains what passes for life by absorbing the life of the living."

"You make me shudder!" cried Mrs. Adriance.

"Didn't the story?" I replied.

"Too unreal, after all."

"It all resolves itself into the question of what it is to live and what it is to be dead. To live—is to be sentient of all other life, to feel the emotions and sensations of all other beings, to be aware through every pore and every pulse of the life of others——"

"How few live!" said Irene, looking up with her sad eyes.

"That is very pretty poetry," said Mrs. Adriance. "But poetry—and about the dead!"

"We will have no dealings with the dead," I said, "but the vampire—the ghoul—we meet her any day." And I went on with my painting.

That night, after Mrs. Adriance had gone out, radiant in her claret velvets and diamonds, Irene came softly down the stairs, her face white as the little ivory chest she carried, the shrine, no doubt, that held her love letters and her keepsakes. It was Gervais who waited for her in the alcove off the drawing-room where the lights were low. I went out for a stroll in the frosty air myself. Perhaps I did not stay long enough; for, letting myself in again in the course of the hour, I heard a broken cry, I saw a passionate embrace, and Gervais dashed headlong by me, and Irene fell fainting—to the floor if I had not caught her in season.

It was a tear-sodden face that Irene brought to the table next morning, and by her aunt she was pronounced to have a decided attack of influenza. But at dinner she could not be present at all, and for several days thereafter she failed to appear. "It is quite the best so," said Mrs. Adriance. "Once over an affair of this sort, the nerve is dead and done with. And then it is for the child's lasting good. Yet it is incomprehensible—and with such taste as hers in everything else—that yellow hair of his always looked so crude—for my own part I could never endure this Gervais very near me. And he was ineffably wearisome."

I suspended my work for some weeks at this time in order that Mrs. Adriance might accompany her husband on a journey, and I did not return to the house during that time—being occupied, I may as well say, with the care of Gervais, who was wild with grief and rage and longing and despair; his face ghastly, his health shattered, his reason unsettled, and his heart broken. "It is of no use," he cried. "There is nothing for me to do about it. She gave herself the coup de grace. She said it had been an idle fancy; she said she had never loved me; she said she wished for her freedom. She has cared nothing for me, she has trifled with me, she has played upon me, and she has driven me mad!"

Digitized by Google

Bowing myself out quickly.

I did the best I could in the way of comfort—it was nothing. If one had gone to the house and kidnapped Irene and brought her to him and laid her in his arms, it would have been nothing. She had herself put out the light. And otherwise Irene would not have come. She had understood that she was sacrificing herself, and she had sacrificed both herself and Gervais.

When I next went to the Adriances' mansion, Mrs. Adriance, lying back among the cushions of her purple velvet chair, superb in gold-coloured gauzes and great scarlet poppies, seemed to me the most magnificent thing in flesh and blood that I had ever seen. How rich was the carmine on the olive of her cheek, how sumptuous the crimson lips, how like fire in midnight, beams the lustre of those black-fringed eyes!

She laughed, a flashing laugh, of white teeth, and cried, "Now we are all right again! For you see we have Irene back!" How sweet in another's ears, how womanly, how lovingly self-forgetful might that have sounded! But in mine—I looked in a bewildered wonder at Irene on the lounge, in a clinging white gown, her hair fallen, the deathly pallor of her face enhanced by the wide violet circles about her eyes. She smiled faintly and sweetly, and murmured in a voice—not Irene's voice—but one like the sound of a leaf singing in the wind, "Yes, you see I am here—what is left of me."

"And are you still reading the story of the vampire and the maiden she devours?" I cried in my amazement.

I went, after a while, to my studio—the room which consisted of the upper floor of the house. I looked at my sketches and my canvases. I sketched a new one. I began to paint in earnest the next day, and I painted as if possessed with a sacred fury. I was up at daybreak, and I revised my work by candlelight. I ate almost nothing, saw nobody, hardly knew I lived or breathed. At the end of the week I went down to the room where Mr. and Mrs. Adriance chanced to be sitting—she with that tinge on her cheek like the scarlet on the side of a pear, and Irene, lying on the lounge, still and white as if in a trance—and I bade them to the view.

There on the canvas, with all the power of my pencil, the force of my will, the strength of my colour, had I pictured the radiant creature, supple, of abounding curve, of tints rich as the autumn leaf; but through the diaphane of her drapery those long and sinuous limbs were scarcely human, and that radiance—was it the phosphorescence of the dead or the life of the living? She hung as if suspended one moment of a swift flight, and beneath was a dream of dim moonlighted graves, and in her arms, as if snatched from one of them, or about to be cast into it—who could say?—was the lifeless form of a shrouded girl, blue-white and corpse-white, with the glazed gaze of the dead indeed. And her face was Irene's.

"It is the old story of the sacrifice of which we have read and spoken," I said, as they bent toward it in questioning wonder. "I never thought to see it made reality, as I have done in this house. You can hang it or not, as you please," I said, bowing myself out quickly, "but it is your portrait, Mrs. Adriance."

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

SUMMARY—Chapters I. to III.

The story is told by Violet (Letty) Lombard, who, at the opening, is living at Galveston, U.S.A. with her grandfather, Enos Lombard, Liz the coloured servant, Justina her old nurse, and her Aunt Marg, who has been the recipient of mysterious letters, post-marked New Orleans, necessitating a fortnight's absence from home. John Scott, who married Katherine, Violet's step-sister, a very beautiful girl, pays for Violet's board and lodging, and has just decided that she is to go to a convent in New Orleans. On the strength of information gained from the torn pieces of one of Aunt Marg's letters, and curious to solve their mystery, Violet so arranges that she goes to New Orleans a day earlier, and that she stops at the Hotel Gilbert. Through a crack in the wall, she sees what happens in the next room to hers. John Scott, Captain Dana—an old friend from Galveston—Aunt Marg, and others are sitting in judgment upon a Mexican, Antonio, who has, it transpires, assisted in the seizure of Scott's wife, and of Dana's wife and daughter, and whose terrible crime has been brought to light by Yara, a spy. Antonio is compelled to end his life by taking poison, with his dying words laying the blame upon one Xarras.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN morning dawned, cold and grey, I came to myself, half-stupefied by fear and sleep that was not rest; I struggled to my feet. I went to the mirror in miserable dread. I looked to see if my hair had not grown white. I had not changed, thank heaven, but I was so ghastly, so hollow-eyed and wan.

I rubbed my face with a coarse towel, poured water on my head, and then arranged the room, carefully put my dress in order, and, last of all, I climbed on the table once more. I dared not go down that dark hall unless I knew that terrible thing had not moved.

The faint light stealing in the tattered curtain revealed the ghastly figure, the drooping head, on the lean, outstretched arms; the wine dried on the bare floor, looking like blood. The room was orderly, there was no trace of his executioners, and he was silent for all eternity. I pushed the table into its place and softly unlocked the door. The hall was dark and foul-smelling, and the doors all stood open; down the stairs with that awful feeling of a ghostly follower creeping after; another flight where I heard in the hall the breathing of sleepers, but no sound of wakefulness; then the spiral staircase, and, thank God! the free air, the blessed air, never so dear before.

I asked a civil-spoken man the direction to the St. C——, and he went a little bit with me to show the way. What a peaceful place that great grey building seemed to me as I passed the pillared portico. How different from that dreadful place where I had been.

"Oh," I cried, "how wretched to be poor, to be shut out from security and comfort!" And then, with a shudder of disgust, I remembered I owed all I had ever known of luxury and the joys of the rich to that man I knew to be a murderer. The very money in my purse was his. My pity was for the man entrapped. Had I not heard men say a Mexican's life was nothing, that they were not men nor equals? Could I ever touch that hand of John Scott's, the hand that could crush a bone like glass? And Aunt Marg; what was she with her saintly air, her lectures to me? An accomplice with villains. I was so sick of them, no convent could be so hard to me as to see any of them again.

At the ladies' entrance to the hotel a very old man was sweeping the steps. I told him I had come by an early train, and, without questions, he took my bag and led me to a great room furnished and carpeted with cherry red, where large, gilt-framed mirrors lined the wall, reflecting at every turn a white-faced, scared-looking girl. He went to see if Miss Collier was there, and then a boy came to show me to her room.

I knocked, and she opened the door. She had not been to bed at all, and looked terribly ill and worn.

Digitized by Google

Was I dreaming, or did she come to me and kiss my hand?

"Letty!" she cried in horror.

"Yes," I said wearily. "I made a mistake in the telegram. I got here last night, and stopped near the depot, at a little place the conductor told me about. I got up early and came here. I thought you would be at the St. C——."

I lied, and I used to think after this that my whole life was a tissue of lies. It made me think of a sentence in my rhetoric, where one had to tell twenty additional lies to maintain one, but I could not tell the truth. Thank Heaven, she never questioned me.

"My dear child," she cried, and kissed my cheek, and I almost shuddered when she touched me.

"I am very tired," I sobbed. "I was so afraid last night, that I daresay I behave oddly."

"You never cared for my affection, dear, I think. But now take off your gown and lie on my bed; there, now you will rest. Shall I bathe your head with eau de cologne?"

"No, no," I almost shrieked. I would not have her touch me. She sat down by the window with a book, but I saw she was not reading. I half closed my eyes and saw her steal such wistful looks towards me, and, watching her thus, I finally fell asleep.

Was I dreaming, or did she come to me and kiss my hand, leaving it wet with her tears? Was that her crying? "Oh, my innocent girl, my dearest, that I dare not love! Would that my life had no sin; grant that yours may be without shadow. My Violet, and I was young and good like you, in my old home in San Antonio, and Mary was with me, and my father lived. Oh, the violets, the cool, green garden, the little purple cups, dew-filled and odorous, and I, like you, fair and innocent, gathered them in the early morning; and now I am so old, so wicked, so woefully weary of it all."

I listened indifferently; I thought her half mad. What did it all mean? I, a maid of the nineteenth century, had witnessed a scene of the Inquisition, and here was a woman I thought utterly frozen and clear-brained going on like a tragedy actress. I moved uneasily as though waking, and she quickly resumed her usual calm manner—the hypocrite.

"It is nine o'clock," she said, "and here is your breakfast; I have eaten mine."

Not a mouthful had she swallowed; but I ate heartily, for the past night seemed far off, now that I was safe, and I even found I had still some interest in adorning myself. I looked rather pale and hollow-eyed, though.

"You must look your prettiest," said Aunt Marg, arranging my draperies, "for Mr. Scott is waiting downstairs to meet you. He has never seen you, and I want you to make a good impression."

"I don't care what he thinks," I muttered; "I know the first word he will say is, that I am not like Katherine; his mother and his aunt sing that old tune always to me."

"He has been your best friend all your ungrateful life," said Aunt Marg coldly, her hateful self again; "and James Gregory, whom you copy in your conversation, to your great discredit, also owes the very bread he eats to Mr. Scott, the man he condemns."

"I never asked John Scott's charity," I muttered, and with the air of a martyr followed her to the parlour. Here a tall man was waiting for us, and, in the big room, he seemed to harmonise with the surroundings. I am five feet six inches tall myself, but he made me feel very small. At first I could not describe him, but it is easy now that I know him.

An olive skin, much bronzed, heavy black eyebrows and lashes, a thick moustache, and closely cropped black hair; a rather big nose and chin, and odd grey eyes that are brown sometimes or again all pupil, and have a sort of steely gleam to them. He is not handsome, but there is such power in his face that he attracts; and then, when he speaks or smiles, he seems to light up and to be so kind he makes one like him even after the Hotel Gilbert affair. But at that first meeting I thought of his cruel hands, and hated him.

"Here is Letty," said Aunt Marg, and he came to me and took my hand. I wondered if he would grip it out of shape; but he held it very gently, looking into my eyes. The moment he touched me I shuddered, and drew my hand away. It was a curious physical repulsion that I could not help. Oh, the steely look that he gave me under his thick lashes!

"So you do not like me, Letty Lombard?" he said in that pleasant voice, with a ring of laughter in it.

"I do not know you," I said haughtily.

"But Jim gave you some sort of an impression, I know, that I was a generally detestable creature of the slave-driver class?" He smiled, showing white teeth that had a cruel look to me.

"If he did, I would not tell you. I don't go back on my friends."

"You see," put in Aunt Marg, "she needs convent discipline. She has never been restricted in any way."

"I hope you will like the school," he said kindly.

"My likes are not consulted. I am sent for like a bale of cotton. I am provided for against my will; a genteel pauper," I went on hotly, all my hate surging up. "I never asked to be born, nor to have perfect relatives or angelic providers. I am ordinary, and liable to err, and I eat bread that chokes me. I go to school gladly, for I can by that earn the money to repay you, Mr John Scott, and then the everlasting nagging about my gratitude will have to be stopped."

Poor Aunt Marg coloured up, looking piteously at me, but he silenced her with that pleasant smile, and, looking vastly amused, listened to me.

"You think I cannot?" I cried. "Oh, I have been taught and dutified into a machine; but sometimes I break loose! I will show you." I ran to the big piano, and threw it open, and before Aunt Marg could prevent me, I broke into a merry little Spanish song my nurse Justina taught me. I can sing well, and I know it. "There!" I cried, as I crashed down the final chord on the keys, "I can pay you in golden notes from my throat some day, as you shall see."

He walked toward me, his eyes quite dark now and shining with tears. For a moment he could not speak.

"My wife used to sing that," he faltered, "your voice is so sweet, and it brought back the long, long years. I never could see you before; but I was foolish in that, you are not like her."

"Did I not tell you he would say that, Aunt Marg?" I cried; "everyone says that. I am sick of 'Katherine,' always 'Katherine!' I don't want to be like her. I would rather be as ugly as a tree stump, and I hate anyone who says her very name to me." Then I flung myself out of the room, and I imagined how those two would gloat over it and cackle, "Oh, she needs convent discipline!"

I expected a scolding, but never a word did Aunt Marg say

Digitized by Google

during the two days she stayed with me. She helped me to get my clothes, and saw me safe to the school, but I do not think I even kissed her good-bye. Mr. John Scott I did not see again.

Oh, those happy convent days, when I could learn all I wanted to, where all was peace and poetry, and marvellous purity of words and deeds and thoughts! There was such music in the dim, dark church, where one could dream of coming years and all that golden future which a young girl pictures. Why is it, I wonder, that the smell of incense to-day brings it all back, and those serene, black-shrouded faces with expressions of holy calm as if they had found the quiet waters, and we only the brawling stream? Is it only a veneer, not a real look, I wonder?

The girls loved me there. They thought I was so clever and pretty, that I felt how cruelly unjust Aunt Marg and grandfather had been to me to let me grow up thinking I was really only ordinary, when I was quite out of the commonplace. I used to be very naughty, and broke every rule, but some mysterious power helped me, and I kept in the good graces of everyone. The girls said I made them love me by some magnetic power.

So a year passed, and I saw no one from home until in the summer holidays Sister Patricia came to me with an open letter in her hand and a look of perplexity on her innocent face.

"Your grandfather, Violet, has written a note introducing a young friend to us, James Gregory, the son of a neighbour. He says this young man will be in the city a few days, and as his mother is with him, he wishes us to allow you to go out with them. He seems such a well-behaved young man, too," beamed that gentle soul, "that I shall be very glad to trust you with him. You need a little change and pleasure. I infer from your grandpapa's letter that he regards the young man almost as a son."

I gasped, and then grew a guilty red. My grandfather regard Jim as a son, when he never allowed him at our house, spoke of him with rage and profanity, and once took a stick to him and drove him away! My Aunt Marg hates Jim too, and I used to fancy the feud began further back than our time.

"Y-e-s," I stammered.

"His mother is at the hotel, but he is in the parlour," she said. "Go in as you are. You always look neat." She patted my shoulder kindly, and I went into the room. A solemn visaged sister was talking to Jim, and had she not been there I should have burst into a yell of laughter.

Sister Patricia came to me with an open letter.

Jim is not handsome. He has red hair, bushy and wiry, light eyes, and is very tall and thin, and so freckled that he looks mildewed. He dresses in loud attire with horsy neckties, and if anyone took him for a jockey or a gambler he would be wonderfully pleased. But to-day he had on a black suit, a white tie, and a pair of large black cotton gloves. He had soaped his hair down, wore a seedy tall hat, and carried a cheap and bulging cotton umbrella. He had a crape band on his hat also, and talked with a snuffle.

"Yes, madam," he was saying to the sister; "you can't be too particular;" and to this day I know he cannot tell what he was wanting to be so particular about.

"Ah, Violet," he said in most solemn tones, and I dutifully shook that cotton glove.

He had soaped his hair down.

"Is anybody dead?" I asked timidly, and he gave me such an awful look I knew I had made a mistake. "You look so sad," I faltered.

"I have studied so hard," he sighed; "dear Uncle Scott sent me to New York to school, and mother and I came back this way to see you, and how"—and he threw an unctuous fervour into the words—"how you have improved. Grandpa is nicely. (Grandfather would have choked with rage at that.) He and Aunt Marg sent their love to you and such thanks to your teachers." And he went on in that strain for ten minutes. If I had not got away to put on other clothes I should have laughed right out and spoiled it all.

I donned my pretty cream-coloured silk and lace gown, with a hat and parasol to match, and various ornaments borrowed from admiring friends, and then I joined him in the hall; for he had got permission to have me spend the day with his mother. Outside the convent gates he took a good look all round, then solemnly danced a double shuffle.

"How did you like the make-up, eh?" he laughed, "and grandpa's letter I wrote. I mayn't be pretty, but I'm smart. You nearly spoiled it all by asking who's dead. Where's your sense?"

"You were awfully good thinking of me in gaol here," I said gratefully.

"Scott doesn't get ahead of me," Jim said coolly; "he's home all the time now; got a new carriage and horses; put me to school, too. He's a hateful brute, but he's got his match in J. G. My brother Dean is coming home from France. He'll show him what a gentleman is; Scott's been so long lording it over Mexicans, he doesn't know how to treat a white man."

"If they find out about the forged letter?" I suggested.

Jim turned and gripped my arm. "Have you got stuck up and goody? Tell me the worst. If you have, back you go to gaol."

"No, no," I cried in bitter earnest; "but I am cowed, that's all. I do want something good to eat, and a theatre, and slang, and fun like we used to."

"No saying, 'Oh, that isn't right'; or, 'I won't go there, it isn't nice, Jamsey'; or, 'Sister wouldn't like that.'"

"If you took me out to just quarrel, I'll go home," I said crossly.

He gave me a long look. "We'll have the fun. You are all right and jolly. What a stunner you've got to be. By Jove, Letty, you are pretty, honestly pretty!"

Somehow, that was the best compliment I ever had in my life.

"I am proud to be with you," he went on, "and mother isn't here. I'm travelling for pleasure. You walk up and down here, while I get out of this morgue outfit, and if I catch you flirting, back to the pen you go."

When he was gone, I turned quickly, and went to a newspaper office. I had not seen a newspaper for a year. They were not allowed in the convent. I got the file of back numbers from a polite young man, and turned to the past September.

. . . . . .

"Yesterday, an unknown man was found dead in a room at the Hotel Gilbert. He had evidently committed suicide by poison, for a glass lay beside him, part of the contents spilled on the floor. He had died alone, and without outcry, for there were men across the hall—a party of labouring men, drunk and noisy. There was no scrap of paper on the unfortunate man to identify him. Evidently he was a Mexican, a stranger in the city. The coroner deemed an inquest unnecessary, and the body will be buried to-day. A woman's fine handkerchief, scented with violet, and marked with 'S' or 'L,' perhaps a 'J,' was found near his door, but, as the adjoining room had not been tenanted, this will not serve as a clue, but only add to the mystery of the Mexican's death, and afford a theme for a romance."

Digitized by Google

. . . . . .

If these words were not all there was in the paper, they were enough for me. That was my handkerchief. I thought of it at the police-station, with revolvers, and blood-stained knives, and the trumpery left by murdered men, those pitiful relics of starved lives. Yet my heart leaped because the man was not known, and no mention was made of my going there. Evidently the landlord had forgotten me in the excitement of the tragedy. Someone touched me as I walked along the street, and I almost screamed.

"You are getting awfully haughty," laughed Jim. "You had better drop your airs with those that know you."

"It's the bad food at school," I giggled hysterically.

"We'll eat, then," said Jim, dragging me off to a restaurant.

CHAPTER V.

AFTER a meal, where we took almost everything on the bill of fare, Jim, with many airs, engaged a victoria—a dejected sorrel horse with a limp, and a red-faced and aged driver, who looked on us with much benevolence. We jolted over the rough cobble stone pavement until I was hoarse from trying to talk above the rumble, and every bone in my body ached.

Then, in a dark and guilty way, we went to a fair, where we saw nothing but a fat woman, a fuzzy-haired girl, and a melancholy happy family of monkey, cats, and dogs; but that made me feel very free and daring all the same. Then to a matinée at the theatre. What dreams of going on the stage I had afterwards, when I, Letty Lombard, would be a great actress and make people cry. I have performed so many strange parts in my girlish dreams, but no such sad drama as my life actually held.

What a golden day that was, for we were young and merry! I had lived for a year among such sombre folk, and even now, after all my history, I clutch all the joy I can, as I do when I may roam in the garden and pick flowers at will—I want my arms full. Jim was so good that day, too, and he did not murder a man nor live in a dark mystery. "What does it matter," I used to say, "if I take a sinful joy in vain pleasures to-day, by-and-bye I will be as old as Justina and as wrinkled, and then I can repent and stay there, for I shall not be tempted."

There, standing at the door, was John Scott.

"How pretty you are," said Jim as we came out of the theatre; "your eyes are so dark and blue, and your cheeks are pink. By Jove, I wish some of the fellows could see you."

I squeezed his arm a little, with a happy giggle, for any girl knows, when a young man wishes the fellows could see her, she must be looking very well indeed. Even Jim at that moment did not seem so freckled, and I could have been bound his hair was a beautiful auburn.

"Let's eat again," he said, "before you go back to prison."

We went to a café where there was a pleasant little room off the big one, and here we ordered a delicious meal. Jim put on an air of surfeit, as if he were a finished gourmand with the expensive education of an epicure.

"Devilled crabs," he said. "H'm, they may be passable, but you get the best only in New York and at C——'s, in Washington." He patronised the waiter so severely that when the man went to the kitchen I had to say:

"You will let the poor man live, won't you, Jim?"

"Why is it," remarked Jim sadly, "that women get vinegary, get edgery. You need more of our society, miss, us men."

"We don't get it in convents," I laughed. "Oh, Jim, that won't do," I cried, as he ordered a wine card; "it looks so fast."

"One pint of champagne," he said indignantly, "the idea! Why, I know girls in New York that drink a pint at every meal."

Alas! how I envied those girls, and resolved to be as nearly like them as possible.

"To think," said Jim, leaning back in his chair, "that you and I hate John Scott, and yet here we are living well on his money, wearing good clothes, and otherwise enjoying ourselves at his expense."

"That isn't very good taste, that speech," I put in.

"You may as well admit it, Miss Vinegar."

"All right," I said, lifting my glass, "let's drink to him, to the health of Mr. John Scott."

We clicked our glasses. "To the health of——" repeated Jim; then he jumped to his feet, looking very red and confused. "Great Scott!" he ejaculated, and not till afterwards did I think how funny that was. There, standing at the door, looking at us with that hateful smile, was the man himself, John Scott. I did not rise, not I. I sat there cool and defiant. "Listeners seldom hear any good of themselves, Mr. Scott," I said icily.

"But I did," he said pleasantly; "were you not drinking my health?"

I saw him glance at the table where that guilty pint bottle, flanked by devilled crabs and charlotte russe, stood in shameless effrontery. "May I not join you?"

"Of course," I answered rudely; "your money pays for it." Jim only stood there, looking crushed.

"So I heard Jim say," continued Mr. Scott; "I came like Banquo's ghost, but don't let me spoil your banquet."

"We had done," I said, finishing my champagne. "I get so little palatable food at the convent, Mr. Gregory was kind enough to rescue me from absolute want by a meal I could eat."

"And yet you look," said Scott, with those hateful eyes, smiling, "actually and vulgarly fat."

I made no reply but a haughty stare; Jim gulped down a few mouthfuls. "Shall I order more wine?" asked Mr. Scott pleasantly.

We looked at each other in ghastly indecision. What was he going to do? "Let's make a night of it," he went on, in an airy way; "let me see—a drive about the city, the fair, the theatre—what is there for this evening?"

"I think you are a fiend, Mr. John Scott," I cried bitterly.

"And yet I am a mild and well-mannered person," he smiled, "quite acceptable at banquets in spite of my cloven foot. But joking aside, Jim, it was not right to take her to the fair, nor to this place. I don't mind the theatre, nor did I tell the nuns of the forged letter, but you must try no more artifices of the kind.

"Remember a girl's reputation is as delicate as a camelia, one touch and the fair white leaves are blackened for ever.

Digitized by Google

This place and the wine were very wrong. I pardon you because you knew no better. I am sorry to spoil your fun; I don't like the character you force me to play; but I cannot help it. Say good-bye to Letty now. I shall see that you have no chance to meet her until she is out of school."

"I don't see why you should constitute yourself her guardian," Jim muttered.

"Well, I am, nevertheless; truly, you angry children, I am sorry for you—and mean you well, though you hate me so bitterly."

He might have looked to a stranger fairly handsome, might Mr. Scott then, with that pleading look in his eyes, the half-pathetic smile on his lips.

I went to Jim to say good-bye. "We had a happy day, that he can't take away," I whispered.

"We'll outwit him yet," said Jim, almost hopefully. "Look out for letters from Aunt Martha," and with those mysterious words he departed. I slowly put on my gloves, Mr. Scott watching me all the time.

We walked along in silence. It was a balmy starlit night, odorous with flowers, and soft and warm. How happy I should have been with Jim; and what an ending to our day!

A crowd of drunken men passing us pushed me rudely, and John Scott, with a little gesture of authority, took my arm.

"Oh," I cried in my fright and anger, "don't put your dreadful hand on me." He started as if he had been stung, let me go, and we walked in silence to the convent gates; there he stopped and looked me steadily into my face.

"You are an enigma. I cannot fathom you, Violet. I am sorry you hate me. I should have liked to be your friend. Good-bye." He left me then, and I did not see him nor anyone from home for another long year.

During this time I received curious and ill-spelt letters from my Aunt Martha, and these seemed to me so seriously dull they were given to me unread by the nuns. "Dearest Violet," one ran, just before I returned home, "James Gregory's brother Dean is home from Paris. He is a very fine man, and the house is quite gay. The funeral urn (his name for John Scott) is still there in its place, awakening sad memories of the past. I look forward to your coming home. I have arranged a series of intellectual, entertaining and moral festivities to amuse you," &c. I used to think those letters the very acme of wit and humour.

"Promise me you will not see him again."

At last my schooldays were over, and on the very morning I was to go home a sour-faced and yellow-skinned woman came, introduced herself as Miss Wilson, of Galveston, and showed credentials to the effect that she was sent by Mr. Scott to escort me home, as my aunt, Miss Collier, was too ill to come. I hated Mr. Scott for a long, dreary year when I was carefully watched, and this elderly and uncomfortable person increased my dislike.

In the train I certainly looked very nice, in a new grey dress, with a bunch of red roses in my belt; and I saw a handsome and well-clothed gentleman looking at me. He finally stared so intently that I coloured and turned my face away. The dragon was reading a book of essays with one eye on me. "You had better sit here," she snapped.

"Why?" I asked innocently, opening my eyes wide. I knew she would not ride backward. Then that impudent stranger actually came to our place and lifted his hat.

"I beg your pardon," he said, addressing Miss Wilson, "but I know your face so well. Is that not Mrs. Scott's sister, Miss Violet?"

"Yes," said Miss Wilson, in refrigeratory tones, "and you, sir?"

"Dean Gregory, and I know you are the Miss Wilson my mother esteems so highly" (I saw him read her name on her book), "the teacher of philosophy at the Ladies' Home Culture Club."

How she bridled and perked up! She knew Mrs. Gregory; such culture, such a mind; and after a gush of information and polysyllables, she thought of and introduced me. I saw Colonel Gregory was of medium size, well-formed, with dark skin and black eyes. His hair and moustache were carefully trimmed, his clothing fashionable, but he wore more diamonds than a gentleman should, I thought. He had a handsomer face than his cousin, John Scott, but not such a thoroughbred air, and that remark savours of Jim; but I can only explain that John Scott was such a perfect gentleman you never noted anything about him.

But what a jolly companion Gregory was—so full of anecdote and so good humoured! He found better seats for us, and told us about the landscape; and when Miss Wilson had dropped into a doze, taught me a new game of cards that seemed simple enough until he explained that it was a wicked gambling game, called faro. Then I regret to say it had a deadly fascination for me.

"A good start for a little convent maid," he laughed.

I made some little joke about Pharaoh, and then hung my head.

"There is a strain of wildness in the Lombard blood," he said musingly; "not the old New England stock, but the new blood introduced when your grandfather married a Mexican woman. How those old Puritans must turn in their graves at Katherine, and now at you!"

Do you know, somehow, he had drawn out of me all my history save that night at the Hotel Gilbert.

"You see," he went on, "your grandfather must have been a bit livelier than the rest, to have run away. Then he married a Mexican woman who died early, otherwise he would have been killed off long ago. Your father was wild and unsettled, but in Katherine and you I see the old strain plainly."

"John Scott thinks her an angel," I said.

"You seem to care what John Scott thinks," he said lightly. "No woman is an angel; no, not one."

At Galveston, where the Scott carriage was sent for Miss Wilson and me, he squeezed my hand, and said he must see me again; that he could not forget me. My vanity was tickled, and I said some silly things, and then we were driven off.

After supper, when grandfather was busy with his roses, I sat in the porch with Aunt Marg, and somehow told her of my meeting with Dean Gregory. With a cry of horror, she turned to me and clutched my hand.

"Violet," she said, with a strange earnestness, "if you have any liking for me, any gratitude to your grandfather for your home, any goodness in you, you will avoid that man. Promise me on your honour you will not see him again, nor speak to him."

"Much as I hate mysteries, I will do as you say," I answered; "but he seemed very kind."

She looked at me pitifully. "I wish that you could give me your confidence, dear, now you are a woman. If we could only understand each other. Try to think of me as one who wishes your best interests. You have read many books, Violet, but in any book you may ever read, there is no pictured figure as black, as utterly without conscience or heart, as that man you met to-day, Colonel Dean Gregory."

(To be continued next week.)

Digitized by Google

THE POWDER MINE.

AT five o'clock in the evening of the 21st of March, 1814, the English camp before the walls of Rocq was in a state of high excitement.

The town, a stronghold of Napoleon, lay on the French coast, not far above the mouth of the Gironde. It was protected on two sides by the nature of the ground, and at the rear was open to the sea. In front stood a massive bastion, which for fourteen days had bade defiance to the artillery of the English; but the sappers had been working day and night, and at last the tunnel of their mine had reached the bastion, and had broken unexpectedly into a cellar underneath it.

This cellar, belonging to a house which stood against the wall inside the town, was entered from the house above by a flight of spiral steps; so that the miners found themselves, to their dismay, open to discovery at any moment by the inmates of the house. They were compelled to trust to speed and silence to accomplish their design without disturbance, and so far all was well.

A store of bags of powder had been conveyed into the cellar, and everything was now in readiness for the explosion, which was to blow the wall into the air and leave a breach for the storming party to rush into the town.

Inside the mine—that is, inside the cellar of which we have been speaking—half a dozen men had just put the final touches to the preparations. The feeble gleam of a dark lantern, which scarcely served to show their faces in the gloom, glimmered on a ring of bags which occupied the middle of the floor, on the black and shining grains of gunpowder which filled them to the brim, and on the snake-like loops of fuse which linked them to each other.

This fuse, at one point, ran along the floor and ended in a piece of slow-match, near the spot at which the opening of the tunnel gaped blackly in the wall, like a gigantic rat's hole.

This match, lighted by the man selected for the duty, and the last to leave the mine, would smoulder for about four minutes. Then the terrific firework would explode.

One by one, five of the sappers passed into the tunnel and disappeared. The sixth, keeping the dark lantern with him, was left to wait until the passage should be clear before he touched the match and hastened after his companions.

The soldier in question was a young officer of seven-and-twenty—Lieutenant Hilary Vane. He wore the uniform of his regiment—short scarlet coat, blue trousers, and peaked cap—and was armed with sword and pistols. Though not exceptionally tall or broad in figure, he was noted among his companions for his feats of strength, as well as for his coolness and resource in danger—traits of character apparent in his plain, strong features, and in his steel-blue, fiery eyes.

A physiognomist might, perhaps, have detected in his features a sign of his chief failing, which was too great a readiness to act on impulse, without giving his calmer judgment time to speak.

On being left alone he leaned his back against the wall and waited. A minute passed—two minutes. Then he stooped, his ear to the mouth of the tunnel and listened intently. Presently from the other end came the faint report of a pistol shot; it was the signal that the passage was clear.

He turned to the spot where the fuse rested, and with his finger on the fastening of the lantern, was on the point of drawing back the slide in order to ignite the match which he held ready in his hand, when another sound struck his ears—a sound which froze the current of his blood.

Some one was coming down the cellar stairs!

The stair, as already mentioned, formed a spiral, so that only five or six of the lowest steps were visible. The lieutenant, with his finger on the slide and his eyes fixed upon the steps, remained perfectly motionless, waiting for the intruder to appear in sight.

One thought only occupied his mind. If he were discovered he would do his duty; he would fling the lighted match into the nearest bag, and blow himself and the intruder into the air together.

Even as the thought passed through his mind, he saw the twinkle of a candle, as its bearer turned the corner of the steps and came suddenly to view. The lieutenant caught his breath, The new-comer was a girl.

She came slowly down the steps, holding the candle low to see where she was treading, her face ringed round with darkness, shining out in its full light. She was young—perhaps seventeen—and as lovely as a picture. Every detail of her figure the lieutenant saw, or rather felt, burnt in a single instant indelibly upon his brain, as he stood, like a man petrified, with his eyes upon her.

A terrible dilemma was before him. True, his duty was as plain as ever; but he could not—he could not—send this beautiful young creature to a sudden and a dreadful doom. There was only one alternative—she must escape with him. He held himself in readiness and waited, silent as a figure cut in stone.

From the ease of her demeanour as she came down the stair it was clear that she had no suspicion of what had happened in the vault. At the bottom of the steps she stopped, and, with the candle raised above her head, was about to cross the cellar to a bin which stood against the further wall, when her eyes alighted on the bags of powder in the middle of the floor.

For a moment she stood still, gazing at them. Then she raised her eyes, and they fell upon the form of Hilary Vane, standing motionless before her in the gloom.

With a stifled shriek she turned towards the steps, up which in another moment she would have vanished, when Hilary, darting past her, placed himself between her and the exit. She shrank back, staring at the sudden apparition with large eyes wide with terror. He laid his finger on his lip.

"Not a sound, or all is lost," he said rapidly and eagerly in French, "This cellar is a mine, and we are going to blow it up. But fear nothing; you are safe." He pointed with his finger to the tunnel. "Escape instantly; that way; quick, quick! your life depends upon it."

She cast a swift glance at the tunnel; but, to his surprise, she did not stir.

"Quick!" he repeated, quivering with impatience, "there is not a moment to be lost. Quick! Quick!"

So far from obeying him, however, the girl, with a sudden rush of a wild creature, endeavoured to dart past him up the steps. With a movement as rapid as her own he barred the passage.

"Listen!" he said, speaking with a sort of fierce impetuosity. "I wish to save you, but by giving an alarm you risk not only my life, but the lives of my companions, who will return to ascertain what has gone wrong, and will be taken prisoners. Before that happens, I shall throw this light into the powder there, and end us both together. Come, be reasonable. Will you go?"

"No," she said; "no, no."

"But why?" he asked, astonished.

The girl wrung her hands in agony. "I cannot," she cried wildly; "my lover is lying wounded in the house above us. If he dies, I will die with him. I have only left him for a moment—the doctor sent me down to fetch a flask of brandy. Oh, sir," she cried, flinging herself suddenly at Hilary's feet, "spare him, spare him, for the love of heaven!"

Hilary paused, in trouble and perplexity.

"It is impossible," he said; "I cannot save him if I would. I can save you only. If I do not fire the mine, my companions will return and fire it.

"But by that time the cellar will be guarded by our soldiers, and your comrades will be seized as they come in.

"Yes, as I said, they will be seized. No, I cannot—I will not—betray my own companions. I would rather, as I told you before, throw this match into the powder. And you—you must not, you shall not—sacrifice your life without avail. No; you must come with me."

He advanced a step towards her, resolved to bear her through the tunnel and to save her in his own despite, touching the fuse, as they departed. But as he moved the girl stepped back a pace and raised the candle in her hand above a bag of powder.

Digitized by Google

"Stop!" she cried. "I refuse, I tell you, to be saved alone. You have taught me what to do. If you try to take me, I will drop the candle."

Hilary drew back, petrified. The refusal of the girl doomed them both to death; yet even at that moment he experienced a relief that the act which sent her to destruction, had been taken from his hands.

But there was no method of escape; to delay—to parley—would be to risk the lives of his companions, who might return at any instant to see what was the cause of the delay. Drawing himself erect, he crossed his arms upon his chest, and, with his eyes still fixed upon the girl, said quietly:

"So be it. Drop the candle."

The girl stood motionless a moment, with her hands outstretched. A tremor shook her frame from head to foot. Then she shut her eyes, unclasped her fingers, and let the candle fall.

Had she kept her eyes unclosed, the candle would have fallen, as she intended, on the powder. As it was, it struck the margin of the bag and thence rebounded to the floor, where it was instantly extinguished, leaving the cellar in pitchy darkness.

Hilary drew back the slide of his dark lantern. By its gleam the two looked at each other. Both their faces were as white as ashes.

"Fortune is against you," said Hilary, after a silence. "You are the bravest girl I ever heard of, but you are fated to be saved, do what you will."

"Then fate must save my lover also," she replied.

"Come with me," he repeated urgently. "To refuse is madness. Quick, or it will be too late; my comrades will be coming back to see what is the matter——" He stopped abruptly, struck by an idea.

"Unless," he continued, speaking rapidly, as if reflecting—"unless I stop them. Yes—yes; it might be done. And yet! Well, yes, it will be a breach of duty, and if I were caught I should be shot for it, and, what is more, I should deserve my fate. But I must do it." He turned quickly to the girl. "Will you obey me?" he said earnestly.

She looked at him intently.

"Do you mean to save me only?"

"No. I shall try to save you both."

"Yes," she said. "I will obey."

"Then stand here, without moving till I return to you."

Drawing a clasp knife from his pocket, he approached the nearest bag, and with two swift cuts, divided the fuse which linked it to the bags on either side. Then, cutting off a piece of the slow match, and sticking it erect into the powder, he lifted up the bag with his left hand, and with the lantern in his right, he disappeared into the entrance of the tunnel.

For some seconds the girl could hear his movements growing fainter as he receded, until he seemed to be about a hundred feet along the shaft, when all sound ceased entirely for perhaps ten seconds; then he was heard hastily returning. When he emerged into the cellar he still held the candle, but the bag was gone.

"It is alight," he gasped, seizing the girl's wrist and drawing her rapidly towards the cellar steps, up which he hastened until the winding of the spiral shut them from the vault below. Then he stopped and listened eagerly.

For some seconds—perhaps half a second—all was silent. Then all at once there came the sound of an explosion; a blast of air rushed fiercely up the cellar steps; a thick smoke filled the vault. Then all was still.

"Wait," he said; "I shall return directly," and he disappeared into the cellar. Almost instantly he was by her side again.

"All is well," he said; "the explosion, as I hoped, has caused the sandy soil which roofs the tunnel to fall in. The passage is blocked, and no one can now enter. Now," he continued, "how long will it take you to remove your lover from the house?"

The girl considered. "Five minutes," she said.

"I will give you six. The doctor you will, of course, take with you. Is there anyone else in the house?"

"No."

"Anyone in the street outside?"

"Yes. The street is crowded with soldiers."

"They must take their chance. Now go. But if you give an alarm, and if I hear a step approaching, I shall fire the powder. If you follow my directions you and your lover will be saved."

The girl caught his hand in hers and pressed it to her lips.

"Heaven will reward and bless you," she said fervently. "You will never repent what you have done to-night."

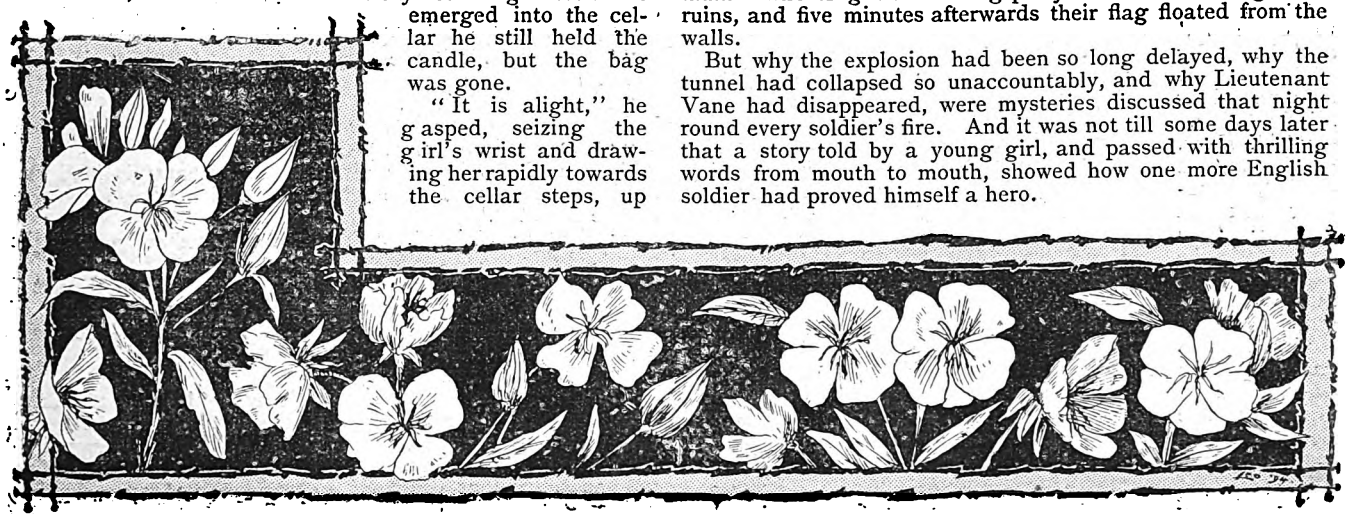
Hilary Vane looked after her as she turned away and darted up the steps, and he laughed a little bitterly. She took it for granted that he would save himself, and, at the worst, be taken prisoner. But he knew that nothing now remained for him but his duty—and to die in doing it. If, when he fired the fuse, he should dash up the cellar steps and escape into the street, the secret of the mine would be endangered. No; he had given the girl time to save her life and her lover's, but only at the sacrifice of his own.

He drew out his watch, placed it in the light, and stood motionless, with his eyes fastened on the dial, the match ready in his hand, and his ears stretched for any sound of steps upon the cellar stairs. But none came; and the girl had kept her part of the agreement. The hand crept forward on the dial. One minute passed—two—three—four—five.

A faint sound reached his ear from the tunnel of the mine; his comrades had returned as far as the spot of the explosion, and were striking at the débris with their picks. He almost smiled again as he thought of their bewilderment. Then he looked at the dial-plate; the hand touched the figure for which he had been waiting. He raised his hand which held the lighted match, and, setting his teeth hard, lowered the flame above the bag until it touched the powder.

The roar and crash of the explosion shook earth and sky for ten miles round, as the huge buildings leapt into the air in fragments, like a spadeful of gravel tossed up by a strong man. The English storming-party rushed in through the ruins, and five minutes afterwards their flag floated from the walls.

But why the explosion had been so long delayed, why the tunnel had collapsed so unaccountably, and why Lieutenant Vane had disappeared, were mysteries discussed that night round every soldier's fire. And it was not till some days later that a story told by a young girl, and passed with thrilling words from mouth to mouth, showed how one more English soldier had proved himself a hero.



Digitized by Google

SILVER JOHN.

WE were all in Painter's rooms in the Temple. It was a hot night, and the Major had been sitting by the window, and had not opened his mouth once except for a drink. Then we pulled a chair into the middle of the room and dragged him into it. "Tell us how it was you left America, sir," said Painter, holding out a cigar box. The Major chose a weed deliberately, and this is the story he told:

"The town of Starbuck had sprung up immediately after the construction of the Mockton and Ashville Railway. It had become a country seat even before a plough, drawn by a yoke of steers, had done marking out the principal streets, and the first office building, made of unplaned pine woods, bore over the narrow entrance the following information: 'Geo. W. Babroid, Attorney-at-Law.'

"The blacksmith's shop, the nucleus round which the country town usually springs, had not been built when I wrote that sign with blacking and a paint brush.

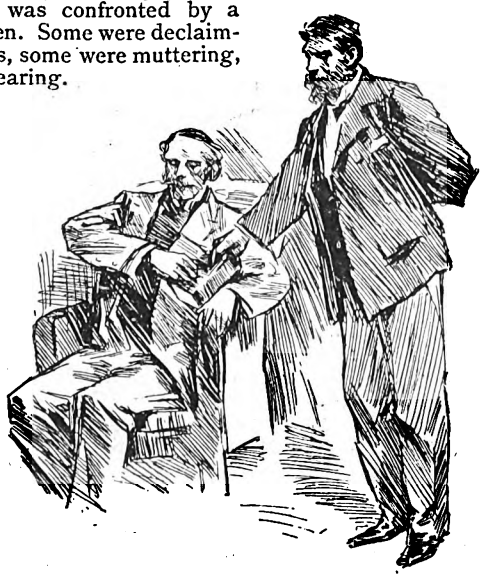
"A stranger, in commenting, in a good-natured way, upon the seeming haste in setting up a lawyer's office, said: 'I always thought that the lawyer was a sort of unavoidable evil of the old settlements; and never before had cause to suppose that he was a necessity to an embryo community.'

"'That's all well enough,' a lank fellow, leaning against a tree, answered, 'but mebby you don't know these here fellows like we do. We know mighty well that there's goin' to be a good deal of cuttin' an' shootin' here before many houses are put up, and as we air a law-abidin' set of folk, we'll want the lawyer to git us out of scrapes.'

"Well, one house went up after another, or, if you will, one house went up before another, until Starbuck had the appearance of quite a village. The blacksmith got down to his work, the justice of the peace stacked up his worthless books, and I pleaded the cause of the miscreant. I grew with my surroundings, and soon held a mortgage on a pretty fair crop of potatoes, grown by the man that had dug the town well, and who had, at an idle and dull time, stabbed the fellow that had stood on the top and received the buckets of clay.

"A courthouse was built, and other lawyers came and reared their edifices, and the scent of much necessary litigation was sniffed in the air, but no attorney, however aspiring he might be, tried to place himself upon a litigious par with your humble servant.

"One day, while the town was fitfully dozing under the glare of a mercilessly hot sun, a great commotion arose in the street. I sprang up from my pine table and hastened to the door. Here I was confronted by a party of noisy men. Some were declaiming in loud tones, some were muttering, and all were swearing.



"Tell us how it was you left America, sir."

"'We want to come in,' said the leader of the gang, addressing himself to me.

"'All right, gentlemen,' I replied, stepping back and bowing; 'you are all welcome—that is, as many as can get in.'

"The men eagerly pushed their way through the door, and the room was soon filled.

"'Now, what can I do for you?' I asked, when with difficulty I had found room enough in which to turn about and address the crowd. 'But before you proceed to explain, let me tell you most emphatically that I cannot consent to become a candidate for office.'

"Here I stopped and anxiously scanned the faces about me, and Dick Munday hastily declared that no one was thinking about asking me to run for office.

"John Cowerton."

"'We have come on a more serious business,' Munday continued. 'A feller comes to town this mornin' an' claims that he has a deed to this here lan', an' that we'll have to be driv off after we have built up our homes, an' we don't intend to do it, that's all. We don't intend to shed nobody's blood, but we don't want to give up our rights without some sort of a fight; so we thought that as you air interested along with the rest of us, an' knowin' that you air the best lawyer anywhar about, we would come to you an' ask you to put the thing in the court for us, an' see that it goes through all right.'

"'Gentlemen,' I responded, making as much of a bow as the limited space about me would admit, 'I thank you for the confidence you repose in me, and I assure you that it shall not be misplaced.

"'I thought that our titles to this land were perfect, and I believe now that they are. At least we shall see. Rest assured that I will do everything in my power to protect your homes. By the way, who is the party that sets up the claim?'

"'He is a swelled and fancy-lookin' feller from some city,' Munday answered.

"'All right; let him or his attorney confer with me. I will show him what it is to attempt such wholesale robbery.'

"That night a great indignation meeting was held. It was known that I had undertaken the fight of protecting the rights of the people, and a sort of song, not unlike a campaign hymn, was sung in praise of the champion.

"The next day, while I was sitting in my office, feeling thankful that I was soon to become the leading man of that part of the country, a portly, well-dressed individual entered the apartment.

"'Is this Major Babroid?' the visitor asked.

"'You have hit it the very first shot,' I answered. 'Sit down.'

"The visitor sat down, and taking out a bunch of papers, looked over the documents for a few moments, and then said:

"'I was not in this part of the country when your town was laid out, or I should have given warning that this land was not in the market. I have a deed here which I don't imagine can be disputed.'

"'Oh!' I exclaimed. 'You are the man that has brought about all this trouble—eh?'

"'I hope that I have not brought about any trouble, but I am assuredly the man that will bring about a decision of justice. I have often heard of you. You came here from Dabbs country, I believe?'

"'Yes, sir,' I assented.

"'I thought so,' my visitor continued. 'I say that I have often heard of you, and I must confess that from what I heard I was hardly prepared to find you so reckless with regard to the rights of others. I was told that you were a man of fine judgment, and that you stood a chance of one day occupying a place on the supreme bench of the State

Digitized by Google

"'But I see that I have been wrongly informed, for, instead of finding you a man of judgment, I discover that you have taken a case that you cannot hope to win—a case in which justice will oppose you. What is your house and lot worth?'

"'Oh,' I began, slowly scratching my head, 'I should think that if we get another railway—and another one is talked of—my property here ought to be worth £300.'

"'Cost you £50, I suppose.'

"'Well, y—yes.'

"'Now, I'll tell you what I'll do. I could get any lawyer in the States; but the fact is, I want you—want a man who is identified with the place, so, if you will take up my case, I will agree to give you £300 for your property, and in addition a handsome sum when the case is won. What do you say?'

"'What is your name?' I managed to ask.

"'John Cowerton,' my visitor answered. 'Some people call me Silver John, but that's no matter. What do you say to my offer?'

"'Come back to-night.'

"'Very well,' said Silver John, 'but in the meantime please do not mention the fact that I have called on you.'

"There was no danger of my mentioning it. I went out, after the wealthy man was gone, and strode along the street. After all, why should I stand by the people of the town? What had they done for me? Did not I have to buy land, the same as the rest of them? By defending the town's people, I could at best save only my home; but by gaining the case for Silver John, I could sell my home for a good figure, or retain it, just as I liked, and, besides, secure a large sum in cash. I was a lawyer, and was looking for clients. And I had found one.

"Silver John was in time that night, and all the arrangements for the suit were made.

"'Now,' said the client, rising, 'I shall have to go, but I will see you again soon. Good-night.'

"You can imagine I did not sleep that night for dreaming of money and high places. I could tell the people that my regard for justice had driven me to the extremity of opposing them, and I felt that when they had thought over the situation they might not hold me in a loving grasp, but that they would not choke me in revenge. I had gone to bed, but was still musing, when I heard a great tumult in the street.

"'I wonder what that means?' I said, getting up, hastily putting on my clothes, and going to the door. Looking out I saw a dark, moving mass.

"'Come out of thar,' a voice shouted

"'That you, boys?'

"'Yes. Come out here.'

"'What do you want?' I asked in tones that trembled, for a half-suspected fear had seized me.

"'Want you.'

"The mass came nearer, and by the light shining through the doorway I recognised some of my neighbours.

"'Hello, boys, what can I do for you?'

"'We don't want you to do nothin' fur us. We want to do somethin' fur you. We ain't got time to explain much. You have sold yourself to th' inimy, and we air going to hang you.'

"'Great heavens, boys——'

"'Grab him. Hush yo' yollerin', ur we'll gag you.'

"They took me down by the spring branch where an oak leaned over the stream.

"'String him up here!'

"'Hold on!' demanded a big man, with a slouch hat drawn over his face. 'I am an officer of the law and want this feller—want to take him back to Tennessee. Let me have him,' I say.'

"The men fell back, and the big man, taking hold of the rope that had been tied about my neck, led me away. We crossed the clearing, passed through a skirt of woods, and then walked on, neither of us speaking.

"'What are you going to take me to Tennessee for?' I asked, breaking the long silence.

"'Hush!'

"On we went, and the darkness deepened, more and more, as if black curtains had been drawn to shield from sight the birth of a new day.

"'Sit down here,' said the big man, pushing me towards a log. Then I sat down, and the big man stood with his back to me. An owl scrambled into his hole, a dawn-bird twittered; it was daylight.

"The big man turned toward me as he said:

"'You don't know me?'

"'No, I don't believe I do.'

"'Dan Moore!'

"That made me start.

"'If you are Dan Moore, why did you wish to save my life? I drove you out of a Colorado town.'

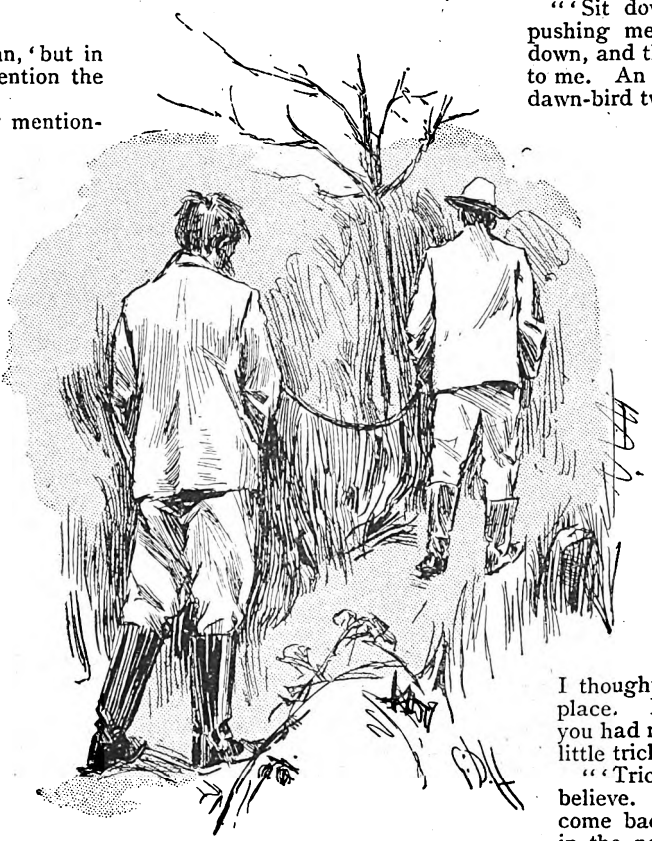
"'Yes, and I have driven you out of Starbuck. I am also Silver John, unwhiskered. I have never had any title to that land, and I merely started the report to stir up public feeling. I knew that I could get you to take up the case, and I also knew that those fellows would hang you, but I felt sorry for you at the last moment.

"'I saw that you would become the leading lawyer of the community, and as I am somewhat of a lawyer myself, I thought that I would like to take your place. But I couldn't run you out as you had run me, so I had to resort to a little trickery.

"'Trickery is permissible in law, I believe. Now, you may go; but if you come back to Starbuck, or even settle in the neighbourhood, I will make those fellows hang you. I have already made a settlement with the man who claimed their land,' he added, with a chuckle.

"'I hope you will have a pleasant journey. The weather is pleasanter than it was when I left a town at the muzzle of your pistol, listening to the howling of a hundred ruffians. You quite understand, I hope, that it will be safer for you to give this place a wide berth in the future. Don't let me detain you. Good-bye.'"

The major had finished. Painter thanked him solemnly and refilled his glass. But we never believed a word he said after that.



We passed through a skirt of the woods.

To prevent unnecessary labour, and consequent disappointment, to any readers of this paper, who in the past have forwarded original stories for insertion, we would take this opportunity of saying that our arrangements for the provision of matter for "Short Stories" are complete for some time to come.

Digitized by Google

A MIDNIGHT ALARM.

DID I know Mrs. Westcott of the Manor? I should think I did. I was there from the time she was married until the establishment was broken up. And before that we had known each other as girls, though our positions, of course, were very different.

She was just twenty-one when she was married, and I was about a year older, and as I happened just then to be at home she was as pleased as possible to have me. It was reckoned that she had made a good match, as Mr. Richard Westcott was supposed to be very well-to-do. At any rate, he always rode fine horses, spent his money freely, and after the marriage would have the housekeeping go on in the most expensive style.

For the first two years I acted as Mrs. Westcott's maid, and then, when the first child, a boy, was born, I was made nurse.

Well, for the first three years they were married things went on all right, with plenty of fine parties and an open house to all comers, when suddenly a crash came, and it was found that Mr. Richard Westcott was by no means so rich as he had made people believe.

He had deceived his own wife as much as anybody, and it was a terrible blow to her to find that they were in debt right and left. As soon as she discovered how matters stood she set to work to straighten things as much as she was able. She was a little woman, and quiet too in her way, but she had the spirit and fire of fifty men, gentle as she seemed. She hated a debt worse than poison. She could wear a cotton frock and look a lady in it—aye, and was willing too, so that they could pay for it honestly—but to be dressed in fine clothes, and owe people money, was gall and wormwood to her.

Her first stroke was in housekeeping. Three servants out of the five received warning at once. She kept me and cook; and as all the company they used to see kept far enough away now that the junketing was over, we could manage the work easily enough.

Week in, week out, no one came to the house except Mr. George Westcott, Mr. Richard's uncle. He was an old bachelor, very rich, and very queer in his ways. He was a wonderfully outspoken old man too.

One day the master must have been asking him to help him, for he broke out right before me: "Look here, Dick," says he, "I won't either give you a penny or lend you a penny. When I'm dead your boy will get every farthing I own, but till then I won't part with a farthing, so don't bother me."

The master turned as red as fire and went straight out of the room. Old Mr. Westcott's fancy was to collect diamonds, and in that he was as odd as in everything else. Instead of having them bright and shining, he used to buy them when they looked like rough pieces of stone. I've seen him showing them to Mrs. Westcott, and saying they were worth hundreds of pounds, when all the while they didn't look worth a shilling.

He lived about five miles off, and when he intended to be away from home he would bring over a big leather case in which he kept these diamonds, and leave them in his nephew's care. This made Mrs. Westcott very uneasy, and two or three times she urged him to put them in the bank at Oakford, where they would be safer. However, he wouldn't hear of such a thing, and as they didn't wish to offend him they let him have his own way.

I remember well it was about a week before one Christmas when he drove over and left this case with them as usual, as he was off to France.

"I do wish he wouldn't do so," said my mistress. "It makes me very uncomfortable to have such valuable things in the house which are not our own."

Early the next morning I was cleaning the step when two rough-looking men came up and asked where the master was. As it happened, he crossed the hall as they were speaking, and came out at once. One gave him a paper to read, and no sooner had he looked at it than he turned as white as a sheet.

He drew the men aside and spoke to them for a few moments, and then they went away. "No longer than three days, sir, at the outside," said one of them, as he turned to go. It was evidently some other extravagance of his turning up and no money to meet the bill.

An hour afterwards I was passing the stables when I saw the master leading his horse, ready saddled, out into the yard.

"Jane," said he, "tell your mistress I'm going out on business, and may not get back before to-morrow."

To anyone but myself this would have seemed a most curious message, considering that the mistress was only just indoors, and he might have told her himself. But I saw where the land lay at once. He was going to beg some of his acquaintances to help him, and she would have died sooner than beg of any one.

He knew that well enough, and so he was slipping off without her knowledge.

That day the cook had obtained permission to go to Oakford to see her friends, returning, as it was some distance, the next morning, so that, unless Mr. Westcott returned, we should be quite alone for the night.

The short winter day went by, the evening began to close in, and he had not returned. In the afternoon the little boy had been rather feverish, and, as the evening wore on, he was worse, and both of us sat by him all the time. It grew later, and still Mr. Westcott had not come home. We were sitting in the night nursery when the clock struck eleven.

"Evidently Mr. Westcott is not coming back to-night, Jane," said my mistress, "so you may make the house secure."

She went round with me, and we saw every bolt and lock fastened, examining the windows carefully. In doing this we found that the window in a small room opening into the hall was unfastened and slightly open. I said at once that I had not left it like that.

"I must speak to Sarah about this," said Mrs. Westcott. "She must have been very careless to leave the window ajar in this fashion."

We made it secure and then returned upstairs. I had been going to put out the two big lamps in the hall when my mistress told me to leave them alight.

"I've heard that plenty of lights burning will make a good protection for a house," said she, "so leave them on, as if we were up." In a little while she said I might go to bed, and she would sit up with the baby awhile. I was not a bit sleepy, and I said so, and asked if I mightn't stay up in case anything should be wanted.

We had known each other so long that we were not exactly like an ordinary mistress and servant, so she agreed.

As I said, we were sitting up in the night nursery, which was immediately above the little room where we had found the window unfastened. Both rooms looked out on a small courtyard, which had no direct connection with the house.

It was about an hour later, when all of a sudden we both jumped and looked round at each other. What was that? We listened without drawing a breath. There it was again. Someone moving about quietly, but still we could hear their steps on the flags of the yard under the window.

It could not be Mr. Westcott, for there was no door there. Who was it?

If I live to be a hundred I shall never forget that moment I felt sick again with fright. "The diamonds," flashed into my mind like lightning. I knew they were in the house. I was so silly with fear that I hardly knew what I was doing, and I must have said "The diamonds" aloud, for my mistress said sharply, "Be quiet, Jane."

We strained our ears again. Whoever it was they were trying the window which we had found unfastened.

"There is someone trying to break into the house, Jane," said my mistress, as coolly as if it were quite the regular thing. As soon as her first start was over she was as calm as possible.

"Yes'm," said I, for I didn't know what else to say. The baby woke again and began to whimper. She took him up in her arms, laying her cheek down to his and quieting him.

Digitized by Google

Then she carried him up and down the room, listening with all her might. Crash! My heart leapt into my mouth. The window below had been broken so that the catch might be reached from the outside.

It was certainly someone very well acquainted with the state of the house at the time, for the lamps were burning as brightly in the hall as if the whole household were at home and astir.

When my mistress heard the noise of the glass she stopped her walk and laid the baby again in his crib. Without a word she went out, and I followed to the door. I saw her go to a spare room at the other end of the corridor, where the master kept his guns and fishing-rods, and such like.

She was back in a moment with a rook rifle, do you call it? Yes; well, very likely that's what it was. I don't understand much about such things. Anyway, she'd got this gun and a box of the little brass cases you put in them. She knew what to do with it too. She opened it in the middle, as I've seen gentlemen do many a time, slipped in one of the cartridges, as you call them, and clicked it to. Then she stood again listening.

"Are you going to shoot them, 'm?" said I. She turned on me as short as could be.

"Why not?" says she as fierce as possible. "What's my baby done that these villains should come here to disturb, perhaps kill him? They came here of their own accord, and they must take the consequences."

While this was going on, the window below had been pushed wide open, and in another instant footsteps were heard in the room beneath.

"Jane," said Mrs. Westcott, "don't leave baby for a second." She gave him one kiss, caught up the gun, and went out. She had on soft bedroom slippers, which made no noise as she walked. Although she had given me strict orders to stop in the nursery, yet I couldn't help following her to see what would happen. I crept across the landing, and looked over the stair rail. It was quite plain at once what her plan was.

The room which had been broken into opened nowhere but into the hall, and from the middle landing of the stairs the door could be plainly seen. It was on this landing that my mistress had taken her stand, the gun pointed directly at the door. The lamps made the place as light as day.

I stood in the shadow above, my heart thumping against my ribs. It seemed hours and hours before the door was slowly and carefully opened. Then a man, in a long rough coat down to his heels, something black over his face, and a big, slouching hat, stepped out. He was alone, for he closed the door behind him.

"Stand there!" cried my mistress, in a deep, rough voice I should never have known for hers, levelling her gun with a sure aim. The man started in every limb, and looked up. He put his hand to his face as if to assure himself that the covering was there.

Whether his start disarranged it, or whether he hadn't been very handy at fastening it, I can't tell; but the stuff—it was a piece of velvet—slipped from his face and fell. For a second there was the deadest silence. Then my mistress gave a moan like some poor dumb animal. It was the master. It was Mr. Richard Westcott himself.

The stairs were winding, and from where I stood I could see both their faces. Never did I see such scorn and contempt shine in anybody's eyes as they did in hers that night. Never did I see such terror as his face showed. For a while she didn't move. Then she lifted the gun as if she would have shot him where he stood. He saw it too, and half raised his hands as if begging for mercy.

She dropped the weapon, then seized it madly again, and turned the muzzle to herself. Poor thing! I could see that she was beside herself with rage and shame at having such a husband, and didn't know what she was doing.

How the idea came into my mind I can't say, except that I am a woman myself, but I flew back into the nursery. The baby had gone comfortably to sleep, and lay there, one little fist tucked under his cheek, and the other lying out on the coverlet. I never stopped an instant, but—it was black and blue the next morning—I pinched his fat little arm with all my might.

He woke up and began to scream, I can promise you, and before you could turn round in flew my mistress, flung me away from the crib as if I had been a feather, and whipped him up into her arms.

"Go to bed at once, Jane," said she sharply; "there's nothing the matter."

"This riddle isn't very hard to read," thought I, as I undressed and got into bed. "Mr. Westcott meant to rob his own house of his uncle's diamonds, unless I'm very much mistaken." I listened for a while, but not a sound was to be heard anywhere in the house; and in a little time I went to sleep.

The next morning Mr. Westcott came down to breakfast with as natural an air as if he had let himself in with his latch-key the night before. My mistress had spent the night in the nursery with the little boy, and never a word did she ever say to me about our midnight alarm. Neither of them ever suspected that I knew what I did, and I was careful to hold my tongue.

From that day on she shrank from her husband, and clung more and more to the child, and for his part he always seemed to watch her with a sort of stealthy fear.

Six months later the little boy died very suddenly, and after that Mrs. Westcott never held her head up again. She pined and pined until she took to her bed, and three months to the very day after her child died she died herself.

I was alone with her at the time, for the nurse was down-stairs. I called her, then went to the dining-room where Mr. Westcott was. He was sitting near the window trying to look mournful, but when he saw the tears running down my face, for I had known her since we were children, he sprang from his chair. I shall never forget his face. The look of relief that leapt into his eyes—the rascal! He couldn't have kept it back for a thousand pounds—and the great sigh which broke from him showed plainly that his own skin was more to him than fifty wives.

It was all gone in a flash, and then he put his handkerchief up to his face. People who didn't know him were dreadfully sorry for him, for he did take on about it as natural as possible.

When the funeral was over I cleared out of the place bag and baggage, as quickly as I could, and I've never set eyes on him since.

What became of him? Oh, in about a couple of years he married a Miss Blake from Ufford way, and they went out to Australia, sheep-farming or something; got a host of children, too, I've heard. Old Mr. Westcott, his uncle? Lor' bless you, he's alive now, and lives at Brighton. He's over ninety years old, but they tell me he's as lively as ever and vows he'll live to be a hundred.

A MAN'S

first duty to his wife is to make her happy. If you ask her what happiness is, she will say—that is if she is addicted to telling the truth—the enjoyment of a companion whom she can consult on domestic matters when in doubt, and with whom she can spend her spare moments gleaning information. Her husband can't be expected to play this rôle. He is with plenty to occupy his mind, without discussing the subject of cooking, or of ornamenting the fireplace. But he can buy her a pennyworth of happiness every week if he so chooses,

A MAN,

FOR A' THAT

Home Notes aims at is to be a perfect companion to a woman, no matter what her station in life may be.

Digitized by Google

SEPTEMBER has many lovers. Its cool, clear days are a refreshment to poor humanity, after it has borne patiently (or impatiently) with the blazing August sun. Everybody gladly leaves the Alps or the seaside to return to the plain, where the trees hang full of luscious fruit, and where the grapes weigh the vines almost to the ground.

All know Verona, with its monuments and its glorious old palaces; and who does not like its wines and peaches? Never had there been a more promising year than 1882. Everyone was rejoicing, and even the poor were looking forward to a small share in the good harvest of the rich.

A stonecutter was living in a poor, very poor, two-storey house, not far from Verona, on the Adige. No one sees the Adige for the first time without some sensation of fear. It looks so angry, with its muddy water, rushing past, as if it hunted after some fleeing criminal. But the stonecutter had no such fear. All he cared for was to have a roof for his wife and three children, and he was proud to own those four walls, which he called his home. His wife was a gentle, good woman, and might have been very helpful to him; but unfortunately a sick child kept her at home, and she could only assist her husband by being neat and economical—if extreme poverty can be economical.

Two boys did their best to aid their father and mother, and in their small way succeeded in earning a few pennies here and there. One had found a purse one day, and hastened with it to Verona, where he had deposited it in the hands of the police. The reward given had helped buy a good bed for the little invalid, and it seemed a godsend. And now this year, in their make-believe little garden, a few vines were bearing grapes, oh, so beautiful, so nearly ripe! The boys would not touch one of those grapes. They were all—all to be for Maria the invalid. The boys actually believed the grapes might cure their little sister.

But this September of '82 began with rain. It rained and rained, and suddenly a cry of terror struck the whole Venetian territory, and part of Lombardy. The inundations had begun. The rivers rose from hour to hour, and the night, the night of horrors came when the Adige left its bed and rushed wildly through country and city, carrying with it all that attempted to hinder its wild course. Ruins of all kinds were floating, animals in a last attempt at saving themselves, beds, tables, trees—all passed, showing the terrible ravages of the angry flood. The country was one vast lake. Trains had ceased running, bridges had crumbled, and no telegram could be sent to soothe anxious hearts. Nothing but destruction was to be seen everywhere between Venice and Verona.

Troops were sent to help; boats came from all parts, and everybody lent a hand to aid the half-distracted population. The king hurried to the unhappy cities, and he was seen helping and encouraging soldiers and officers. The houses nearest the river were naturally the most in danger. The misfortune came so quickly and so unexpectedly that even the stonecutter had left home in the morning for his work which lay at quite a distance from his house. Late in the afternoon he heard the terrible tale from a soldier, who was passing rapidly with a message. The poor man stood for a moment, paralysed with terror and gazing helplessly at the grey sky. Would he reach his house in time? "Oh, my poor, poor wife!"

A hot, burning tear rolled over his blanched face. He tried to walk, but he was almost as powerless as his little Maria. Sinking on his knees, he prayed with his whole heart: "Oh, help us, good God!"

As if his prayer had been heard, the sound of a carriage came distinctly to him. When it reached him, his hands went up in a desperately pleading gesture to the two gentlemen sitting in it. Without waiting for the horses to stop, one of them jumped out and, lifting the poor man up, asked: "What is it?"

The stonecutter in a few words told his anxiety. Before he had finished, the gentleman had helped the poor man into the carriage, which had come to a halt, and making him sit near the coachman, said! "Tell him where you live," and he added, "Presto, Piero, go as fast as your horses will go." What had seemed impossible to the stonecutter was easy work for the two beautiful horses. But soon the wheels were partly covered by water, and as far as the eye could reach was water, nothing but water.

The heart of the wretched father became again utterly hopeless. He covered his eyes, in order not to see such desolation. Suddenly, mingled with the noise of the water, he heard cries for help, Looking up, he saw a woman struggling through the water and trying to hold a little child above it. A sharp "Stop!" and in a moment his benefactor was half wading, half swimming through the flood, and in a few moments the exhausted woman was lifted with her child into the carriage. A few yards further on, and, with a cry of pleasure, the stonecutter saw his own house in the distance. But his joy was very short. The water had reached the first story and would soon reach the second, even if the house stood firm. If only a boat were at hand!

"Unharness one horse, Piero," ordered the master of the carriage, and then turning to his companion, an officer with whom he had been exchanging words of deep interest and anxiety all the time, he said in a friendly, but decided tone: "You will ride to Verona, Count, and order a boat to come this way at once."

The count jumped immediately from the carriage, mounted a horse and fairly flew over the flooded street. Meanwhile, the sharp eyes of the poor father had more guessed than seen three figures on the roof of the house. He suddenly thought of the little Maria, who usually lay in the first-floor room, and a cold chill struck him to the heart. Yes, there were three figures on the roof, all of them shouting for help. His Maria, his sweet little girl, must be lost, drowned in that terrible water, which seemed to rise every minute.

He turned his pale face to the inside of the carriage. He saw how the gentleman had taken off his overcoat and was wrapping in it the mother and child whom he had saved, and was trying to comfort her. She was telling how she had come out to gather herbs for a drug-store and had suddenly been surprised by the waters. She fled, until she felt her drenched skirt drawing her down to sure death. "And now," she said, "I am saved, saved with my angel!" and kissing her child passionately, she looked gratefully at her saviour. But he scarcely heard her, for he was now standing up, watching intently for the boat, which, though it had to come from Verona, up the river against the rushing current, must soon reach the spot. The water was invading the second floor of the house, and a cry of terror came from the man, who was almost losing his mind at seeing his dear ones so menaced.

Digitized by Google

Sinking on his knees, he prayed with his whole heart.

"Courage, my man, courage! I see the boat coming," the gentleman exclaimed. And so it was. Six soldiers were rowing with all their might against the fury of the torrent. A man stood in their midst, leading and directing their efforts. But, oh, what slow progress. Will they never reach the house? Will the angry river get its prey? Will his dear ones die before the eyes of the distracted father?

They all stand up in the carriage, watching every stroke of the soldiers, breathless, unable even to utter a sound. The water rises, rises; and they see the women bend in terror over the border of the roof, as if to calculate how long the agony is to last. The horse neighs, and in the distance another neighing is heard. It is a soldier returning with the missing horse.

"There is danger!" he calls. "Turn the carriage!"

But his call is not heard, and receives no answer. A white, agonised face turns from the house. It has seen the boat. It is just high enough for the boys to jump in; but no, they refuse, and so does the mother. The house seems to shake under the power of the water. But what is that? Two soldiers leave the oars; one jumps on the shoulder of the other, and with a sign seems to say that he is steady. The leader clings easily upon this human pole and reaches the roof with a daring jump. He bends, and, lifting a form from it, gives some orders to the soldiers. A cord is thrown to him. He ties it strongly to the chimney, and then begins the dangerous descent. But he is young and brave, and God helps the brave.

The little girl is tenderly deposited in the bottom of the boat. He returns once more; the mother wants her other children saved first. Lastly he descends with her own slight weight supported by his arm. Looking up he gives rapid orders. The oars fall in the water, and now the current carries them rapidly toward the carriage.

The soldier meanwhile has harnessed the horse. At a distance, the boat stops. The water is too shallow to row further. The young officer unhesitatingly jumps out, and half wading, half swimming, reaches the carriage.

"For heaven's sake, Piero," he cries, "ride as fast as you can!"

Then turning to the stonecutter, "The soldiers will take your family to Verona to the hospital. We will find them there."

But the water is deep. The horses are frightened, and it takes all the skill of the old coachman to reach the dry part of the road. A loud crash behind them makes them shiver. The house is gone; they all know it. The stonecutter sits as if stunned; he hears and sees nothing. Can he ever forget the agony of this day! And the poor woman holds her baby tighter to her breast wondering who this powerful saviour is.

Soon they reach Verona, and drive up to the hospital. The young officer helps the woman to alight, speaking, as he does so, a few words hurriedly to the janitor. The man looks up and, taking off his cap, he directs the woman where to go and get dry clothes. She turns to thank her benefactor, but he is looking sadly away, and she dares not speak.

The stonecutter descends, and, hat in hand, he says only: "Grazia." His heart is full, for he sees his wife coming up the street, followed by a soldier carrying a little form tenderly wrapped in his jacket. The boys rush up, and, before he can speak again, the carriage with the two gentlemen has left.

The next day a manservant inquires after the whole family in the hospital, and leaves an envelope for the happy father. It holds a yellow bank-note—five hundred francs! The poor stonecutter wishes he could thank his benefactor, but he remains unknown to him. Perhaps, if he should go to Rome some day, he might find him in King Humbert's palace. If not there, he will be sure to find him where Italy is suffering.

He was now standing up watching intently for the boat.

Digitized by Google

A DECEPTIVE DREAM.

"My dear, I have had an extraordinary dream."

Mr. Arnold Carewe spoke with solemn emphasis, a tone of gravity in his voice.

Scene, the sunny breakfast room of the Carewes; time, nine in the morning one clear, cold winter day. Mrs. Carewe glanced over the top of the silver coffee urn at her liege lord, with a look of mild interest in her deep, dark eyes.

"A dream! Why, Arnold, I thought you did not believe in such things!" she exclaimed. Then, at the sight of the gravity of his face, her own grew concerned. "What was it?" she eagerly asked.

"Well, of course, it was only a dream," returned Mr. Carewe, "but, to say the least, it was odd that I should dream the same thing over—in every particular—exactly three blessed times last night. It seemed a little odd, to be sure. Besides, I dreamed that I am to die upon a certain day, and at a certain hour. My dear, I shall not tell you when, for it is not far distant, and the knowledge of it might make you nervous, even though it is only a dream—and therefore not infallible."

Breakfast over, Arnold Carewe went to his office. It was Carewe & Carewe—a well-known law-firm—and Arnold was senior partner; his brother Jack comprised the rest of the firm.

As he entered the office, Jack, seated at a tall desk, glanced up with a strange look.

"I say, Arnold, I had a dream about you last night which made me a trifle uneasy," he began, "and as you are a little late this morning, I was beginning to fear that something was amiss. Had you not come in as you did I intended taking a cab and going up to your house. Glad you're all right, old fellow!"

"A dream"—aghast. "So had I. What did you dream, Jack?"

"Well, seeing you are all right, I'll tell you," returned Jack. "I dreamed that you are to die—don't look so pale, old boy; you are not dead yet, but a long way from it—I dreamed that you were to die on the 10th of January, exactly three weeks from to-day."

Arnold Carewe sank into a seat, and looked faint.

No wonder! That was the exact date which his dream—three times repeated—had indicated. But he controlled his nervousness, and turned to his brother, with affected amusement.

"Perhaps you dreamed the hour, too, while you were about it!" he jocosely observed.

"So I did. January 10th, as you will see by glancing at yonder calendar, comes on Tuesday. My dream said that at twenty minutes past two, precisely, on Tuesday, January 10, you would depart this life!"

Arnold Carewe started to his feet, trembling like a leaf. No wonder, for it was his own dream, in every particular. It seemed incredible. But he decided to say nothing to his brother as to the purport of his dream, but to patiently wait, and make all preparations for the great finale.

For a man to find that he has exactly three weeks—twenty-one days—in which to live is a very odd sensation. The murderer condemned to the scaffold feels very much as Arnold Carewe felt in the days that followed. He went about like a man in a dream. He first "set his house in order," making his will, attending to the various affairs of his business, paying off debts, doing all that he could, with a sort of satisfaction, to make it easier for the wife and little ones, soon to be left alone. They would be well provided for—that was a great blessing.

He became very devout also. Every day he read the prayers in his little family circle; and attended divine service on Sunday; feeling a shudder of nervous dread run over him when the second Sunday had gone, and he knew that only one remained to him.

It was wonderful how tenaciously the idea clung to his mind—the positive belief that he was a doomed man, marked by Death as his prey. How gentle and kind and tender he was to all at home. Perhaps, if more people could develop a similar hallucination it might be better for the peace of many a household. To be ever-preparing for the great event would keep us gentler and kinder and more considerate.

Looking back upon that time, in after years, Bessie Carewe was obliged to admit that it was the happiest, most peaceful time of all her married life. But, of course, she knew nothing of her husband's firm belief in his approaching demise. She had, in fact, forgotten all about Arnold's odd dream, and he had not explained to her its horrible exactness.

The days went by. The Christmas holidays—sad and sweetly solemn to the man who felt that they were the very last he should ever see upon earth—were gone, and the seventh day of January had come. Carewe now discarded his watch, placing it in his dressing-case. He did not wish to see a timepiece. Only seventy-two hours between him and the great Unknown!

So, carefully avoiding every timepiece, making all possible efforts to forget the fatal and fast-approaching hour, Arnold Carewe waited.

The 10th of January came at last—a bright, winter day.

He arose in the morning, after a sleepless night, saying to himself:

"My last day on earth! God help me!"

He looked so pale and worn, and so evidently ill, that his wife begged him to remain home from the office that day.

As that was what he had secretly intended doing, he consented.

As the fatal hour drew near—for he imagined it to be near the time—he made his way to the pretty guest-chamber and lay down upon a soft couch. A fire had been kindled in the grate and the fire was warm and cheerful. Over the fireplace, upon the marble mantel, a tiny clock was standing. Arnold Carewe turned his eyes resolutely away from it. He did not wish to know the exact moment. So he lay there, and gradually a slow feeling of torpor began to steal over him. His wife came into the room, and with her the two pretty children—he had told her to bring them. He took the loved ones in his arms and strained them to his heart in a passionate farewell, all the more solemn because he dared not tell Bessie that he believed himself to be dying. He was conscious of a feeling of gratitude that he had been warned in time.

After a time Bessie took the children away. Then she returned to his side with a glass of wine.

"Here, dear, drink this," she said sweetly; "it will help you!"

He obeyed her, and then lay watching the graceful figure as she moved about the room.

At last his eyes, in spite of his determination to the contrary, wandered to the clock and rested there.

Good heavens! Ten minutes past two!

"Bessie," he moaned feebly, "come!"

Then all grew dark before his eyes; he felt like one stepping softly away—then darkness fell.

"Arnold! Arnold! wake up! I am afraid you will sleep too long! It is six o'clock!"

Bessie Carewe bent over his prostrate form, and Arnold Carewe opened his eyes.

"Am I in heaven?" he gasped.

"Dear me—no! You have been asleep ever since half-past two! I gave you a dose of my sleeping medicine in that glass of wine. I know you have not slept for nights. Why, Arnold, what are you staring at?"

For he was sitting up now, gazing in the rosy lamp-light, at that clock.

Still ten minutes past two!

"Oh, yes," she laughed lightly; "the clock is broken."

. . . . . .

And Arnold Carewe has never believed in dreams since that day.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE
FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES — Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—
Mrs. S. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON S.W.

RUBBER STAMPS

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

FREE BY POST. AGENTS WANTED Liberal commissions.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS: so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.
G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

£20 To Tobacconists Commencing.

Write for Illus. Guide to the trade. 259 pages. Post free. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO." (Reg.); 186, Euston Road, London.

"Pick-Me-Up Cigarettes" everywhere.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s. 6d.
BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.
LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.
LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S
M.B. FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth. For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

30 YEARS SUCCESS AMONG THE DEAF.

The Rev. E. J. SILVERTON, Specialist, of Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, will be happy to send his book on the Ear, "How to Cure without the Use of Instruments or Operation." Price 6d. Sufferers from Deafness, Noises, or Discharges in the Ears, should obtain this work, or consult E. J. S. by letter or personally. Hours, Monday and Tuesday, 11 to 4 other days 11 to 2 only. Wonderful cases:—A person cured after 40 years' deafness and one of the age of 90. A gentleman after 17 years' deafness cured. A remarkable case of a lady at Grimsby substantiated by a Clergyman. Addresses on application. All communications as above.

OTTEY'S STRONG PILLS.

These noted Pills always remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever, where ordinary Steel and Pennyroyal Pills fail. Post free, under cover, for 10, 14, and 33 stamps, from THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

Patronised by Royalty.

SILK UMBRELLAS

Direct from the Manufacturer, 2/6 each.

Ladies' or Gents' Plain or Twill Silk. Parker's Hollow-Ribbed Frames, Carved and Mounted Sticks.

Sent Parcel Post Free, 2/9 Postal Order (or 36 Stamps).

Re-covering neatly done, Plain or Twill Silk, Ladies' or Gents', 2/6 each, returned next post. List and Testimonials Free.

J. B. PARKER, Umbrella Works,
Broom Close, SHEFFIELD.

"SKIN TROUBLES."

Eczema, irritation, and all skin troubles are cured merely by using "ANTECZEMA." Of Chemists, &c., or post free for 1s. 8d., of the ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Book on diet, &c., free.

SOUND WHITE TEETH

Ensured by use of "Ibis Tooth Powder." 1s. boxes, post free, from the ANTECZEMA CO., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Samples free for one stamp

Adresse de M. SUEZ, 9, Rue de Prony PARIS

VINAIGRE LACTÉ de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE

EAU de SUEZ

VACCINE for the MOUTH
Strengthens the Gums
Perfumes the Breath
The only Dentifrice securing
BEAUTIFUL TEETH

POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICES DE SUEZ

London Agents: WILCOX & Co., 239, Oxford Street.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

For Tradesmen's Windows, Fascias, Signs, or Tablets.

The durability, elegance, and striking brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the Most Effective Medium of all kinds of indoor and outdoor advertisements. Enamelled Iron Plates. Swinging Signs in great variety.

Call and see our stock, or send for price lists.

Near the Farringdon Road Station.
Inventors and Manufacturers.
Agents wanted.

ONLY ADDRESS:—
61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 288.—Vol. X. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 7, 1894. [Price One Penny.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS.

4/- EACH. LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. 4/- EACH.

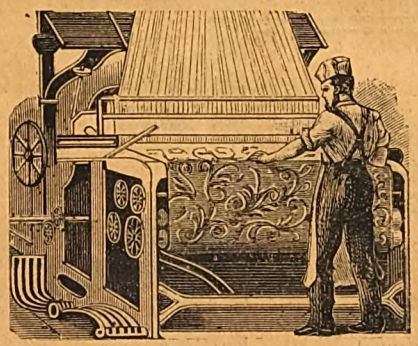
THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 stamps, we will forward direct from our looms to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.



GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says: "unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our Customers:

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.

M. Lock writes:—"I received the Carpets, Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.

Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. Hargreaves.

Established 1872. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY,

31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

All communications respecting Advertisements for "Short Stories" should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE

FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

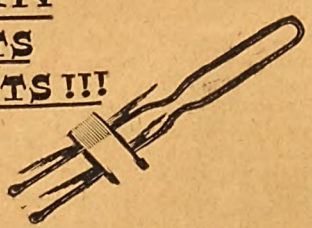
JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A HAIR PIN WITHOUT POINTS HAS GOOD POINTS!!!

SEE THE POINT?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s. 6d.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.

LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.

LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

"SKIN TROUBLES."

Eczema, irritation, and all skin troubles are cured merely by using "ANTECZEMA." Of Chemists, &c., or post free for 1s. 8d., of the ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Book on diet, &c., free.

SOUND WHITE TEETH

Ensured by use of "Ibis Tooth Powder," 1s. boxes, post free, from the ANTECZEMA CO., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Samples free for one stamp.

OTTEY'S STRONG PILLS.

These noted Pills always remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever, where ordinary Steel and Pennyroyal Pills fail. Post free, under cover, for 10, 14, and 33 stamps, from THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

NOSE

Ugly shape altered and redness cured, permanently. Stamped envelope for full particulars. LEES RAY, Specialist, Waverltree, Liverpool. Treatment thorough. Uniquely testimonialised by Clients and by Press.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and

OBSTINATE CASES,

NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,

GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. S. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON S.W.

£20 To Tobacconists Commencing.

Write for Illus. Guide to the trade. 259 pages. Post free. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO." (Reg.), 186, Euston Road, London.

"Pick-Me-Up Cigarettes" everywhere.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

For Tradesmen's Windows, Fascias, Signs, or Tablets.

The durability, elegance, and striking brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the Most Effective Medium of all kinds of indoor and outdoor advertisements. Enamelled Iron Plates. Swinging Signs in great variety.

Call and see our stock, or send for price lists. Near the Farringdon Road Station.

Inventors and Manufacturers. Agents wanted.

Only Address—61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST. AGENTS WANTED Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated List free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

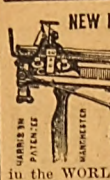
MADAME FRAIN'S

M.B. FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth. For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL KNITTER



Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 288.—Vol. X. FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 7, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

The Second Life

CHAPTER I.

THE fiery rays of an almost tropical sun at noon slanted through the open windows of Rose Cottage, where Leon Renaud stood by the bedside of his deceased wife. His little girl Louise, a child of five years, stood at his side; but, for all that, he was alone—alone, though a troop of men and angels had surrounded him; for what can disturb the desert solitude which death flings about itself as a broad mantle and above all who enter its presence.

The very fulness of life on that summer day, hints of which were borne through the windows with the stately sighing of the wind and the fragrance of the flowers, intensified and heightened, by contrast, the rigour and abysmal silence of that slumber upon which Renaud gazed.

That terrible scourge of 18— had visited Worcester with the utmost severity. Rose Cottage was situated in one of the least crowded districts of the city; yet this neighbourhood had not escaped the fate of the others.

Renaud's young wife had devoted herself day by day to visiting and nursing the sick around her, until she herself was stricken down with the disease, of which she soon became a victim.

Fate had in its quiver no dart so poignant as this which suddenly pierced the heart of the fond husband. Leon Renaud was of French lineage on his father's side.

His father, Charles Renaud, had resided in Worcester for a short time, years ago, and had there married Leon's mother, but immediately after this event had returned to his home in Paris.

While Leon was a mere boy his mother died. Then Leon's father married again. This second wife, stepmother to the motherless boy, proved a curse to Charles Renaud's declining years. To escape her tyranny, young Renaud fled from Paris to Rome, where he devoted himself to studying art. Dreamer and poet he had always been. His temperament, inherited from his mother, induced to contemplation; his large lustrous hazel eyes betokened at once the passionate eagerness of inquiry and a disposition towards mysticism.

His keen analysis drove him from all the ordinary positions quietly assumed by the mass of men as to the great questions affecting human life and destiny; but, as if finding no rest beyond these landmarks, his soul seemed to wander ever in the shadowy borderland where the real blends so readily with the ideal and the visible receives the mantle of the invisible.

After a residence of some years in Italy, he was seized with an irresistible desire to visit his mother's native city. He came to England, and there, encouraged by the patronage of a few who had known his father, he easily contrived to satisfy his material wants, which were few and simple.

Here he met Marion Day. At this time he was over thirty, while she was only eighteen. She was a simple country girl who would certainly have attracted attention by her beauty; and her parents were plain people with moderate means. Her education had been of the simplest sort, and she had none of that distinguishing style which often in the world's estimate supplies the want of both wealth and beauty.

But Leon Renaud judged not after the manner of the world. He had lived for the most part a solitary life. He was now in the prime of manhood, but the dreams of his youth still lingered with him, though his youthful enthusiasm had been tempered by a ripened judgment.

Leon and Marion seemed to be spiritual counterparts, and there was a rare completeness, therefore, in their marriage. He was noble, and inspired in her a sense of grandeur. His wonderful subtlety of thought, his wealth of emotion, and the spirituality of his nature introduced her into a new world, where he was always her teacher.

Their chief delight was in music, which became to them a sort of universal language. His very conversation seemed to echo to grand old melodies, and as she listened it seemed as if the winds wafted fragrance and repose to her.

If her spirit soared to meet his, so that her love was almost adoration, it was also true that his grand sympathies found through her humble, womanly charity, a way to their expression in the beaten paths of life. This beautiful life they had lived together for years, and now the end had come.

Leon was startled, bewildered, stunned. It was as if the repose of heaven had been broken. The dearness of this woman, and his need of her, had never before been so sensibly felt. He stood upon the brink of an abyss which his thoughts—subtle and deep as they were—could not compass nor fathom.

His soul was moved to its depths. To such men the tragedy of such infinite loss is not simply solemn; it is a great agitator.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

It is not strange, therefore, that to Renaud in the presence of this mighty sorrow, the great problem of human destiny—as it seemed to him—namely, the question of a future life presented itself anew.

But eager as were the questionings of his soul, he seemed confronted by a sphinx that answered only in riddles. The suggestions of his own intellect seemed almost cruel, intruding as they did into the sacred presence chamber of his tenderest emotions.

"Is this the end?" he asked. "In the midst of life has my Marion drooped as do the flowers, to fall away into a mere heap of dust? Even the crazy old alchemists had a fancy that, by some magical process they could restore from the rose at least its phantom—a semblance of the real flower!

"Is not the Divine chemistry as potent as that? It cannot be that my rose is lost to me for ever!"

He reviewed in thought that movement of the glorious oratorio of the "Messiah" as it swept over his soul—so susceptible to the impressions of music—but still he was not satisfied.

The calm surface of his thoughts had been disturbed by the heavy hand of Death, and the waves still undulated in ever widening circles toward an uncertain shore.

CHAPTER II.

The dead in this time of peril were hurriedly buried. As the sun of the following day sank into the heavens, the face of Marion, after receiving the last fond kisses of the husband and daughter, was hidden from their view, and they followed the remains to its last resting-place.

Two men met the sombre cortège as it returned from the burying-ground whose characters must be described. They were not together, but met the procession at different stages of its course.

One of these was Dr. Eugene Marchand, who had just issued from the library in his house in Dauphin Street. Both by his dress and his walk it could be seen that he was a fastidious gentleman of easy manners and perfect self-possession. He was a passionate lover of the beautiful, and shrank from ugliness and deformity with almost a shudder. Yet this man, to whom disease was disgusting, made it the great study of his life.

Here he met Marion Day.

This lover of the beautiful spent no small portion of his time in anatomical dissections. The sight of pain was a torment to him; but he was so skilled in its alleviation that he was the most promising surgeon in the town.

As he met the procession, and could see through the windows of the leading carriage the sorrow-stricken faces of Renaud and his little girl, his heart was touched, and he said to himself:

"Alas, how sad!" and the frequency of such spectacles in those death-crowded days did not diminish the profoundness of his sympathy. Looking into his naturally cheerful but now somewhat pensive face, and into the clear, grey eyes that almost changed their colour under the influence of emotion, you would have said: "This man is a child of nature—open, as men rarely are, to all material influences, able or subtle. His smile answers to the faintest gleam of sunshine, and his heart is swayed by cloud and storm, and although he is so much of a philosopher, his philosophy affords no shield to cover, no mark to disguise, his susceptibility.

The other man to whom we alluded was Ernest Drivet. As he met the procession he also looked upon the faces of the chief mourners, and knew that Marion Renaud had been buried. He gazed with stolid indifference upon the insignia of their great sorrow.

He had once been a lover of Marion—if anything could be dignified by the name of love which was cherished in Drivet's heart; it was certainly the purest and worthiest emotion that had ever entered there. But she, with that unerring intuition which belongs to such pure spiritual natures, had avoided him from the first, until at length his passionate love had been turned into bitter hate.

Drivet was a thoroughly selfish man. He was endowed with a very fair exterior, with a strong intellect, and with consummate impudence; he loved intrigue, and delighted in playing upon other men as upon the strings of an instrument.

He had acted upon the stage, had written stray articles for the press, and was now a sort of attaché to the new hospital, which he had entered some years before, and where he still lingered, not as a student, but upon good terms with all.

He had been sauntering along the street, but as the procession passed him his steps were arrested as by some suddenly considered purpose.

"Ah!" he chuckled to himself, "a capital idea! Bold—but why not?"

Reaching the end of the street, his attention was directed toward a group of labourers lounging outside a public-house. A conversation followed in low tones between Drivet and two or three of this group whom he had drawn to one side.

Some bargain was completed, apparently, for as Drivet left them he slipped some silver pieces into their hands. When we left Dr. Marchand he was on his way to a remote and solitary cottage in the outskirts of the town occupied by a young medical student whose name was Frank, and who was a protégé of the doctor's.

This youth ushered the doctor into a room where three or four students were evidently awaiting him. This was the "Marchand Society," which pursued investigations on its own account.

The doctor was to lecture to this select company this evening on the structure of the human brain, and Ernest Drivet had been engaged to provide a suitable "subject" for additional investigations in the apartment adjoining the parlour, and which was known as the "Subject Room."

He had provided the necessary object in this way on previous occasions. Dr. Marchand entered upon his preliminary lecture, which was interesting and decidedly original. An hour passed. It was eleven o'clock and no advices had been received from Drivet.

But the topic of the evening was one of absorbing interest, and the doctor resumed his lecture. His mind was abundantly stored with narratives of peculiar psychological experiences illustrating his theories.

After midnight a knock at the outside door was recognised as Drivet's. The long expected "something" was hurriedly transferred to the dissecting room, where the mysterious bundle was opened by Frank and Drivet. Two dark blue eyes slowly opened which should have been for ever closed, and Ernest Drivet was confronted by a living face that should have belonged to the dead.

Digitized by Google

He gave one look of astonishment and terror, and then without one word, fled from the house as if pursued by a phantom. The other students were abruptly dismissed without knowing the details, and Frank, with Dr. Marchand, were left alone with their strange and unaccountably proceeding subject.

CHAPTER III.

A transformation had been wrought—a miracle. It was not simply the awakening, as from a sleep, of one who seemed dead, and who had been laid away for an everlasting slumber—it was a new life.

The eyes so familiar to Ernest Drivet had not recognised him. The world upon which they opened seemed as new as it does to a fresh-born child. The past to this awakened sleeper was literally a blank. This woman was mentally an infant.

The words which fell upon her ears seemed meaningless, and she could utter none in reply.

She was taken away in a carriage, which Frank had provided, to Dr. Marchand's home, where she was placed in the care of his wife. In all mental affairs—in all respects, indeed, except as to her age, she was a child; though she learned more rapidly than a mere child.

Dr. Marchand's mansion was well suited to his character. It was costly and beautiful, was furnished with all the elegance that the most refined and artistic taste could suggest or wealth make possible, and was surrounded by beautiful grounds. It was in this bright home of luxury and art that his "patient" began her new life. The doctor at first regarded her with simply a speculative interest.

She was a case inviting deep study—and he studied it. Very soon, however, science yielded to sentiment; for this woman in her life was very attractive. She was as different from her former self as the butterfly is from the chrysalis. As Marion Day, or Marion Renaud, she had been a simple, earnest, spiritual being, self-sacrificing, and the very impersonation of charity.

The brain is the flower of the body, and it seemed that out of the dust of the flower which had matured and decayed a new and different flower had blossomed. Serious she had been; now she was gay. Deep-natured previously, now the movements of her thoughts were light and airy. Perhaps the change could not be more happily expressed than by likening it to the transformations which have affected whole races, bearing them from the rude Pelasgian life into their Hellenic or artist era.

Only these were gradual changes as compared with that sudden and almost miraculous transformation which had here been effected.

It is not wonderful that Dr. Marchand found in this woman so much to study, nor that his studies grew to have an additional interest from the beginning of love for her in his heart, the love of a father for a child. But whenever he thought of the past he was sorely puzzled. He did not even know her name.

There was no clue to the mystery, for she remembered absolutely nothing. It is true, however—and this should be mentioned here for the benefit of those interested in the purely psychological features of her case—it is true that when she happened to be in places that should have been familiar there did come to her inner sense a vague shadow of reminiscence—something that could scarcely be called an impression, it was so faint and indistinct.

Especially was she haunted by the vision of reminiscence when she went into the cemetery—it was there that the Dupuys had all been buried—which she quite frequently visited during the summer that followed her strange resurrection. This puzzled her and caused her to linger about the place, as one who was in some way connected with the inexplicable wonder of her life. But the idea was as faint and shadowy as the fragrance of the flowers that decorated the tombs about her.

Dr. Marchand had never told her of even the single fact of which he was cognisant. He intimated that she had been ill and had been placed in his charge in so accidental a manner that he even did not and could not learn her name. With this she was forced to be content. She knew that the doctor loved her, and she was perfectly happy in loving him and his beautiful wife. But he was troubled by a horrible doubt. He was afraid some possible interruption of this new life—either through her return to her former mental state or through some intrusive claim from others who had known her and who might discover her present retreat. He therefore guarded her most jealously and felt anxious when she was out of his sight. After all, his great fear was Ernest Drivet, who must be able, he thought, to bridge over the hiatus between the two lives of this woman.

"Ah, a capital idea!"

CHAPTER IV.

Leon Renaud since the death of his wife had become a recluse. A year had passed, and still the sharpness of his grief had not been diminished. In this wandering life which he was leading, his eyes became hollow, his skin sallow, and his health rapidly failed.

Convinced that his present sufferings were redoubled by the remembrance of the past pleasures and that the passions gather renewed strength in solitude, he resolved to remove from the place which recalled the remembrance of his great loss. He had kept continually in action, walking in sunshine and rain, at night or day, wandering into the depths of the woods, over cultivated land and grassy fields, hoping to divert his mind by the fatigue of his body, and to change the course of his reflections by his seeming ignorance of the places where he was—but the soul of the lover finds everywhere traces of the beloved object; night and day, the calm of solitude, the noise of crowds, time even, which effaces so many other memories, has no power to remove these, for, like the needle once touched by the magnet, which, however it may be disturbed, turns so soon as it is still to the pole that attracts it.

Undoubtedly, love does delight in many bitter pleasures, and he consoled himself in his misfortune with thoughts of—"I have not deserved it, yet she has met the fate allotted to us all—to high birth and lowly, to beauty and to those less favoured. The life of woman and of man, with all its projects, is like building a tower whose crown is death—and in being born we are condemned to die. Death is a benefit to us all; it is the night of the restless day we call life; it is the sleep wherein the diseases, grief, vexations, and fears repose that molest without cessation the unfortunate living."

The old desire to wander had returned to him, and he contemplated an early departure for the Continent. With this in view, and the remembrance of a very vivid, peculiar, and startling dream wherein Marion still existed fresh in his mind, he went, towards the close of a summer afternoon, to visit the cemetery for the last time.

Through the avenues of tombstones Renaud walked until he reached the family vault. As he gazed, he seemed to be transported back to that summer noon one year ago, when the shock of death first fell upon his heart. His soul was not agitated as it had been then. At first the marble repose of the place, though in some sort a symbol of death, soothed and invited him. Then the suggestions of life that were thrown out even here seemed to answer his old doubts and to give him hope.

Digitized by Google

The climbing roses and the trailing ivy towered above the stony silence, as if hinting of ever-flowing change—as if whispering to his heart: "There is no place of rest! For see! out of the very dust life rises tremblingly but triumphantly over the mask of Death."

He remembered how this same idea of life and motion, as contrasted with the death-like stillness, had once occurred to him in reading that passage in the twelfth Odyssey, where Homer describes the cave of the Naiads. It all came back to him now—the picture of the Naiads weaving for ever at long stone looms, and of the wild bees humming and honeymaking round cups and casks of stone, where evermore the waves entered and broke upon the stony flooring.

The fading sunlight flashed across the name of the dear departed, and Renaud still gazed intently, as if there was something still to come for which he waited. Might not the veil of separation be lifted but for a moment?—and, as if in answer to his thought, there in the clear light, almost at his side, stood the living form of Marion! There she stood with one finger raised to her forehead as if she were trying to solve some laborious problem—stood thus for one moment, and then fled as from some haunted chamber. As for Renaud, astonished at his heavenly vision, as it seemed to him, and overwhelmed with the ecstasy of that glorious moment, he sank to his knees and buried his face in his hands. When he left the cemetery a few minutes later his face beamed with a smile of assured hope. The next day he started for the continent, and on the evening of his departure, Dr. Marchand gave his own name to the nameless woman who had come so strangely in his way. She became his adopted daughter. As a physiological mystery she was worth a fortune to him.

There she stood with one finger raised to her forehead.

CHAPTER V.

Dr. Marchand had rightly conjectured that Ernest Drivet knew Marion's past history. But he had not met Drivet since that memorable night at Frank's, though he had sought him diligently. Yet the object of his search had all the while been hovering closely about and had kept himself well informed as to the movements of the doctor and his patient.

It was only now that his time had come—now, when the developments over which he had kept watch had been fully matured and the doctor had openly adopted the girl. Drivet's original scheme, conceived on the evening when he had employed the labourers to assist him in carrying out his design, had contemplated nothing beyond the satisfaction of his malice toward Renaud and his wife.

He was startled—actually confounded at first—by the result of his night's work; and after his astonishment had somewhat subsided he was led by curiosity to see what would follow. We can readily imagine his surprise at the ensuing events, and especially at the doctor's extraordinary step. Why had not Marion fled? Had she ceased to love her husband Renaud, the broken-hearted? As a spy watching from a distance, he could not answer these questions.

A few weeks afterwards Drivet appeared at the doctor's house. To his astonishment—was there no end to mysteries?—she did not recognise him. Marion seemed to him more beautiful and fascinating than ever in the past years. She was the same, and yet not the same. Her dress, her manner, her whole expression had changed.

It was the old flower with a new and different fragrance. While he stood entranced with wonder he was aroused by a touch of the doctor's hand upon his shoulder, followed by the request for a private conversation in the library. He readily acceded, and a few words from the doctor explained the situation.

"You know, Drivet," said the doctor anxiously, "you know who the girl was?"

"Yes, I know some things, not much; but the disclosure of that little affair is a serious matter for me."

"It may be serious for me, too," said the doctor, "and meagre as your information may be, it is invaluable to me. I would give a hundred pounds to know all about her."

"Oh, it's not so very bad, doctor," returned Drivet. "You see, she had been an inmate of an insane asylum for a number of years, took the fever, died apparently, and was buried—you know the rest."

This invention of Drivet's lulled the doctor's fears, and his gratitude for relief made him generous, so much so that, while the brief interview had satisfied Drivet's cupidity, as well as his curiosity, he left the house with a large sum in his pocket—one that would go a great way, spendthrift though he was. But he could not keep away from the greater prize.

If the doctor could win Marion's love, why need he despair? Had he not rescued her from the grave? Did she not belong to him? Then he remembered she had not shown toward him any of that repugnance which she had formerly exhibited.

In a short time they would even become friends, and the doctor was compelled to suffer this to proceed, for fear of offending one whom in his heart he despised. Evidently, whatever Marion had gained in her new life, she had lost those spiritual intuitions which had guided and guarded her in her previous existence.

As Drivet's power over Marion increased so also did his hold upon her adopted father. He professed to be making a more careful investigation as to Marion's antecedents, and little by little the truth came out that she had been Leon Renaud's wife. At first the doctor was not inclined to believe it; but one day Drivet took him to the cemetery and showed him the empty tomb. That was done to obtain more money, but this time the attempt was in vain.

Digitized by Google

She found him, quite by accident, in his studio.

The doctor, amazed and bewildered, hurried home, and for hours he paced the floor of his library in a frenzy of agony. He had not the least idea what he ought to do or even if her husband was alive. At last he went out into the open air. The sound of voices in the summer-house, as he strolled down the garden, attracted his attention. As he approached, unseen, he recognised the voices. They were Drivet's and Marion's. He listened. It was evidently a leave-taking. Were these two lovers? He peered through the thick vine-clusters and saw Drivet standing by the side of Marion with his arm about her waist, and heard him ask, as he looked pleadingly down upon her innocent, upturned face:

"Shall it be to-morrow, dearest?" was the question he put.

In a moment Dr. Marchand stood within the arbour. Before those cool, searching grey eyes Drivet winced, released his hold upon Marion's waist, and slunk away without one word. And she—she simply cast upon the recreant one look of scorn and infinite loathing. The serpent that just one moment ago had seemed so bold and beautiful with its shining crest, had resumed its natural habit and was revealed as a crawling thing. Apollo had turned coward and she hated him.

Turning to the doctor she fell powerless within his arms. She had been simply as a child in all this, free and guiltless. This second life which she had lived before the doctor and his wife, who had watched her as if she had been her own daughter, was as pure and holy as that of childhood, but also undisciplined, for it was a life in which all that was beautiful and strong called forth a frank and fearless response, but in which experience had furnished no principles for guidance and no test against disguised villainy.

His own influence over her and all the circumstances with which he had surrounded her had tended to the development of such a life and with just that one woeful deficiency. While he thought thus she lay prostrate and nerveless in his arms. Gradually she began to realise her father's presence; then her apathy gave way to convulsive sobbings.

"Oh, take me away, take me anywhere; I can't stay here!" she cried.

"Yes, darling, I'll take you away," he said kindly. "Do not be troubled; it was only a dream and it is all over now." And he carried her to her own room, where he left her in care of his wife.

Yes, he must go away—away from Drivet, away from that cenotaph in the cemetery, the tablet of which was photographed upon his memory for ever. In a few days Dr. Marchand had let his house, and, with his wife and the poor widowed girl, he embarked for the Cape. Two evenings later, as he was sitting near the rail on the upper deck, enjoying his cigar and congratulating himself upon his happy escape from the troubles which had lately beset him, he looked round, and at his side stood Ernest Drivet.

Foiled in his last hope, the doctor seized his protégée's tormentor round the waist and tried to throw him overboard. A struggle followed, which resulted fatally for both of the combatants. They went overboard, each grappling the other in a death-struggle.

A deafening shriek was heard from Marion's cabin, from the window of which she had witnessed the fatal termination of the conflict. She was found upon the floor of her room, apparently lifeless. Every effort was made to recover Drivet and Marchand, but in vain—both had evidently been drowned. For hours the girl remained in this trance-like swoon. When she awoke she did not recognise the doctor's wife. She did not understand where she was, but murmured: "Leon, oh, Leon, where are you?" She was now Marion Renaud again, and in her thoughts was back in Rose Cottage.

"I've been ill," she murmured. "Who are you, and where is Leon?" Gradually the woman who had been a mother to her communicated to her the events of the past two years, but Marion comprehended not one word. There was some dreadful mistake; she knew nothing of Dr. Marchand, or indeed of anything that was told her. Only yesterday, it seemed to her, she was nursing the poor sick people under the shadow of Worcester Cathedral.

It was long before she could be made to believe in a life of which consciousness gave no testimony.

. . . . . .

We need not follow in detail the search for her husband, which was continued during several years. She went to Paris, to Rome, and almost over the entire continent, to the East, and at last, when she had quite given up in despair, she one day found him, quite by accident, in his studio in Worcester.

Renaud dropped his pipe and brushes and rose to his feet, and there before him stood his long lost Marion. He had no time for astonishment, for her arms were in a moment clinging about his neck, while they laughed and cried all in one breath.

. . . . . .

Leon Renaud is still alive, and in spare moments from his paintings is preparing a grand philosophical treatise on the "Human Mind," and its power of retention, in which, as may be easily imagined, he considers that element of human life to have been very much overestimated in its importance, and at least in its connection with the more intricate and greater features of an existence.

THE MAN WHO CAUGHT A TARTAR.

IT is not often that I find myself within the precincts of a police court, but a short time ago, happening to be seized with a sudden and unaccountable curiosity, I wended my way toward one of those interesting buildings, and effected an entrance.

I say effected, because it was a matter of no little difficulty, the outer chamber being crammed to inconvenience with forty or fifty individuals, mostly women, two-thirds of whom seemed in the last stages of despondency, while the remainder afforded contrast by exhibiting a sort of unhealthy cheerfulness.

The police inspector on duty that day was an old acquaintance of mine, and upon noticing me, he immediately beckoned me into his office.

"There's a peculiar case just decided," he said; "one you might like to know something about. The fellow is discharged and will be coming out in a minute. Why, there he goes!" ejaculated the inspector, "that man in the corduroys."

The "man in the corduroys" had only just got into the street when I overtook him.

Digitized by Google

He was standing still, looking up and down the thoroughfare, apparently undecided what to do, all the time feeling in his trousers' pockets as though he had lost something. I divined his thoughts, and, accosting him quietly, said: "After the unpleasant proceedings just concluded, possibly a little light refreshment might be acceptable."

"Just what I was a-thinking, sir," he replied, smiling; "an' I was just a-feelin' to see if I'd got the price of a pint anywheres, but I find I'm quite broke."

"Never mind," I observed, and in less than a couple of minutes I had him comfortably seated behind a foaming tankard and a long pipe in an adjacent public-house.

He was a fine specimen of the British working man, tall and broad-shouldered, with a frank, open face—not at all one who could be judged as belonging to the criminal classes.

I was anxious to know what crime he could have been charged with, and I mildly inquired if it had been a matter of "assault and battery."

"No, sir," he said, "but it will be next time—that is, if I lay hold o' the chap that made a fool of me."

"Is it a long story?" I queried.

"Not very. Would you like to hear it, sir?"

I assented eagerly.

"Well, then," he began, taking a few preliminary pulls at his pipe and one drink at the tankard, "yer see I've been out o' work now for nigh two months, scarcely knowing which way to turn for a meal, and glad to pick up a sixpence when and where I can.

"Well, one mornin' I went out as usual—that would be just nine days ago—and found myself with only tuppence ha'penny over the West-end way, near Holland Park.

"No job was to be had that mornin', so, feeling rather down at heart, and desperately hungry, I turned into a little pub' for a bit o' bread and cheese and a drop o' beer.

"I hadn't been sittin' there long afore a short, stumpy gent, with no end o' watch-chain in front of him, comes sauntering in, and seats himself plump alongside o' me.

"I ought to 'ave felt flattered, no doubt, and perhaps I did a little bit, when he said presently, in a very pleasant way, 'Nice morning.'

"'Yes,' I said, 'it is for those in work, but the morning doesn't seem partikler nice to me.'

"'You're out o' work, eh?' he asked. 'Well, I might have guessed as much by your crestfallen expression. What would you say if I put a little job in your way?'

"'I should say God bless yer, and mean it,' I answered, pricking up my ears and looking full in the little gent's face.

"He looked at me, too, very hard, I thought, as if he were trying to read what was inside o' me and couldn't quite manage it.

"'I can trust you?' he asked.

"'Perfectly,' I said.

"'Now, look here,' he says, speaking quite confidential like, and in a very low voice, 'I'm a detective. To-night I'm going to have a good try to nab a fellow who has been fooling the police for the last three months. I've got first-rate reliable information, and with your assistance I believe I shall have him.'

"'But'—I was going to tell him I knew nothing about thief-taking, and that I was afraid I should only spoil the affair, when he stopped me.

"'No buts,' he said; 'I know what I'm about. You will be new to him. He knows all the plain-clothes men in London, but he won't know you. There's a big reward. If we catch him I'll come down handsome. What'll you drink?'

"I drank his health, listened while he went on talking by the yard, and telling me what I should have to do.

"He told me that the man he intended to catch was going to commit a burglary at a house in Holland Park—who informed him he didn't say, but he said he knew it—and that he meant nabbing him in the very act. The house stood in small grounds, and my part of the performance was to watch for the burglar, and should he by any means give the detective the slip, to chase and collar him if I could.

"'But s'pose,' I said, as soon as I could get a word in, 's'pose a bobby comes along and catches sight o' me in those grounds at midnight?'

"'Well,' the little gent replied, laughing, 'you've only to give the police signal, three loud whistles, and tell them Inspector Dawker has engaged you.'

"I was rather doubtful even then, but the little gent's quick tongue soon smoothed it over, and I agreed to go in for a share of the reward.

"We left the tavern together and parted just outside, promising to meet at the house in Holland Park at twelve o'clock the same night.

"He cautioned me again not to breathe a word about the arrangement, and further mentioned that when he met me at night he would be disguised.

"Twelve o'clock came. I reached the meeting place to time, and found the detective waiting for me.

"He was dressed in clothes something like my own, and looked the flash gentleman no longer.

"He seemed rather impatient, and hastily pulled me through the gates of the garden and into a part of it where thick shrubs grew, making a capital hiding-place, from which you could look up and down the road quite plainly without being spotted yourself.

"'Now, mind,' he said quickly, 'if you see the burglar run, chase him; if a policeman comes, three loud whistles. I must be off, or I shall lose my chance. I shall be back in an hour. If I want assistance I will give you the three whistles.'

"With these parting words the man disappeared.

"I stood waiting there for quite half an hour, I should think, when I heard on the still night air the heavy tramp of a constable.

"He was coming my way, I fancied, and I was right.

"Slowly he drew nearer and nearer, until he stopped right abreast o' the very place where I was hiding, close to the garden gate.

"He put his hand and tried the gate fastening. It opened; he came inside, and flashed his lantern full on the very bush behind which I was standin'. Quick as possible, I let go three very loud, shrill whistles, but instead of the policeman being awed by the sound he dashed at me and caught me by the throat, in about half a minute nearly choking me, and stopping me from explaining why I was there.

"Finding I didn't resist, he loosened his hold and questioned me.

"I told him plump and plain that Inspector Dawker had engaged me—that I was doing my duty, and that he had better not spoil game.

"He only gripped my arm the tighter and laughed, telling me not to 'try it on with him,' and blew his whistle.

"In a few minutes another constable arrived, and between the two of 'em, what with their laughing and their questions, I had a lively time of it.

"This was another of that Dawker's schemes, they said, and I was put down as an accomplice trying on the 'innocent humbug' with 'em.

"It was in vain I declared my innocence of any scheme besides that for the capture of a notorious burglar.

"It was no go. I was taken to the nearest police station and charged on suspicion.

"The next morning, when brought before the magistrate, I learnt, to my great surprise, that the man I thought was a detective was none other than the burglar he pretended to be after, and that, instead of trying to catch a criminal, he was robbing the house whilst I kept watch outside, and warned him by my loud whistles of the arrival of the police.

"I was remanded for inquiries to be made, and, they being found satisfactory, I was brought up again this morning and discharged.

"But I hope the fellow keeps out o' my path, for I shall certainly be brought up for assault or manslaughter if ever I clap hands on him."

Having replenished my companion's tankard, I left him apparently quite comfortable.

But I heard him mutter as I turned away, "Wait till I meet him—I'll give him Dawker!"

Digitized by Google

THE TOWN MARSHAL.

"THE most extraordinary man I met in America," said my uncle, "was a young fellow named Dee Anderson. He was a pitiable object, afflicted with disease, propped up in bed, gradually losing the bones of one leg, but never losing his spirits.

"A May morning with chattering squirrels and birds swelling their breasts with the impulses of praise was no brighter, no blither than he. In the winter, close housed, he cheerfully waited for spring, and when the first warm day came, he had his bed drawn near a window, and lying down there he would gaze far down into the orchard and revel in the beauties that nature spread out for him.

"I was a special favourite with him; and sometimes I used to take my revolver with me when I visited him, and lying, propped up at the window, he would shoot at something down in the orchard. Once he killed a hawk, and it did him so much good that I thought he would get well, but he didn't.

"Then I went back with my father to England, and for years I thought about that pale crippled boy, propped up at the window. I wrote to him, but he couldn't write, and I don't believe that any of his people could, either. Many years passed, and he gradually faded from my memory.

"Last time I went to the States I went down to Hackenville. I had lived near there when a boy. I was standing in a familiar street. Not a mark had been drawn to change the countenance of the old place. Not a fire had caused the putting up of a new building — moss-covered and venerable, it gave back to me my boyish fancy. I spoke to an old man. 'What ever became of Dee Anderson?' I asked.

"'Why, don't you know? Hah! I thought everybody knew.'

"'Dead, I suppose?'

"'What! Well, I reckon not. He's about the brightest man we've got. He's our town marshal.'

"'Oh, he got well, eh?'"

"'Well, mebby not from your standpoint. Yander he comes.'

"And there he did come, little, humped over, pale, walking on a stirrup and with a crutch.

"There was the town marshal, sure enough, and in a place, too, where men were wont to drink, and raise a row. How gladly he greeted me, and reached up and grasped my hand. I gave him a thoughtless grip and he writhed.

"'Come over and let's sit down and talk about old times,' said he. 'Do you recollect the time I killed the hawk? I knew then that there was a career mapped out for me—had been sorter low spirited that day, but when I pulled the trigger on that old rascal and tumbled him out of the tree, I knew that if ever I got out of that bed I would make a mark in the world; I didn't think, though, that I'd ever get to be marshal of this town. Don't walk fast; I can't keep up with you.'

"We went to the livery stable, sat down, and were talking when someone came up and said: 'Dee, Jim Blake is in town, and is raising trouble up on the square.'

"'That's so? Well, I must go down and see about him. Come with me.'

"I went along with him, and in his haste to reach the scene of disturbance, he stumbled and fell. I helped him up and brushed the dust off his coat. As we approached we saw a crowd on the square, and a man running past told us that Blake had shot at the sheriff.

"'Dee,' said I, 'you'd better not go. Here's a cart. Let me put you in it and send you out of town.'

"He looked at me reproachfully and said: 'I am the marshal of this place, and the marshal is expected to do his duty. Come on.'

"I had no wish to be shot at; I had no wish to meet Jim Blake, and I hung back. Dee hobbled on as fast as he could, and the crowd parted to let him pass. Jim Blake stood with a revolver in his hand. Dee approached him. And this is the talk that followed:

"'Hullo, Jim.'

"'Hullo, yourself.'

"'What are you plumbin' folk round here for, Jim?'

"'Oh, to keep 'em from plumbin' me.'

"'Well, but I'm the marshal of this town, and I don't want any plumbin' done here. It don't look right. Now, look here, Jim. You are a big, strong man, the gamest and the strongest man in this here neighbourhood, and nobody that's got any sense would try to take you by main force; but I believe you've got a good heart, Jim, and would do most anything to help an unfortunate fellow along.

"'Now, I am the marshal of this town, and they expect me to do my duty, and if I don't the City Council will fire me and mine. Don't you see how I'm fixed? Of course you do, because you are a sensible man, and a kind man, although you do shoot at folks once in a while. Jim, I'm going to ask you a favour, just to help me along, you know.

"'You just take my arm, now, and help me down to the jail as fast as you can. Don't you see, livin' depends on you right now? You know that I couldn't hurt you; why, I could scarcely hold a pistol, much less fire it. Take my arm, Jim.'

"He held out his arm, shrunken and withered. 'Take my arm, Jim.' And hang me if the fellow didn't take his arm and walk off towards the jail with him.

"'Don't walk too fast, Jim.'

"'Excuse me; I'm used to walkin' purty fast,' Jim replied, pulling up.

"I followed and caught them up just as they arrived at the jail, and I stood peeping in. 'I can't get this door unlocked,' said the marshal. 'Will you please unlock it, Jim?'

"Jim unlocked the door and stepped inside the cell, and then the marshal began again to fumble with the door. 'I can't lock it,' said he.

"'Let me lock it,' I called.

"Blake wheeled about, his eyes glaring with rage. 'Tech that door,' he said, 'and I'll kill you.'

"I didn't touch it.

"'Can't you git it locked?' Jim asked. 'Here, let me reach round and lock it for you.' And he thrust his hand through the bars of the iron-bound door, turned the key in the lock, and started to amuse himself by shooting at the flies on the wall.

"When I went back to the town an old man said to me: 'We haven't had very much trouble since Dee's been marshal, but before that we had a good deal. Four marshals have been killed here in the last six years, but Dee sorter appeals to a feller's pity and that is harder to git away with than a knife or a pistol.'"

"Don't walk too fast, Jim."

Digitized by Google

THE MADMAN

THE man began thus: "My name, Director, cannot be altogether unknown to you. I am Giuseppe Gabrini. Although still young—I am thirty-eight years old—my inventions have brought me, if I may venture to say so, a good deal of renown. Of course you have seen in the newspapers that an English syndicate has paid me £20,000 for my electric railway.

"These details simply serve to show you that I am not an ordinary man, and will, at the same time, make you understand the extent of the misfortune which has befallen me."

A pause, then he continued: "About seven years ago I married Clara Renandi, a charming girl of very good family. At that time I was a young engineer, unknown to fame, working hard, but earning little. There were moments when it was difficult to get on, but my wife encouraged and helped me in the struggle for existence.

"Thus two years went by. Then I succeeded in making the company for which I was working accept an invention of mine, a machine for extracting fossilised carbon by a new system. I was paid a very decent price for it.

"From that moment my means were almost comfortable, and I was able, therefore, to dedicate myself entirely to the study and development of my electric railway, which I had already been at work upon. From that instant I ought to have been perfectly happy, and, indeed, I thought that I was . . . . Alas! Fate had decreed otherwise.

"One day—take note of this, Director—one day, I, who for lack of time read so little, chanced to cast my eyes over the account of a most frightful deed. It was the story of a man—a labourer—who was suddenly seized with a mania for infanticide, and while under the influence of this horrible idea killed his three children. At first I was astonished, and really doubted the truth of the tale.

"But little by little it seemed to me less strange, and I began to look into the question, even reading books of specialists on the subject. For hours at a time my mind would dwell on the matter, and in spite of myself I found my brain perturbed by the mysterious problems of will, power, and desire.

"Two days later, while dining with my wife, and still absorbed in meditation, I began to handle my knife rather feverishly, thinking, as I did so, that it was with a weapon similar to this that the workman had murdered his children . . . . . I made a violent gesture . . . . . A sharp cry recalled me to myself. Clara showed me a long red scratch on her hand.

"'Are you crazy?' she exclaimed. 'See what you have done?'"

"I did not reply, but with increasing agitation looked at the hand which she held out, and at the drops of blood rising on the white skin. Oh, the fierce joy I felt when I saw that blood! . . . . . I was suddenly assailed by a wild desire to see more of it: to see it flowing in a stream . . . . . Oh, to hold a woman tight in one's grasp, push her down trembling and frightened, and while she weeps and cries for mercy, while she sobs and screams by turn, to drive a knife slowly into her bosom. Yes, that was what I wanted to do now. Kill a woman ——my wife!——This horrible idea took posession of me, wrote itself on my brain in letters of fire. Then began a terrible, almost savage battle within me, a struggle without cessation.

"I forced myself to care more and more for my adored Clara, but in vain. Finally—finally—how can I say it? This life has been going on for two months. Until to-day I had been able to control myself. But this morning the temptation was stronger than ever, and I decided to put an end to it once for all, so, with knife in hand, I entered my wife's room. She had just left it. Then, like a madman, I started to run, and came here to beg you to protect me from myself; to shut me up; put me in a strait-jacket even, if necessary; anything, oh, anything, to prevent my committing a crime."

The superintendent of the asylum, who had grown a trifle pale during the recital, touched the bell at his side, and, as an attendant appeared, said:

"It shall be as you desire, sir."

. . . . .

Very blonde, with sapphire blue eyes, and that delicate doll-like beauty so attractive in some women, she lay back in a chair, in an attitude of absolute repose, musing. As the silvery tones of the clock chimed the hour—three o'clock—Signora Gabrini turned her head slowly. She sighed, and her eyes sparkled.

Only a few minutes to wait now, and somebody she wanted very much to see would arrive—her last admirer. She had had many, but, in the various flirtations she carried on from time to time, no man had every attracted her as did this one; no, not even at that period—before he became insane, and was confined in a madhouse—when, her husband too much absorbed in scientific researches to pay much attention to her, she had sought diversion in this pastime—had she cared for any of the knights who danced attendance on her.

Digitized by Google

True, in those days her ardour might have been quelled a little by the fear, always, of rousing the latent jealousies in her husband's nature. It was not easy to judge what observations the engineer might be making outside his work, apparently so absorbing.

Unconscious how deep her liking was for this latest flame, and how dangerous it might become in view of her present lonely state, she found herself actually counting the minutes until he should be there.

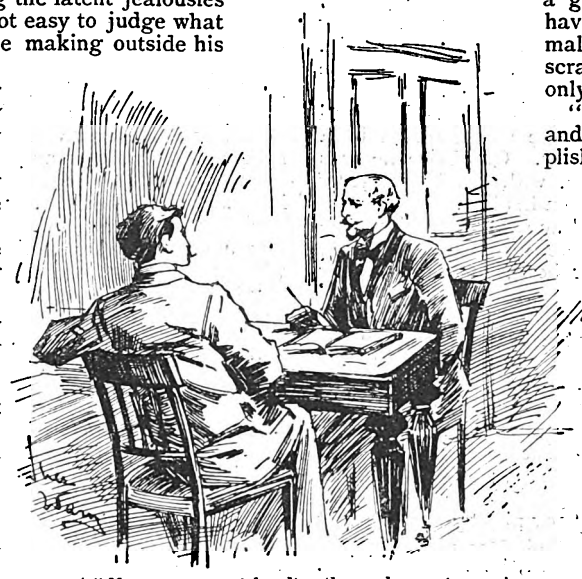
Suddenly she trembled—she heard footsteps in the adjoining room. At last! 'Twas he——

The door opened, and Signora Gabrini sprang to her feet, livid with terror. She gave a scream: "The madman!"

But Gabrini, very calm, almost smiling, said:

"You did not expect me, did you, madam? Pray calm yourself, however, I am no longer mad."

He drew a long breath, and then went on: "We have a great deal to say to each other—so, be seated. No one can disturb us. I have locked the door."



"My name cannot be altogether unknown to you."

Appalled, knowing herself to be perfectly helpless, however, she obeyed. He continued:

"I shall be brief. You know what difficulties I had to contend with at the beginning; what hand to hand struggles I had with poverty, and what an immense amount of work I had to accomplish before I succeeded in rising out of the obscurity in which I was vegetating.

"Notwithstanding the absorbing nature of my occupations and studies, I managed to steal as much time as possible from them to devote to you, I am convinced that I did my duty in this regard. But were you appreciative of my efforts, grateful for the attentions? No. Within two years after our marriage, not finding my devotion sufficient, you were encouraging admiration from another source, were carrying on a flirtation——"

She protested with a gesture, but he simply went on:

"Oh, it is useless for you to deny anything. I can prove the truth of my assertions. I have found letters, by chance, of course, and——any way, it is not necessary to go into details; suffice it to say, that I know exactly what your course has been. Harmless flirtations? Oh, no!

"You are naturally surprised that, knowing all this, I have maintained such an impassible demeanour, have kept silence so long. But what could I do? I did not wish my name, already growing famous, to become a byword for the public to scoff at, as must assuredly have been the case if my conjugal troubles were noised abroad, much less did I propose to furnish gossip for the newspapers.

"And again, I really hoped that you might stop all this nonsense——you see what a fool I was! I was ready to forgive you, to take you back to my heart at the first word of regret. I wanted to believe in you; but 'twas no use. You were frivolous to the core. Well, I had not strength of mind enough to rise above this daily torment—to shut my eyes to your continuous flirtations, carried on in my very presence. So I decided to put an end to the situation once for all, and it seemed to me that there was but one way to accomplish this, and that, to kill you."

Clara started from her chair with a cry of terror, but, seizing her by the wrists, he forced her back to her seat, and, his voice dry and hard, he added: "Kill you! Yes, this is the idea which has been formulating itself in my mind for a long time; but I wished to kill you without compromising myself in any way. I began by feigning insanity. Oh, I concocted some kind of a story, and they shut me up in the asylum, you know. Then, of course, I had to do a good deal of acting—pretending to have sudden and violent attacks of my malady, throwing myself on my keepers, scratching and biting them; but I was only waiting my chance to escape them.

"The occasion came about to-day, and here I am. My vengeance accomplished, I shall return to the madhouse. Doubtless I shall be tried for murder; but I shall be acquitted, and they will take me back to the asylum. I shall be kept there a year, perhaps five; then, when they see how docile, quiet, and calm I am, they will declare me cured, and I shall regain my liberty.

"Then, with no further obstacles in my way, no chains to bind or oppress me, and a tranquil spirit, I shall once more consecrate myself to study, to science."

He ceased. Clara, her breath laboured, her eyes staring at him in helpless terror, lay back in the chair, powerless to move. Finally, as he rose, tears began to flow from her eyes and down her pallid cheeks. Sobbing, she threw herself at his feet, imploring him, as she dragged herself along on her knees, to have pity on her.

* * * * * *

Giuseppe Gabrini was not prosecuted. He was declared irresponsible and shut up again in the asylum until cured. Dr. Leonardo Carbonelli, an eminent doctor, asked to have charge of his case.

His request was granted. The results obtained were simply stupendous. Gabrini, irritable and raging, suddenly became quiet and docile. He recovered his reason. When they spoke to him of his wife, whom he had killed, he wept bitterly. Two months later he was completely cured, and they hastened to give him back his freedom.

She threw herself at his feet.

Digitized by Google

A USEFUL OPPONENT.

I HEARD the street door bang, I heard someone coming up the stairs and I sprang to my feet listening. They were the steps of a man deep in thought or suffering pain. Had my presentiment come true? Ah! Those terrible presentiments which made my life a misery to me.

The door opened and Horace stood before me. I noticed his face was flushed and his brows were slightly bent in a visible effort to concentrate his thoughts. Otherwise he was the same as ever. Calm, deliberate, with the brightest of smiles and the cheeriest of greetings on his lips.

"How scared you look, little one," he said as he kissed me fondly and then crossed over to where the spirit case stood, by the side of the ice in the silver bowl, and the seltzer syphons.

I nodded.

He finished the brandy and soda at a draught, and busied himself compounding another.

"Frightened! What at?"

I went a step nearer, and lifted my eyes appealingly to him.

"It's always the same when you are away," I said, swallowing a sob. "Oh, Horace the risk is too great."

"Risk be hanged," he said carelessly; "there is no danger, little one, I promise you."

"There is danger," I persisted; "any night you might get murdered in the streets, or if luck should turn——"

"I shall take good care that it doesn't," he said quickly. "You don't think——"

He bit his lip, and I was half frightened at the change in him. "Don't think what?"

He laughed with an evident effort, and took a cigarette from his case.

"Why do you always look at the blackest side of things?" he said with a smile, ignoring the sentence he had left half unfinished.

"I try not to," I said gallantly, "but I would give anything if you would promise never to go to that wretched club again."

We were standing side by side on the hearth now. He did not answer at once. I took a bunch of fragrant violets from his button hole and arranged them in water.

"I would give up gambling to-morrow," he said half to himself, "only—only, don't you see, I can't."

I did not follow the unexpressed thoughts which clinched that argument, and I told him so.

"Women never can understand," he said petulantly.

"Men never know when they are well off," I retorted, stooping down to throw a log on the fire which made the smouldering embers leap into a sudden flame. "Surely you are rich enough now to——"

"Please you," he interrupted with a little laugh.

"And yourself too, most scornful one."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"I suppose I shall have to explain it all to you," he said, "and then you won't understand."

He pulled up an arm-chair to the fire, and I leaned over the back listening.

"You know as well as I do," he said, "that when I married you I had no visible means of support, although your people were labouring under the most delightful delusion that I was a millionaire and a catch in the matrimonial market worth more than passing attention. Therefore, when it came to setting up a house I had to make some money, which was something I had never taken the trouble to do before for fear of offending my tradesmen. They don't like it, you know, in these days, if you seem in a hurry to pay them. And money I made by playing cards, which is easy enough when you know——"

The peculiar expression which I had noticed once before that night flitted across his face and settled there.

"'When you know how,' I suppose you were going to say," I remarked, wondering why for a second time a sentence should have been begun only to be left unfinished.

"Yes," he answered, "in all games which combine chance with skill, the skill is bound to tell in the long run. With a cool hand and a level head the odds are in your favour, especially when you are playing against men with more money than brains and fonder of whisky than soda.

"My luck, as you have good reason to know, has been phenomenal. It accounts for the pretty dresses you wear; it accounts for the horses you drive; it accounts for all this luxurious furniture; it accounts for my balance at the bank. It has enabled me to keep you going in the best society, in the fashionable circles which surrounded you when you were born—destined to marry an earl at least if it had not been for the penniless adventurer who made such capital out of his good looks and charming manners——"

"Good looks and charming manners indeed," I said, thumping him on the shoulder. "Well, go on."

"That's all," he said.

"Well, and what is there to prevent you leaving off now without tempting providence any further?"

"Good gracious, child," he said quite angrily, "don't you see? The men in the club expect at least a chance of getting some of their money back. They——"

"I don't see the good of winning at all if you feel bound to go on playing till you lose."

"I don't intend to lose," he said quietly. "Winning back lost money is the most expensive game a gambler plays. It makes him demoralised and reckless. Besides, people grow suspicious of a man who gives up play before play gives him up. Society would have nothing to do with us were the ghost of a suspicion cast on my honesty by some blackguard at the club. The loss of society's smile would be nothing to me, but to you——"

Nothing to him, indeed!

"Horace——"

A neat parlour maid opened the door and brought in a note on a silver tray. It is unusual for notes to arrive at three o'clock in the morning, but Horace did not seem in the least surprised.

He took it, read it through quickly, then tore it into fragments and put it carefully, very carefully, in the fire.

He watched the flames leap upon them, he watched the blackened scraps of paper curl and break into a thousand pieces.

"Thank heaven," he said. Then he drew a deep breath of relief.

"I shall have to go out for half an hour," he remarked, getting up and holding out his coat for me to put on. He turned as he reached the door and kissed his hand. "Perhaps I shall manage to take your advice after all," he said with a smile, "only you must give me time."

I sprang to my feet, but he was gone. Then my pent up feelings, like all other pent up things, found an outlet, and I cried a little to myself, wondering at the secret trouble which was gnawing at my husband's heart. That look on his face haunted me all night and for many a long day after.

* * * * *

Lord Bury told me afterwards the end of the story, although he never guessed the truth. About a week must have passed since that nocturnal conversation with my husband, and Bury was standing at the window of the Leman Club talking with my brother Lacy. "Well, if you don't know who the fellow is I'm sure nobody else does," he said. Lacy had a reputation for knowing everybody in London. "I can't imagine how he ever came to be elected, or, rather, why we never blackballed him. There was a time when we were select at this club, at all events."

"He plays a confoundedly good game of cards," said my brother. He had an intense admiration for anyone who could make money.

"So much the worse," said Lord Bury, turning his pockets inside out with a comic gesture of despair. "He cleaned me out last night. One does not mind losing one's money to a fellow like Horace Linley, that lucky brother-in-law of yours, but when it comes to a cad like this man Balsam, or whatever the fellow's name is, it—well, you know what I mean. He's so confoundedly confident about his luck too. Swaggers about it all the time. By Jove, I would give anything to see him beaten—not that I have much left that is worth having, even at a gift."

Digitized by Google

"Horace is the only man who could give him points."

"And Linley won't play with the brute, small blame to him either——"

"Linley is going to play with him to-night."

Both the men turned, and found Sir Alfred Wastemen at their elbow.

"Don't you believe it," said Lacy, helping himself to a cigar from the newcomer's case, much to his disgust.

"It's a fact. One hundred games of ecarté at £100 a piece."

Lord Bury whistled.

"Horace refused to have anything to do with him last night; whereupon Balsam remarked—'And just as well too, if he wants to keep his reputation as the best player in the club,' which brought old Linley up to the scratch like the thoroughbred that he is."

"You don't mean to tell me the fellow had the cheek to say that." Lacy was tremendously shocked. He could not understand anyone being rude, even.

"He did though. Dinner at the Metropole, and then back here to see them play. What?" And the three young men, casting a look of unutterable disgust in the direction of the great leather chair in which the new member of the club sat reading his evening paper, went out into the roar of Piccadilly.

. . . . . .

The card-room of the Leman Club was crowded as it had never been crowded before that night. The news of the great contest had spread abroad, and more than one M.P. had deliberately denied himself the pleasure of hearing one of Chamberlain's speeches in the House to be there to see the sport.

Lacy and a group of his intimate friends stood just behind my husband's chair and Lord Bury was on the opposite side of the table.

The first game was won by Balsam, the second by Horace.

Balsam looked up as the last card was played. "What do you say to doubling the stakes at the end of each game?" he remarked. "I would rather treble them," said Horace. Lacy patted him on the back, but Bury, who was standing in front of him, noticed his lips tremble as they began the third deal. After that, hand after hand was played and my husband invariably lost.

Balsam's success came to him in spite of the fact that he was obviously playing haphazard and against all the canons of the game.

Horace was evidently puzzled. The more irrational his opponent's play the surer he seemed of winning his tricks.

It was at the end of the third game that something occurred which made Lord Bury raise his eyebrows. He looked across to Lacy. Sir Alfred, who was an exceedingly nervous man, turned white to the lips, and suddenly left the room. Balsam had been detected cheating.

The tenth game was in progress when Horace pushed back his chair. "These cards are marked," he said, quietly, "they must have been smuggled into the club with the connivance of one of the under servants—"

"It's a lie," Balsam hissed. He looked round the room hoping to find some support among the members and finding none he made a sudden movement towards the door.

In a moment Bury sprang at him and seized his wrists. "Not so fast, my friend," he said.

Lacy sent a waiter for a policeman, but my husband called the man back.

"Don't make an ass of yourself," he said; "whatever happens, let us avoid a scandal."

Then he turned to his opponent. "There's the door," he said, pointing with his hand. "Go." The other put his hand in his pocket and laid his winnings on the table, feeling like a whipped dog.

Horace took up a little packet of notes and handed it to him without a word. A murmur of approbation at his generosity ran round the room,

When the door was closed upon Balsam, and those who had witnessed the disgraceful episode had returned to the card-room, my husband begged to be allowed to say a word publicly.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I am going to act on impulse. From this moment, and in your presence, I swear solemnly never to touch a card again for the remainder of my life. Whether I am a fool for my pains or not will probably be a matter of dispute, but my mind is made up. I have never before seen cheating at cards, and never again will I, willingly, submit to such an experience. I am impelled to the course I am about to take, and I take it confident that I shall at least have your sympathy."

There were murmurs of applause, which were drowned in louder murmurs of surprise, and several men said openly that they considered Horace an idiot. However, it was admitted on all sides that my husband had conducted himself admirably.

. . . . . .

I never knew until the day of my husband's death the truth of the matter. As he lay dying, mourned by all fashionable London, and, above all, by the members of the Leman Club, he called me to him and told me the secret of his life. Ah, how shall I tell the rest?

My Horace, the husband whom I loved, who was more to me than all the world, was the most successful card-sharper of this or any other age. Balsam was his accomplice, and he used him most ingeniously to cover his retreat from the card tables, after he had become a millionaire. Not a soul ever suspected him or guessed the secret of his mysterious opponent.

Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

SUMMARY—Chapters I. to V.

The story is told by Violet (Letty) Lombard, who, at the opening, is living at Galveston, U.S.A. with her grandfather, Enos Lombard, Liz the coloured servant, Justina her old nurse, and her Aunt Marg, who has been the recipient of mysterious letters, post-marked New Orleans, necessitating a fortnight's absence from home. John Scott, who married Katherine, Violet's step-sister, a very beautiful girl, pays for Violet's board and lodging, and has just decided that she is to go to a convent in New Orleans. On the strength of information gained from the torn pieces of one of Aunt Marg's letters, and curious to solve their mystery, Violet so arranges that she goes to New Orleans a day earlier, and that she stops at the Hotel Gilbert. Through a crack in the wall, she sees what happens in the next room to hers. John Scott, Captain Dana—an old friend from Galveston—Aunt Marg, and others are sitting in judgment upon a Mexican, Antonio, who has, it transpires, assisted in the seizure of Scott's wife, and of Dana's wife and daughter, and whose terrible crime has been brought to light by Yara, a spy. Antonio is compelled to end his life by taking poison, with his dying words laying the blame upon one Xarras.

Letty goes to the convent in the morning, and during her schooldays there secretly meets James Gregory, who is introduced as the son of a friend of her grandfather's. On her way home again, some months later, with her chaperone Miss Wilson, Colonel Dean Gregory, James' brother, introduces himself.

* * * * *

CHAPTER VI.

When I look back on what I have written, I am tempted to write no more; for, though my picture of myself is a true one, it is hardly flattering. I do not care for goody-goody books, nor love in a cottage, nor dish-washing, nor acquaintance with food before it comes on the table, and most girls I know are like me. Besides, a girl of eighteen is rather a goose in this generation, not like our sober, decorous grandmothers, who married early, and began rearing families and growing old.

I wanted to be rich, and after the pleasure of companionship at school, the monotony of my cottage home was unbearable. Aunt Marg was so grave and silent; grandfather was always too tired to talk, and Liz was always fault-finding and disagreeable. Only one relief I had from everlasting sameness. I secured the position of a singer in the choir at church. I had long since ceased to worry myself about repaying John Scott.

"Someone should enjoy that money," I said, in a communistic way; "then he was Katherine's husband, almost a relation."

I hunted up beauté du diable, and, as near as I could make out, thought it flattered me. I looked at myself in the glass. A clear olive-skin, dark violet eyes, long-lashed and shaded by those odd shadows, a small nose and chin, one dimple in left cheek, and curly bronze hair that I wore in a little knot at the top of my head.

Jim says that I look like a thoroughbred. My feet and hands are small and well-shaped, and I carry myself well, when I am nicely dressed, as any woman does that is not a dowdy. We walked with books on our heads at the convent to make us straight.

No one from the mansion came near me for two weeks. Jim had not come home, and I fancied Mr. Scott did not care to see me any more than I did him; but the second Sunday when I sang in the choir, I saw Colonel Dean Gregory. When the minister preaches, I always look round—did you ever see a choir-singer pay any attention to the sermon?—and I study the new gowns and the people in them.

The colonel was in the pew with his mother and Mrs. Scott. Those two sisters always wear rustling silks and creepy crape; they make an everlasting funeral out of living. I looked very pretty, in a cream coloured muslin, a bunch of violets in my bosom for a bit of colour, and he was staring at me so steadfastly that I turned my head away with a look of cold admonition.

When I came out of church, he was waiting at the door, having put his relatives in their carriage; they keeping up the illusion of first mourners by sitting shrouded and silent.

"You are more charming than I dreamed," said the colonel "What a voice, and not one moment did your pretty face look the same. Even that scornful glance was irresistible."

"You must not talk to me," I said coolly; but, as the gossips were watching, I felt defiant.

"Why not?"

"I have promised not to speak to you," I said, and fled, but I wickedly dropped half my violets at his feet. I had been fingering my bouquet on purpose. He laughed, lifted his hat, and, when he passed me a moment later, he had some of my violets in his buttonhole. Now, why I did that I do not know; I must lay it to my grandmother.

Happier days followed, for Jim came home; and such a dandy he was, too; but grandfather called him a graceless drunkard.

"A young man must sow his wild oats," I said one evening, as grandfather and I sat in the porch. Jim had just gone by on horseback, and had driven grandfather to fury by taking off his hat to me.

"And a young woman, too, eh?" he grunted, taking his pipe out of his mouth, and fixing his beady blue eyes on me.

"No, women must be hypocrites, whited sepulchres."

"You won't make much of a success with that kind of a tomb, then," grinned grandfather. "But Katherine—now she was smart, and was—well, I won't say any more, but the only fair and square woman I ever saw is Margaret Collier."

"Your experience with our sex has been so unfortunate," I said.

"H'm"—and he gave me a deep look—"h'm, well, miss, there are not many men that have to be punished in a third generation by a living conscience walking about and being impudent. Women weren't ever finished in the making, they have no faculty of being trusted."

"You must trust Liz, for you send her with me to rehearsals."

"Old women are different. They can't be wicked if they would."

"If I wasn't watched like a cat I should be happier," I

Give you rope, Vi'let, and you'd hang yourself.

Digitized by Google

cried angrily. "I don't like these ways of spying. Girls should go out alone, and John Scott's slavedriver notions are obsolete."

"Give you rope, Vi'let, and you'd hang yourself," grunted grandfather, going down the steps to his rose bushes, his pets. He looked slowly at me, "I ain't so certain in my mind that you won't, anyway."

However, the monotony of this evening, with Aunt Marg in the porch, sitting looking out to sea and never saying a word, was broken by Bruce, Mrs. Scott's servant, bringing me a note; an invitation to dinner at the mansion on the following day. The carriage would call at half-past six. I accepted with pleasure and ran to my room in a whirl of delight. I opened my window wide and looked out. All of a sudden Galveston seemed the most delightful place on earth.

How plain he is in a bathing suit.

Perhaps all do not know that Galveston is an island, and I have heard that sometimes great storms cut it off from the world for days. Never a moment of life here, but the sound of the sea thrills you, gives strange fancies of far-away Pacific islands and coral reefs, an enchanted land beyond the blue horizon where the white sails go.

The city is so old, too, and so staid, with its fine old mansions, the oleander trees, the gnarled salt-cedar by the beach, and rare foreign shrubs brought home by old sea captains. The streets are paved with wooden blocks, and the horses' feet chime out a xylophonic melody with the sea. Our season is spring the year round, save now and then, when a norther comes with its frozen breath and chills us all. I call it a great moral wave.

And the flowers here, the violets and hyacinths, the magnolia and the jasmine, those passionate flowers with their white souls and fragrant breath, and roses red, roses of every kind and colour: white for a bride, pink for fair girls, Jacqueminot and Marechal Niel for the brunette daughters of the South.

And then the sea, the shining blue sea! How it rolls and plays upon the sand, and seethes and splashes, rises dark and thunderous, or coos so softly on a summer's day! And the beach! so many miles of hard smooth sand, where one may ride a horse to death and never realise the flight of time or distance.

Among all those old mansions, I like none so well as that big three-storied dark brick one, John Scott's home. It is so old, the trees have grown high above the wall that shuts it in from the vulgar gaze; vines have festooned the stone posts and peep over the rim of the wall, like little captive princesses eager to see the world.

But the garden, that I love most. It has so many pleasant paths; such wondrous flowers; such mases of roses along the shady walks; and so musical a fountain. It is replete with a dreamy delight where every sense is satisfied and all the noise outside sinks into the murmur of the sea; for the nineteenth century is far away from that enchanted land.

My home is down on the beach, near the sea, a tiny cottage set upon upright logs of wood, so that the waves may wash under. When people warn my grandfather for being so near the treacherous sea, he tells them he has been there for over thirty years, and in the great storm of years ago his home withstood the shock of wind and wave.

All along the beach are shanty bathing-houses, and I have one so far from the house that even Liz's sharp eyes cannot tell me from the other nondescript creatures disporting in the tide. I have a pretty bathing suit of blue and white, and I can swim well. In that sea, by the buoy, I have met Jim every day since he came home, when the weather permitted a plunge. Tuesday, the morning of my invitation, there he was waiting for me, blue and shivering.

I swam out to him. I like to go away beyond the buoy, for I hope a shark will get me or the undertow carry me out, and I picture quite tranquilly grandfather's remorse at calling me a living conscience, and Aunt Marg's misery because she never understood me before; though why my death would make my character any easier to comprehend I never thought out.

"Coming to-night?" called Jim, his teeth chattering. How plain he is in a bathing suit, and so cold and blue! "Been wait-ing a half-h-ou-r, it isn't fair to keep me here s-o l-o-o-ng."

"Couldn't help it. Aunt Marg was hanging about. You'd better go in. You'll get cramp and drown."

A big wave comes, and I lift myself away up on its crest and dive into the green wall of water. I love the sea; it is never rough with me. I could hug those waves or lie cradled in them as in a mother's arms. If I must come back to earth as a lower form of animal life, I want to be a fish—a slimy shark, so I cannot be eaten. Jim comes wobbling after me.

"Did-did you get-t-t the no-te? Got-Dean to send it. Ma said you wouldn't behave - told her you-you had re-formed."

"I won't go," I said indignantly.

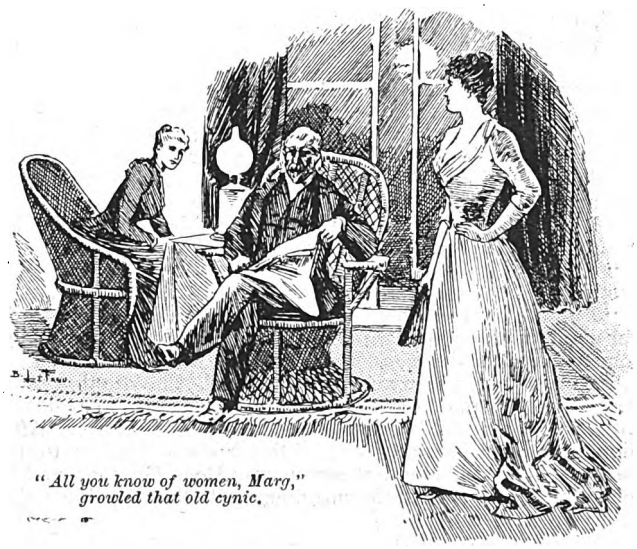
"Please, Letty," he chatters, and looked so funny that I laugh. I know well enough I would not miss that dinner for the world. Then finding he cannot stand the cold he swims to shore.

That night I looked my best in a a simple white wool gown with violets, and a meek look. I meant to show Mrs. Doctor Nathan Scott what a lady I was. Really, though, she had reason to dislike me. Jim and I once cut white eyes in one of her paintings, and made the people look like ghouls, and we put the skeleton we found in the garret in the best spare-room, where she found it when she went to see if the room was aired for the bishop, who was coming on a visit. I always wished he had been the one to find it.

"Do I look pretty, grandpa?" I asked, tripping down to show my finery.

"She does," cried Aunt Marg, who seldom praised me. "so innocent and good."

"All you know of women, Marg," growled that old cynic. "She is in her worst mood for mischief."



"All you know of women, Marg," growled that old cynic.

I can tell by Bruce's look, when he opens the carriage door, that I am very fine.

"Yo' changed a heap, Miss Vi'let," he says politely. He called me a "trifflin' brat" two years before.

I bowed haughtily, and swept up the steps. My gown is lined with silk throughout, for I cut up my second best silk to do it. I have taught myself to believe that John Scott ought to be grateful to be allowed to spend his money on such a perfect creature as Letty Lombard.

Digitized by Google

A maid took my hat and gloves, and ushered me into a stately room, with rare old paintings; bric-a-brac, gathered from the whole wide word; ebony furniture, upholstered in faded yellow satin; and a carpet as thick as they are ever made, a yellow ground with red roses: I used to think it grand. The room was dimly lit with wax candles. Mrs. Scott pretends she likes soft light best, but I know she wants to hide the ravages of time in her countenance.

She came in at that moment to meet me, a tiny woman, with microscopic hands, and rustling silk. She makes one think of crape. After her came Mrs. Gregory, angular and frigid. A tall, bony woman, with cold black eyes, and Pompadour hair. She always has jet trimming on her silk gown, and sheds beads everywhere. She could be tracked, as lost children are in fairy tales, when they take pebbles along to keep the path. She gave me a chilly hand, and a few beads rolled down my gown off her sleeve.

Mrs. Scott then, as if she had been fighting against her better nature, and the better nature conquered, came and kissed me. Her cheek, with its odour of powder, is like a crumpled rose-leaf; both old ladies are pretty liberal with cosmetics. Grandfather says Mrs. Gregory has not given up the hope of a second husband.

We engaged in a dreary and discreet conversation, wherein I found myself Johnsonian. My acquirements at the convent rolled easily off my tongue, awing poor Mrs. Scott, who likes simple novels in three volumes. Mrs. Gregory, to subdue me, dashed into the Greek philosophers. I remembered Dean Gregory's conversation with Miss Wilson, and proved a match for her, airing her teacher's pet theories as if I had acquired them myself.

"Your complexion is so perfect, Violet," interrupted poor Mrs. Scott, who does not like the Greeks, "and you are so careless of it."

"Perhaps," I said carelessly; "but it may be because I don't use powder; I think it ill-bred."

I flung that shot at them both, and it made them wince.

"But it is so necessary in this climate," sighed Mrs. Scott; and I thought of the bit of powder-laden chamois skin in my pocket and nearly laughed out loud.

"Do you think," ventured Mrs. Scott, "that she is like Katherine?"

"Not the slightest resemblance," answered Mrs. Gregory icily, and rose to meet other guests. I am so used to those remarks I heed them no more.

"What a witch you are," said Dean Gregory. He came quietly up to me, looking very handsome in his evening dress. "I listened to your talk." He sat down by me on the sofa, and I chatted away with him, forgetting my promise; but I grew tired of him. I hated the way he stared and some queer physical repulsion grew in me toward him. When Jim came I jumped up with a little cry of delight.

"I am 'nowhar' as they say here, beside my Adonis of a younger brother," laughed the colonel goodnaturedly.

"Are you in love with him?" Jim asked, watching his brother's retreating figure; "they all are."

"I don't believe I even like him," I said, and we stayed in our corner until dinner, where we had a place together behind some flower ornaments, and enjoyed ourselves. I watched the other guests eat, and made no mistakes. Jim drank a great deal of champagne, and I kept thinking of what grandfather said about him. Not very kind to my entertainer. After dinner we slipped softly out of the French window to the garden. The only one that saw us was Dean Gregory, and he looked at me with a hateful meaning smile that felt like a slap in my face.

CHAPTER VII.

Oh, that garden in the summer night, under the stars! Far off sounded the sea, hushed and slumbrous, and the music, dulled by distance, chimed sadly and softly through the trees.

"Don't speak to wake me, Jim," I said, and dropped his arm. I wandered on alone. I owned that lovely place; I was a captive princess in a far, tropic land. Over me a date palm thrust its graceful branches to the stars; beside me a banana shrub, here and there queer snaky palms, or great, quivering palm-fans; by the fountain, the marble Diana looking steadfastly for the moon, gleaming white like a sister spirit.

"Oh, Jim!" I cried, "if all this were mine! That lovely home and this."

"And a fine crib it would be," he growled, sitting on a bench lighting a cigar.

I left him in disgust. A pale little moon peeped over the tree-tops as I wandered on, and the music ceased. So wrapped in dreams I grew that suddenly I turned, afraid of my own thoughts, and ran hurriedly back to the bench guided by the red light from Jim's cigar. I sat down near him and he put my light wrap over me.

"Does smoking annoy you?" he said.

"How long ago was it, Jim, that you and I were rolling cigarettes at Justina's?"

"Don't. You are different now, Letty." A saucy answer came to my lips, but something checked me; then my mood changed.

"This is a night for dreams," I said softly, "not to talk of silly sins. Oh, that I were the lady of the manor!"

"Why should you not be?" he said hoarsely. "Listen. Years ago Doctor Scott got angry with Dean and left him out of his will, but directed that John should help him if he needed it, and do for other children if there were any. John has always been good to me, and now he has no heir but me, as Dean is rich. Scott will never marry again, so you see, Letty, this place will be mine some day. Scott's liable to be killed by a Mexican at any time—Dean said so. They hate him like poison in Mexico; there's a gang there, sworn to kill him."

"You must not talk so," I faltered.

"A cad like that can't enjoy money as we could," snarled Jim, throwing away his half-smoked cigar.

"We?" I echoed blindly.

"We! for I love you, Letty." He threw out his arm and drew me to him, and I, who slapped him once for trying to kiss me, said never a word. "It's queer, too," he went on, "for I have known you so long and know just what a spitfire you are; but I am going to marry you."

I think he meant it then, for his face was fond and loving, his voice tremulous, his eyes shining with admiration for me.

"You are so pretty; there's not a girl in Galveston anywhere near you."

I did not care for him, save as my one friend and fellow evil-doer. We sympathised with each other and got into the same scrapes all our young days, and now he was the only brightness in my dull life. He slipped a ring on my finger.

"You never asked if I—I liked you," I said crossly; "you seem pretty sure of me."

"Why not?" he laughed and kissed me, and I did not struggle. I looked at him keenly. He seemed very pale and good-looking in the moonlight, and because he was no longer plain to me I took it for granted I must care for him as girls do for lovers. "I think I do care for you," I said aloud; but added mentally, "because you don't appear so plain."

I rose, and went to the back of the bench, then I leaned over and laid my cheek against his. "Let me kiss you once, Jim," I said. "I never kissed a young man in my life." Then I ran to the house, the frou-frou of my gown following me like a ghost. By the hall mirror I saw I was looking radiantly pretty, Colonel Dean came to meet me.

"No one saw you go out," he said, glancing at my new ring that seemed to gather all the light in the hall in its diamond eye. "Jim must have been very entertaining." I ran past him and made my adieux. At the door of the cottage, after the carriage had gone, I saw Jim come out of the shadow.

"I had to see you once more, Letty," he said hoarsely; "only tell me you love me, and kiss me again. I would lay down my life for you." I pushed away his hand and ran into the house. Up in my own room I looked at my flushed face.

"The truth is, Letty Lombard," I muttered, "you don't like men at all, any of them; but can you live here all your days? Why not be a schemer and marry Jim and be rich some time. Here is your chance."

From that day I began a course of silly deceit that fills me now with shame. Jim being forbidden the house, I used to meet him outside; and there were notes, by queer and impudent messengers, and places and times of being with him that made the neighbours talk. Grandfather heard now and then of my having been with Jim, and how angry he was! and Aunt Marg was grieved and silent; Liz cross and rude. Truly I grew to hate them all. Once, in desperation, I asked grandfather why I should not marry Jim, and in a very fury he turned on me.

Digitized by Google

"You are a curse to an honest house," he cried; "ungrateful, selfish, heartless; but even then you shall not marry a Gregory while I am on this earth; I swear it. If you won't be ruled by your Aunt Marg's misery and my pleading, I'll watch you till the end of my life."

He and Liz never left me alone after that, and even my door was locked at night. Oh, had they told me then, or reasoned with me with kindness, I would not have gone on. Force made me defiant, unkindness drove me to frenzy, and so, one October night, I put on a dark gown, and with my black cloak and hood about me, sat by my window to wait. I had promised Jim to run away with him. It seemed as though Aunt Marg and grandfather would never go to bed, and even when she came upstairs she had to try my door and ask if I were asleep, but I would not answer.

Solemnly the old clock in the hall tolled midnight. Twelve sonorous strokes, echoing through the quiet house. I swung myself to the ground by the grape-vine over the back porch. It was a dim moonlit night, cloudy and threatening a storm; the sea was so high I had to creep close to the street above the sand. I drew my hood over my face when I heard voices, and slunk into the shadow of Justina's cottage, whither I was going.

"This is the house," said a voice, hollow and odd in the fog, and I dimly saw two spectral forms so near me I could have touched them. I fairly dug my nails into the wood of the house for fear they would see me. "She is to be here at twelve o'clock—an hour yet." Then I remembered, with a great sob in my throat, that our hall clock was out of order, and did not tell the time correctly. What had fate saved me from? "She is to run away with Jim, but he must not marry her. I have won him over."

"I can't see what you gain, Dean," said a strange voice.

"This is the house," said a voice, hollow and odd in the fog.

"Dr. Scott meant that I should have some of his property; but that canting sneak, John, beat me out of it. I know he told about that mulatto girl. You know the story. Well, John has a will now, leaving all his property to this girl, Katherine's sister. He doesn't like Jim, I can see that. If I can ruin the girl's chances, I am the only heir. He seems very friendly to me now, and if once the girl is out of the way I have a good show."

"He may marry."

"Never, his infatuation for the sainted Katherine stands in the way. That's why he leaves this sister his money. Egad, the girl out of the way, John may not live so long himself, only Mexican cowardice stands in the way and his vile luck."

"His cunning, you mean. He has the eye of a hawk and the wisdom of a serpent, and that steel hand besides. Not an easy man to kill, Dean. Egad! though if you are broke, there is a big stake to play for."

"You play the preacher to-night, for the girl may not fall into the trap unless she thinks it is all right. She's an odd one, half-bad, half-good, not handsome like Kate."

"A good thing there was only one Katherine," said the other, "for the morals of the community."

"She's smart, the little one though. Jim's wild over her, and I only won him by saying I'd tell Scott the whole story, and he knew John would never let him marry her against the old grandfather's consent."

They walked on, still talking. In a curious daze, I staggered past the cottage, out on the beach, and then I ran as fast as my feet could carry me straight away from the town. I heard nothing but the crashing of the sea. I saw only the grey fog closing in, and almost on the brink of a deep tide inlet I staggered and would have fallen in, but strong arms caught me and brought me to my feet.

"It's Letty," said a kindly voice, and there stood old Captain Dana holding me tight in work-hardened hands. "Aye, it is you, and I've watched for ye so long. Oh, Letty, it's a path straight to perdition."

The captain had aged terribly since that night at the Hotel Gilbert; grown bowed and shrunken, the light gone from his eyes, his whole bearing saddened and despairing. What were his dreams, if mine, an innocent looker-on, were haunted by that tortured Mexican, his defiant voice, his frightful death, and the poisoned wine dripping on to the floor?

"I was going to run away with Jim," I cried. I would never deceive again.

"Yet you seemed running away from Jim," he said dryly, "and I prayed ye would, an' I was sent here in time." I scarcely heard him, but went on and told what those two men had said. "We were to be married at Justina's by a minister," I sobbed.

"That Mexican cat," he muttered.

"It was me, Captain; she would shed her blood for me, she loves me so. Don't blame her."

"No minister would marry ye at twelve o'clock at night, at such a place, Letty," he went on kindly; "being so young and wild-like, you never thought of that. There's no good in the Gregory family, in the whole line. Their ancestors fought against the United States soldiers at the Alamo, and they were Americans too. There is a vein of treachery in the race; they can't be fair. Think of you, tied for life to a drunkard and a gambler, and willing to hurt you by a runaway like this. Oh, Letty, those meanderings of yours have borne fruit."

"What do you mean?" I asked, vaguely.

"Jest meanderings. Many's the night you've passed me out here when you've stole away from your innocent girl's bed to walk with him. And I've followed you close; for I says, 'Dana, you'd a daughter once, thank God now in happy death; think of her in this poor innocent child's place.' I knowed the Lombard spirit in you. I never told tales; I jest watched. If Enos had tried ye too fur, you'd growed desprit and flung yourself away. I daren't take the risk. I just waited for your sense to come.

"It's tired me to follow you, for you was strong and I'm old and lame; but I kept myself up, thinking of my dead Clarice. If I, with all the burden of my years and trouble, could save you, some of that I've been forced to do might be overlooked in the last account. Then I growed to care for ye. You was so innercent and childlike. Home may be trying, Letty, but it's safety and shelter, and you are kept pure and good there."

The night had grown brighter, for the clouds had blown seaward, and the moon, unobscured, threw a dazzling radiance on the dark rolling sea. Never did I feel such gratitude to a living creature as to that old man at my side. Far ahead I saw a spectral, shadowy figure.

"There is Jim," I cried, and my heart beat so fast I could not walk, but stood there in an agony of fear and shame, while he, seeing me, came rapidly toward us.

(To be continued next week.)

Digitized by Google

CUPID'S SERVITOR.

LIKE a batch of bread made with stale yeast—sodden and sour—was the face of Clymer Ames. He was the very last man you would have supposed to be the salaried servitor of Cupid. Yet, so fond of paradoxes is fate, that this man, who had eschewed Love, made his bread and butter by serving him. But, like all who wait on Love with interested motives, he received nothing but dross for his pains.

Yet every day from eight in the morning till five in the afternoon this man, who could have killed Eros for his perfidious conduct, was obliged to toil in his behalf. He was, in short, the clerk who issued the marriage licences.

When he first went into the service of the greatest of cosmopolitans, Cupid, he dedicated to him a very bad chirography, a totally uneducated perception, and an indefatigable industry.

In the course of a few weeks spent behind the little window in the county court's spacious apartments, the chirography of this young man began to improve. So did his perception.

He could tell when a man approached him whether he had family pride or not; whether or not he was sentimental and impatient; whether he was inclined for hymeneal display; whether he was happy or fearful; whether he was going to marry a woman of whom he was proud, or only one with whom he was in love.

Clymer Ames, who at first only saw the stage carpentering and scene-shifting in this drama of the emotions, began to wonder how it would look from the front.

He found himself getting very curious as to what a man did and said before—armed with the age, name, maternal and paternal parents' names of his bride—he came to ask for legal permission to be for ever happy.

It would be very easy, of course, for Clymer Ames to get that legal right. In his capacity of lover he could approach himself in his capacity as clerk, and without unnecessary embarrassment or hesitation ask for a licence, and get it.

To be sure, he could not well be on both sides of the window at once, and he had some doubt about the complete regularity of a licence granted under circumstances in which the applicant associated with such unseemly familiarity with his superior, the clerk.

This, however, was a difficulty which he felt could be overcome. But that was the fifth act. What led up to it? What did a lover do through the four preceding acts?

Clymer Ames determined to find out.

Lydia Eastwater lived in the next street to the one in which Clymer Ames boarded, and she came down to see the daughter of the landlady and play tennis with her on the lawn. Clymer, who had hitherto detested tennis, felt convinced as soon as he saw Lydia Eastwater that exercise was the only thing for him after office hours.

"It must be dull staying in the house all day this hot weather," said Lydia Eastwater one night when they stood together on the same side of the tennis net.

"It's dull enough. But nothing to what it used to be, you know. I have something to look forward to now."

"Have you?" said Lydia Eastwater innocently.

"It's the tennis in the evenings I look forward to. It brightens up my whole day. Don't you care for it, too?"

"Me?" ejaculated Lydia, with ungrammatical nonchalance. "Oh, yes, I like tennis well enough. I wish, though, that these people would come back and go on playing."

She flirted out one foot as she talked, and revealed a marvellous stocking. Clymer wondered if the twenty-two fellows who had that day applied to him for the sanction of the law to their bliss had experienced such difficulties in the first act—he felt himself to be nearing the end of that part of the drama.

If Lydia Eastwater would only show some sign, however slight, that her heart throbbed as his did he would be willing to have the curtain drawn down for the entr'acte and let the orchestra play a while.

"It is not because I play tennis that I am happy," he cried explosively, "but because I play tennis with you."

"Oh," cried Miss Eastwater, as she re-tied the yellow bow on her hat; "isn't it too bad, then, that I am going away to-morrow for the rest of the summer!"

Going for the rest of the summer! Clymer was sure none of those twenty-two men, with licences in their pockets, had ever known such suffering as this. He leaned against a tree. He could not remember feeling so strange since that day he fainted in the office, after being up all night with the poor clerk who had the rheumatic fever.

"Then you are not sorry to go?" he whispered. "You will not miss me?"

Lydia Eastwater tied the yellow bow once more. It was growing into a deeper twilight. The one bar of red in the west was all that was left of the day. She hit at a moth that fluttered by in the dusk.

"Why, yes, I shall care. I shall care very much indeed." She looked straight at him, and the red in the west got into her cheeks. Clymer leaned forward, throbbing with a new life. He forgot all about the first act, and even about the fifth one. All he saw was a girl's eyes; all he felt was her soft lips.

Then the other players came walking across the lawn in the twilight, and the next day Miss Eastwater went away.

Clymer wrote to her, of course. He stole the time in which to do this from the service of his county. But the answers were not just what he had expected they would be.

They were full of pleasant gossiping and even of the expressions of those girlish opinions which most young maidens hold, and which so strongly resemble copybook mottoes. But she said very little of just the sort of thing that Clymer desired her to say. He consoled himself by looking at every applicant for a licence who thrust his face in at the little window, and reflecting:

"Ah, my man, you look happy now. But I know what you have been through. You may not believe it, but I myself have experienced the rapture of the first act, and am now in the midst of the perplexities which are so necessary to the progress of the play. My dear fellow, take this form, with my blessing. It looks very commonplace, perhaps, to the uninitiated; but you and I are perfectly aware that it is the passport to heaven."

None of these remarks were audible, of course. They were combined soliloquies of Clymer the lover and Clymer the clerk.

One day a stranger entered the office, a fine young fellow with a handsome face and a swinging walk.

"Man of importance, of property, of temper, and enthusiasm," said the clerk to himself, after his usual manner of summing up customers.

"I want a marriage licence," said the young man gaily and peremptorily.

"Name?" said the clerk, trying to be perfunctory, but actually throbbing with sympathy with this happy young animal.

"Alfred Sydney Johnson Clayton."

"Name of lady?"

"Lydia Ernestine Westwater."

The clerk went on filling out the rest of the form, and did not move a muscle. The lover—but there was no lover except the young man who went out, swinging his shoulders as he went.

And so the face of Cupid's servitor became, as was mentioned at first, like a batch of bread made from stale yeast. And though he works for Love, he and his clerk do not speak when they meet, and the capricious boy has ever been seen to fold his wings closer about him with an air of contempt when he looks at Clymer Ames, clerk of the court, and the issues of marriage licences.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Six Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A FIRST-CLASS COMBINATION

INDUSTRY and intelligence make a first-class combination. But it is rare. A lazy fellow who is inventive and intelligent often accomplishes more than an industrial fool. In the infancy of the steam engine a boy was set to let the steam into the ends of the cylinder alternately, by hand. He found it a boresome task, and so invented a way to make the engine wait on itself. His method has been in use ever since - the principle of the "eccentric" motion. "What do you mix your paints with to produce those wonderful colours?" asked somebody of Sir Joshua Reynolds. "With brains," curtly answered the great artist.

This is a big idea, and it has to do with everything under the sun. Here, for instance, is the case of a man who spent a whole summer in bed when he might just as well have been on his feet looking after his business and having odds and ends of pleasure on evenings and holidays.

Along in the spring of 1889 he took a chill; exactly the time of year to take chills if you don't watch out, and often if you do. Well, immediately afterwards a dreadful pain struck into both his hips and legs. The result of this was that he had to go to bed, and he stayed there sixteen weeks. Just think of that! Fancy it a problem in arithmetic—a child's simple "sum" to be worked out on a slate. Add the pain, the trouble and worry to his family, the direct extra expenses, the loss of time and income, the loss of the summer's enjoyments, the doctor's bills, etc., etc.—and see what it tots up at.

The first doctor who attended him said he had sciatica, and had it very bad. The doctor was either right or wrong. If he was right the result showed that he didn't know how to cure sciatica. If he was wrong it showed that he couldn't diagnose a disease from its symptoms. Put it how you will, he might have been an industrious, hard-working man, but lacked something of being a proper doctor. Well, he gave up the case, and Mr. Dawson (our suffering friend's name) sent for another. This one blistered him and painted him with iodine from his waist to his feet. By this time Mr. Dawson was unable to get out of bed or to dress himself without assistance.

The doctors' medicines and applications failing to help him he went to the hospital at Buxton, where he was advised to try the baths. After being there three weeks he returned home but little better for the treatment.

The conclusion of this exasperating experience is set forth in a few words by Mr. Dawson himself in a letter from which the abovementioned facts are taken.

"I had," he says, "little or no use of my legs, and it was wholly out of my power to attend to my business. I lost a deal of sleep in consequence of the pain, and owing to a want of appetite and necessary nourishment I grew very weak. Even after leaving my bed, if I went out for a breath of fresh air, I had to stop and rest every few yards. I was so broken and helpless that my wife and others who saw me thought I never should get about again. In this condition I remained until January, 1891, when I read of cases like mine having been cured by Seigel's Syrup. Persuaded by the clearness and evident sincerity of the reasoning, I began taking the Syrup, and soon found relief. My legs had more power, and the pain gradually subsided, until it ceased altogether, and I could go about as I did before I was taken ill. If I had only known of this remedy and used it sooner, I should have been saved suffering and heavy doctors' bills. You can publish this statement if you think it will be of use to others. Yours truly (signed), Harrison Dawson, Heap Bridge, Bury, April 27th, 1893."

Our friend's inference is perfectly logical as to the advantage he would have derived from an earlier knowledge of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup; as his ailment—acute rheumatism—arose from the poison generated by a torpid digestion and a clogged liver, for which the Syrup is a specific. His doctors laboured hard to cure him, no doubt, but without an understanding of the cause of his condition. Blind men may walk, but are apt to walk in circles. The remedy that succeeds where others fail is a product of industry and intelligence.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 289.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 14, 1894. [Price One Penny.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS.

4/- EACH. LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. 4/- EACH.

THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY SIZED ROOM. These carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.

GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says: "unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our Customers:

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.

M. Lock writes:—"I received the Carpets, Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.

Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. Hargreaves.

Established 1872. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY,

31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE

FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 289.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 14, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

CHAPTER I.

I HAPPENED to be detained for a time in a small and exceedingly tumble-down old town in Germany.

The place of which I speak is little better than a large village, though in deference to the feelings of its worthy inhabitants, who consider it, no doubt, as the "hub of the universe," I have dignified it with the appellation of town, and it lies quite out of the ordinary run of tourists, high and dry above the restless ebb and flow of the great excursional ocean.

Dummelsheim lies in one of the loveliest of the many lovely green valleys which run like tongues of verdure between the pine-clad heights and crags of the Black Forest.

It is set down on a small patch of tableland, above which rise some wonderful shapes of crag and pine forest, and below which a little mountain stream rushes frantically night and day, raging and tearing its little life out among the great boulders and between the fern-clad banks, yearning to obliterate itself in the nearest river that offers a refuge.

I happened to be detained in this place by special business for a whole fortnight.

A fortnight in Dummelsheim, with nothing to do, represents about five years of ordinary existence in length and tedium.

I explored the lovely valley, not without feeling the charm of its peace and isolation; I drank, as in duty bound, very many tumblers of the peculiarly nauseous spa water, of which the Dummelsheimers are so unreasonably proud; and then time began to hang heavily on my hands.

There was no gaming table, no theatre, no concert-hall.

At last I discovered a diversion. It came in the shape of a compatriot, a resident compatriot. Not that in appearance or garb he was much of an Englishman. Twenty years' residence in Dummelsheim had made him as much a German as the Germans, and had quite obliterated the handiwork of the good old land that gave him birth.

He had all but forgotten his mother speech, and when he endeavoured to use it his sentences were patched together by the Teutonic words and phrases which came most readily to his tongue. He was as regardless of his personal appearance as the most inborn of the Dummelsheimers, and as devoted to the consumption of tobacco as the best of them.

It was supposed that he was a bachelor. At any rate, of "womankind" he had none, and lived alone with merely the intermittent aid of a supernaturally hideous frau at those times when scouring and cleansing became a bitter necessity.

It was in a café that I first met with him. I thought when I first saw him, "What a dreadful shaggy old German that is; no one could mistake his nationality, at any rate."

He seemed to be a part and parcel of the green, mouldy place, a sort of human lichen, an animated fungus on two short and sturdy legs.

However, a compatriot is a compatriot, and if one has to scrape the dirt from his countenance in order to recognise him, the operation must be gone through for the sake of the dear land of our fathers.

My German Englishman proved, as a companion, decidedly more entertaining than one would have expected from his looks, and in his morning rambles with me pointed out, with great care, what he knew of the antiquities of the little town; showed me a wood where one of the Dummelsheimers had once, in a fit of playfulness, applied a hatchet to the back hair of his betrothed, and also the gaol in front of which he was afterward hanged as a punishment for his little escapade.

Many other spots of interest, where incidents of a less tragic though still striking character had occurred, were also designated by his kindly walking-stick as we strolled along.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

After a day or so my newly-found friend began to resume his native speech, so long disused, and by that time I also had learned to translate into ordinary English his quaint and puzzling Anglo-German expressions.

So we managed to get on very well together, and I found him an interesting, if a slightly dirty old man. The town, when explained by such a cicerone, was invested with quite a new charm of interest.

It was quaint enough without any extraneous help, and the houses, being for the most part ancient timbered edifices, and the gables leaning forward with age and hanging over the streets, one obtained every now and again a street vista of delicious picturesqueness, in which the ancient houses, nodding toward each other, seemed to be whispering forgotten piquant scandal of the good old German days.

There were at every turn and corner abundant "bits," which an artist for an illustrated paper would have found very handy, and sketches which he could have rapidly converted into current coin of the realm.

I am no artist, but, to my great surprise, I discovered that my dear and dirty new-found acquaintance and countryman was. One day, having accompanied him to the queer and humble lodging which he inhabited, I found on the walls certain indubitable proofs of his artistic bent.

There were many admirable sketches in chalk and sepia of striking points in the valley, and of certain buildings and objects in the town itself.

The fountain in the market place was there, with its great St. Christopher as its centre figure. There were the porch of St. Christopher's Church, the quaint turret at the angle of the town hall, and the crumbling ruins of an ancient fortress on the Ganzberg. Among other things I noticed a sketch of a certain picturesque old house which I had indeed seen, but the locality of which I did not remember at the time.

I mentioned this fact.

"Ah, I have never shown you that! It is in the Lederstrasse," he replied. "We will see the place to-morrow."

On the morrow, accordingly, we walked together to the Lederstrasse.

As we entered the dirty old street my companion remarked, "I have never been in this street for twenty years or more, and I never wish to enter it again."

My curiosity was roused.

"Why?" I inquired.

"I got so great a fright here once, and I was so much laughed at," he answered.

"Why, what is there about this street to frighten you? It is old enough, certainly, and quaint enough, and smells rather—pah!" I exclaimed, as a full flavoured German stench saluted my nostrils; "but nothing terrible after all."

"Well, mein Herr, it is not the street; it is that house, and—the ghost in it," the Anglo-German replied, with a sort of shudder, so to speak, in his voice.

"Oh, oh! then you have not lived long enough yet, and you are not quite a boy, to get rid of your superstitions, eh? You are still afraid of ghosts, are you?"

A supernaturally hideous frau.

"I was afraid of what I saw," he replied, with a certain amount of dignity, as if hurt by my light manner and my tones of mockery.

My curiosity was of course aroused by this speech, and I was about to question him further when, pointing with his stick, he said briefly:

"That's the house there."

A sketch of a certain picturesque old house.

I looked and recognised in the ancient timbered edifice on the farther side of the street the original of the chalk sketch of his lodgings.

It was a tumbledown pile, with overhanging storeys and carved "barge board," having, however, a curiously twisted chimney of ancient, ruddy brickwork, and certain obscure remains of armorial bearings over the door. There was a date which, however, I could only make out in its state of dilapidation to be fifteen—and something or other.

The edifice seemed to have been long deserted, and the grass was growing in tufts among the stones at the front door as if the passers-by had long been accustomed to avoid a too near acquaintance with the old tenement.

Indeed, something about the building said as plainly as the German version of Tom Hood's poem could have said:

"The house is haunted."

Nay, the very street itself seemed to be haunted. It was in a great part deserted. The tumbledown buildings on either side of the picturesque house seemed to be devoid of occupants, and the few sordid and wretched houses in the street which appeared to enjoy the presence of tenants had, to my imagination, and in the gathering dusk of evening, a scared and terrified aspect.

"Look well at that window," said my conductor, pointing to a large, battered casement just above the door, "and when we go I will tell you what I know about it. That will do," he continued, taking hold of my arm; "you have seen it, and it is not good to stay in the street; it chills the blood, I imagine."

"Indeed it does," I replied, and we moved off, not, I fancy, without a thrill of pleasure at leaving behind us the ghostly atmosphere of the Lederstrasse. A few crows, flitting inhabitants of the desolate street, were wheeling about the roofs and chimneys of the house as we departed.

CHAPTER II.

I went with my acquaintance back to his lodging, and there, over a plentiful supply of lager beer and the smoke of two big pipes, he told me his experience of the house and street we had quitted.

"Twenty years ago—I was rather younger then, I fancy; I mean not in years merely, but in life and hopes—I had recently come to this town, and before I was long in it I heard a great deal of talk about a queer ghost, quite unlike any ghost I had ever heard or read of, which was said to haunt the Lederstrasse, and which the people of the town so much dreaded.

"Hans Hubbler, down the Granzstrasse, had seen it when a boy, and old Frau Hertzler had all but died from fright when she was sixteen years old in consequence of a mere glimpse of it. It was the celebrity of the little town.

Digitized by Google

"Well, I laughed at all the stories, and grew very courageous over the matter in my café when the night grew late and the bottle was low. Some of the fellows there tried to chaff me on the score of my nationality. 'Ein Englander,' they said, 'always asserts that he will brave anything—dog or fiend or fraulein—but let him be set to the test and he is not always so brave as a lion.' Then one of them said:

"'This Herr Englander here, he has heard enough and is brave, but let him face a test we will give him if he be a brave Englander, and we shall see.'

"So one night in the Restaurant Kloppart, in the milk market—I remember well that night. Ach, mein Herr, is that door fast? So! I remember that night. I was fired with courage, and I said, when they spoke of the ghost, that I would face it, come what might.

"A grin of incredulity passed over the countenance of my listeners, and they puffed away at their pipes in contemptuous silence. At last big-boned Krantz Hubscher, the butcher, made me a bet that I would not sleep for one night in the old house in the Lederstrasse alone.

"'Done!' I cried, and the money was staked, not much, a few louis, and I was pledged to an adventure.

"It struck me afterwards that a great number of the ghost stories I had myself read turned upon some unused house or room and an undertaking to sleep there; but further than this you will see, my case had little resemblance to any other spectral adventure. Nor did this render my case less real or less terrifying.

"'What sort of a ghost is it?' I asked. 'Tell me just that, so that I may know what kind of an appearance I am about to face.'

"'Ach hein!' they said, 'mein Herr must just see him as he is, and enjoy him as he will.'

"So the night was fixed upon and the key of the ancient house procured. A mattress and some candles, and also a pistol (at my request), were taken into the biggest and best room—that one just over the doorway. A good bottle of Zeltinger and a supper for me were got ready, and a roaring fire of big logs was built up in the afternoon in the fireplace there.

"The people living in the Lederstrasse were much astonished and a good deal interested at the unwonted glare in the windows of the haunted house; and, when they were informed of the reason of the illumination, expressed a good deal of pity for the mad Englishman whose craze had tempted him to brave the ghost of the locality.

"Night came—a dark night it was, in November, with windy gusts every now and again sweeping down the street and among the crazy old chimneys. There was a pale, gibbous moon that showed itself at intervals from between the drifting clouds in a very weird and uncanny fashion.

"'Just the night for a ghost story,' I said to myself, and thought, as I felt a little thrill come over me, 'Shall I pay the small debt and have done with the matter? Shall I cry off and smoke my pipe at home and turn into my bed at my usual hour in peace?'

"'No!' I decided, after some consideration, 'I will go through with my undertaking now, come what may, and show these Germans what an Englishman can do, and will do, at need.'

"So I made all my preparations for my adventure, and about ten o'clock entered the house with two or three friends, who had resolved to accompany me in order that they might see me comfortably disposed of.

"Stay a bit," I said to myself.

"The crazy old stairs creaked a good deal as we went up them, but the room looked exceedingly cosy, for the great logs were smouldering in the chimney, and cast out an agreeable heat. In all the corners, and hanging from the beams, were many dingy cobwebs, the work of generations of spiders, undeterred from their toil by the house's evil reputation.

"Save these cobwebs, my mattress, a couple of chairs, and a small round table, upon which stood my supper and the good bottle of Zeltinger, the room was unfurnished.

"As a further aid to courage I had provided myself with a flask of eau de vie, and, of course, had my pipe.

"My friends, having cast an approving glance round the room, sat down smoking for a few minutes, and then bade me 'guten abend' and 'gute nacht,' and left me to my meditations.

"I listened to their heavy boots as they went stump, stump, stump down the stairs, and to the street door as it shut to with a bang.

"I was alone in the house of evil repute.

"'Stay a bit,' I said to myself; 'this is perhaps a joke, a trick, and it will be with the living Germans that I may have to deal. Well, the pistol will give an account of them; but I will make myself as safe as I can.'

"So I took from my pocket a screwdriver and a paper of big screws, and with a quiet smile at my own cunning—for of these screws I had said nothing to any one—proceeded forthwith to screw up the door.

"The door made fast, I walked round the room and carefully took stock of it. There was a small corner cupboard. I opened this; nothing there but spiders, their webs, and the carcases of their victims.

"On the other side of the fireplace was a very low door, about the height of my shoulder. Another cupboard, I thought, and endeavoured, for a long time without success, to prise it open. When at last it yielded, I discovered, with some surprise, a step, and another low door, evidently strongly nailed up, and which, from its appearance, had been for ages in the same condition.

"This discovery gave me for the moment a turn. 'What a strange thing,' I said to myself, 'a passage leading to somewhere; just like these haunted chambers usually have. However, I will take good care that no one makes use of this passage to-night, at any rate.'

"And so closing the low door I proceeded to make it fast with some more of my great screws. As I did so and was driving the screws home I felt a queer sensation from my right hand to my elbow, something like a faint electric shock; 'pressed on the nerve somehow,' I said, and continued my work.

"This done, I had my supper, lit my pipe, and drank the half of my wine. The chimes of St. Christopher's tower startled me sounding the hour of eleven. I was, however, in a peaceful frame of mind, without the least fear of anything human or superhuman, and I gazed placidly at the red smouldering logs and puffed my pipe in peace.

"Suddenly, however, the fact that the hour of midnight would soon approach gave me a little shiver. I quickly quenched the feeling with a drop of my eau de vie.

"Nevertheless, I thought, there is no use in sitting thus. I may as well go to bed, then I shall, without doubt, fall asleep, know nothing till to-morrow morning, and be able to go home with flying colours.

"Accordingly I prepared for rest, and as I can never sleep well with my clothes on, pulled off all my attire with the exception of my shirt, took a final drink of the eau de vie, laid ready my pistol, and lay down upon my mattress, drawing a single blanket over me.

Digitized by Google

"I lay with my feet turned toward the glowing embers, which diffused grateful heat and gave sufficient light to enable me to discern the objects—such as they were—in the chamber after I had extinguished my candle. The feeling of security, born of the fact that I had securely screwed up the only two doors which opened into the room, did its work, and in a very little time I fell asleep.

"I cannot tell how long I slept. All I know is that I seemed to wake up from a feeling of cold, as if someone were blowing upon me with a pair of bellows. I rubbed my eyes, remembered where I was, and experienced a slight feeling of unhappiness to find that the night had not passed over and that I was still in the haunted chamber.

"The fire was all but dead, the moon, as I could see through the uncurtained window, seemed to be plunging her way among great banks and masses of cloud, the room was fitfully lighted here and there with a strange twilight of moon and fire.

"Somehow my eyes fixed themselves on the low door by the side of the hearth. Could it be possible? Was that door opening? No; impossible! I had screwed it up far too tight for that.

"Yes; something strange was taking place. Whether the door was opening or something was coming through it I could not tell; but I felt that a change was taking place, and sat up in my bed in silent terror, with that peculiar sensation in my body which persons of an imaginative disposition are pleased to call 'goose-flesh.'

"Fixing my gaze firmly upon that mysterious door, I sat and watched it. Little by little the aspect of the door changed. It became white, bleached as it were, and then, to my intense horror, a something seemed to pass through it and to stand in front of it.

"Yes; that something gradually assumed shape and proportion. I could see the head, the body, the arms—the form was that of a man. Then, while my hair stood up right upon my head with terror, I noticed its stern, wan face, its costume of a long bygone age, its lean and withered arms and its attenuated legs. Could it be a man in the flesh? No, clearly no, for I could see through it and discern that the little door at the back of it was fast screwed up as I had left it. This was no man in whom was the breath of life, a phantom, a form, a show, merely an image, and how inexpressibly ghastly and terrific.

"When I had fully realised this fact I became a prey to the most abject terror. It was true, then, about the ghost! It was no trick, no joke, that I was to be subjected to, but before me was a supernatural shape for the first time in my life.

"I became seized with a species of fascination as well as by terror; I gazed fixedly at the appearance, covered as it was by a strange, unearthly light.

"It was the figure of a tall, lean man, for it had by degrees risen far above the height of the low door from which it had emerged.

"Its eyes were fixed upon me, and over one of its arms it carried a number of dark objects, the shape of which I could not make out.

"But, horror of horrors! it was quietly nearing my bed.

"I arose at once and stood erect, trembling in every limb. In vain I tried to speak; my lips refused to utter a word. I could only stare fixedly and in silence at the strange, glittering figure. The form, doubtless it was, of some creature who had walked in the streets of Dummelsheim in the flesh and lived in this house some 150 years ago, still haunting, in its ancient shape, the well-known spots.

"The spectre advanced and I retreated before it, holding out my arms as if to ward it off.

"I never thought of using my pistol save at one moment, but the fact that the figure was transparent at once convinced me that to fire at it would be of no avail.

"Still the terrible shape approached with a silent, noiseless stride; then, on reaching the middle of the room, it seemed to motion me with one of its arms towards the chair.

"I hesitated. Its actions became imperative, and I was constrained to obey. Once seated, the spectre, which appeared to have acquired a perfect control over my paralysed senses, took something from over its left arm, and signed to me to stretch out my leg. I did so mechanically—and then—how can I convey to you the feeling that came over me as it proceeded to pull what seemed to be a stocking of ice upon my left leg?

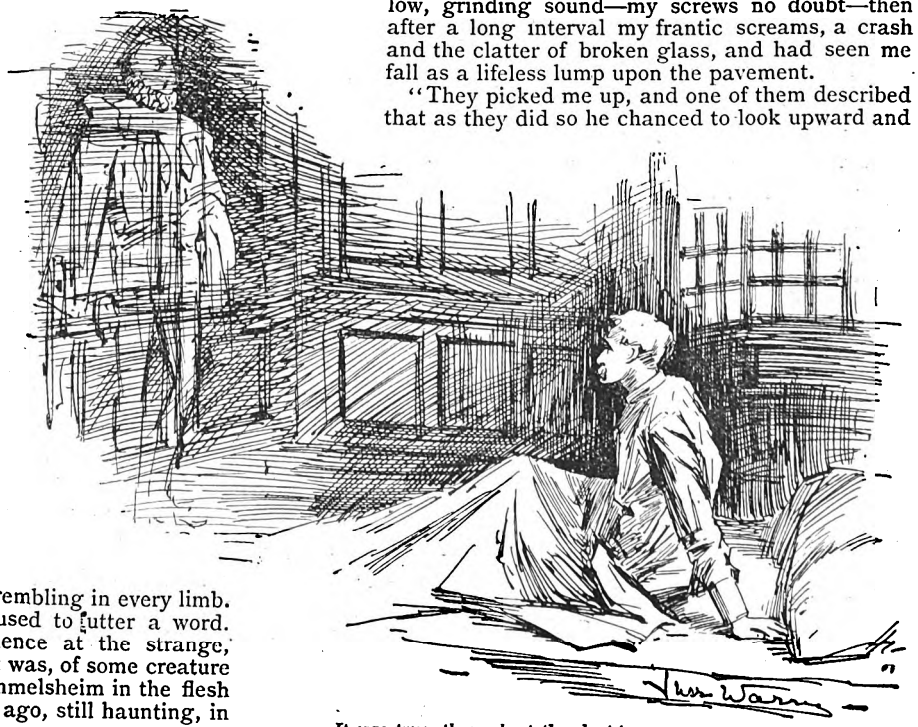
"I can even now at times feel the horrible icy coldness of that spectral hose. It was a stocking that the figure was pulling upon my bare leg and foot. It was chilled to the very bone, my hair bristled, my head swam, my heart ceased to beat for a moment; higher and higher crept the ice cold stocking upon my leg. The stocking was on. This accomplished, the spectre motioned me to stretch out the other leg.

"My horror now fairly broke the spell that chained me. I fled to the door, the spectre glided after me smoothly and silently as a fate. I seized the handle of the door—miserable! I remembered that I had fastened myself in with the ghost. My reason seemed to be escaping me. The steel-like glitter of the spectre's eyes was fixed upon me. Like a hunted and doomed animal I fled round the apartment. I leaped at the window, crashed through it, and fell into the street below.

"I must have lost consciousness at once, for the next thing I remember was lying on my bed in my own lodgings, with my good landlady and the acquaintances who had dared me to the terrible trial standing round my bed.

"It was said for some time after that the poor Englander was going mad, as all the others who had seen the ghost of Lederstrasse had done. I cheated them however. My head was too strong, I suppose, for I got over my fright, and after my broken leg had been set, could listen to their recital of what had taken place. I learned that those who had set themselves to watch in the street had heard first a strange, low, grinding sound—my screws no doubt—then after a long interval my frantic screams, a crash and the clatter of broken glass, and had seen me fall as a lifeless lump upon the pavement.

"They picked me up, and one of them described that as they did so he chanced to look upward and



It was true, then, about the ghost!

Digitized by Google

saw at the broken window above, in the moonlight, a pale, shadowy face and the glitter of two bright eyes.

"It is not strange to say my right leg was broken by the fall; but it is, I think, somewhat strange to relate that my left was blackened to the knees as if scorched, nay, it is so to this day—see!"

My friend showed me his blackened leg.

"And that is all?" I asked.

"All, lieber, Himmel! Is not that enough? Can you wonder after what I have told you that I don't like the Lederstrasse?"

"Wonder, not I! I would not go near the place again after dark for a grand duke's ransom. But who do they say the spectre was?"

"I don't quite know. There is a legend of some hosier who once lived in that house and was rich, who fell into some disgrace, and the reigning duke of Saxe-Dummelsheim seized upon him, and with a refinement in cruelty, in order to extort from him his money, caused him to be put to a torture something in the manner of our ancient machine called 'the boot,' which crushed the leg of the victim.

"In this case the instrument was a hose of steel, which was at the onset icy cold and was then heated by fire to almost a red heat. The poor hosier sank under the dreadful torture.

"It is said that his ghost now seeks to avenge itself upon all who approach his ancient abode, and that he tries on them his ghastly hose; if he succeeds in getting both hose on their legs they die and his spirit is released from its wanderings."

Such was the case of the queer old Anglo-German. I went to my inn and to bed; there I lay and pondered long upon the strange story I had heard. My sleep, when sleep came, was not of the best. Every now and again I awoke with a start and a shudder, and fancied that a ghostly hosier was pulling upon my own legs the spectral hose of the story.

A day or two passed by, and one night, as I was packing my portmanteau for my homeward journey on the morrow, I was startled by a great yellow light in the sky. Soon after I heard the hoarse and blatant voice of the alarm bell. I dressed and went out, and found the whole population of the place running in one direction.

I followed the stream of folk. It was a fire, someone told me, in the Lederstrasse; the haunted house was burning down. We arrived in the ancient narrow street; the sight was magnificent; the whole building was enveloped in flames. No one took the slightest trouble or endeavoured to get the flames under control. All were staring and gaping in idle curiosity.

"It was a bad place," someone said, "and we are well content to see it perish."

How or by whom the fire was kindled I never knew.

THE ADVENTURES OF A MATRIMONIAL AD.

THE Roseton News was not a great paper. It did not subscribe to the Association, nor did it have a special correspondent in Fleet Street. Ofttimes the shears vied with the editorial pencil in filling out its columns.

It had but one reporter, yet a more energetic, irrepressible, self-satisfied penman than Fred Stokes seldom existed. In a dearth of news, or amid the pleasant lethargy of good times, he could fall back upon the reportorial imagination, evolving from airy nothings a succession of rumours and prognostications with an unfailing shrewdness that verged upon, yet never overstepped, the dim line of probability.

When not chasing the festive item, or cornering an elusive sensation, he would assist his editorial chief in the latter's more onerous task. He would concoct poetic and taking advertisements; extract the pith of some great London editor's opinions on the "burning issues" of the day; and all this in addition to other multifarious duties.

Often would the editor remove his cigar, elevate his legs, and, as the blue smoke curled upward, reward his satellite with a jovial nod of approval and say—

"Fred, me boy, next to mesilf, the News would be lost without ye."

The editor's ancestral fluid was of an Irish tincture, and a slight suspicion of brogue often intruded itself upon his tongue when the editor grew interested.

"I'm indebted to ye, and if ever ye get into a toight place, call upon your chief. Gratitude, me son—a—ahem! Here's that account of young Shurtleff's marriage. Terrible swell affair that; we must shove it in the third column—editorial page—and be hanged to it!"

"Look here, sir," said Fred, after one of these pleasant interjectional colloquies with his chief, "here's a matrimonial ad. in the Daily Post for a wife: 'Wealthy Cuban'—rich—presumably unsophisticated—'wants to Anglicise himself, and as a preliminary step he wants an English wife. She must be young, handsome, refined, and so on. Money not essential. Address, Zanaga, Box Q.K., Daily Post office, in confidence.' I believe I'll answer it—huge joke, you see."

Here the editor looked dubious. "Perhaps we can work up something stunning out of this for the News. Who knows?"

The editor brightened enthusiastically.

"Roight you are," said he. "But it will take exceedingly adroit manipulation, me boy."

Fred considered the matter, and then indicted a modest reply in a flowing feminine hand, signing himself (the deceitful rascal) "Miss Nellie Jardine." The editor read it with admiration.

"A roight tender and circumspect rejoinder. It wouldn't surprise me, now, if ye weren't a born novelist, after all."

So Sammis was given a tip. Fred posted his letter, then carelessly waited further developments. In due time came a reply. Our Cuban expressed his surprise and pleasure at hearing so assuringly from Miss Nellie Jardine, and said that, out of a score of answers, hers was the one that pleased him most.

She alone, he continued with tropical ardour, was the one woman for him. He felt it, his heart told him so, and thus on, through several pages of blind infatuity. He concluded by hoping, praying, imploring that she would at once reply and exchange photographs with her adoring slave.

"Bedad, sir," said the editor, "you are in for it. I behold already the consummation. Ye'll be donning petticoats next, and the reportorial department of the News will feel an aching void, that is, when you're off to visit this Cuban in London, me boy."

Several letters on either side were sent and photographs exchanged, Fred sending that of an extremely pretty girl he had met at the seaside one summer. He was beginning, however, to tire of the tender monotony, when, one day, he laid upon the editor's desk a neat package, which, on being opened, disclosed a pair of earrings and a brooch set with garnet and pearls. The editor examined them critically. Fred seemed more dismayed than amused.

"They're worth a hundred guineas, me boy—if they're genuine. What does the fellow say about them?"

"Why, it's a present, he says, and hints of more to come, and that we must arrange for a meeting, all this with the wildest protestations of eternal love and fidelity. Hang it! This is getting serious. I never thought the fool would go so far."

Digitized by Google

"Write him that the sudden death of one of your uncles, cousins, or aunts, calls you off to the Continent instantly, me boy. Hint of great riches falling your way, of a family mystery imposing silence. Tell him to possess his soul in patience, and that he will hear from you in a month or so. Then you can return his confounded jewellery and break up the affair—somehow—anyhow."

The editor felt himself sagacious, yet his conclusion was misty, too misty it seemed, when, two days later, Fred rushed into the sanctum with an open letter in his hand, his eyes dilated and his hair dishevelled. "Sir," he said, "I'm ruined, devastated. I must leave, obliterate myself, and the News will have to get another man. Read that."

He dashed the letter down upon the desk and fell to gnawing his nails nervously. The editor looked up wonderingly, then read the note. After a few passionate, devotional interjections, it wound up by stating that this fond lover would run down to Roseton on the following Friday to see his "adored one," his "queen."

"Isn't this something like a predicament?" exclaimed Fred, as his chief sat tapping the arm of the editorial chair with his blue pencil, and his eyes fixed reflectingly upon his assistant. "Can you make me an advance of £10 or so? I'll get Meigs to take my place and flee to some pathless wilderness for a while, until this infatuated foreigner recovers his reason."

"Fred, me boy," said the editor sagely, "I know a trick worth two of that. Write me a touching obituary notice of Miss Nellie Jardine's very sudden demise. A congestive chill, spinal meningitis; anything of that sort will do. We'll just insert that little notice and have one copy struck off.

"Have it marked and sent to that poor fool of a Cuban, together with the jewellery he has sent, and, presto, me boy! you are out of the whole affair in no time. We won't need Meigs then; he's a dunderhead, and you can still go on with your work."

Fred, though at first doubtful, fell in with this idea, and the programme was fully carried out.

The announcement, beginning, "Sudden death of an estimable young lady," was really quite pathetic, and so tickled Fred's fancy that his nervousness vanished as Wednesday and Thursday passed. He became so absorbed in other things that when on Friday, a wild-eyed, haggard, foreign-looking man burst into the sanctum with a paper in his hand, Fred looked up serenely, then recognised, with an appalling thrill, that it was the Cuban from the photograph the latter had sent.

The editor had just gone out to take some liquid refreshment with a big advertiser and a political candidate, and probably would not be back for half an hour. Fred realised that he had to face his own particular lion alone.

"Roosviele News—ees it here?" asked the stranger in a sombre tone.

"Well—a—I'm not so sure." Fred hesitated whether to frankly own up or ignominiously flee.

"E—et must be. I was so told. Señor—have you see zat?"

He pointed to the notice in the paper he held, and watched Fred anxiously.

"Zat—zat——" his voice was profoundly melancholy. "Oh, señor! I am desolate—I am inconsolable. I no one know I here. Will you—so kindly—to take me to the grave? Her last resting place, señor?"

Fred here suddenly felt an inspiration that lent him a glimpse of rescue. Only two days before, in the little cemetery, a new grave had been made. A member of a family little known and recently arrived at Roseton, had died and been there.

Why not take the man there, and leave him alone with his sorrow? Then Fred could have a little time to devise some method of escaping from him. He arose with an amiable and sympathetic smile.

"Certainly, sir," he said, reaching for his hat. "Come with me. It was a most melancholy event, and as you seem interested, I see no harm in showing you the grave of our esteemed young townswoman."

The stranger grasped Fred's hand, wrung it feverishly and prepared to follow him. He called in the office boy and then the two men sallied forth down a back street. Fred did not wish to meet acquaintances just then. After a while they came out on a pleasant road that led to the cemetery. Arriving there, he pointed out the way to the grave.

"No trouble in finding it, sir, it's the only new one. You will want to be alone, and—should you wish to leave a place connected with such sad memories at once, there's a London train at four-fifteen. Good-day."

Fred was off like a rocket, half determined to pack his worldly goods and go to see his mother, whom he had not visited for two years. But, on his return to the office, the editor was awaiting him with a telegram in hand.

"Look here," said his chief. "I've got to leave you in five minutes. There's a plot on foot to unseat Jones, and he and I have got to run up to town and see about it. I'll be back in two days; not a word now, I trust you as I do mesilf. You can run things. Where's my overcoat?"

So the editor departed with a rush, giving Fred hardly time to open his mouth. He felt desperate. That mad and melancholy Cuban would be back, asking troublesome questions, and anyone might drop in. He shuddered at the thought of the direful possibilities ahead.

But the afternoon wore off, and the Cuban did not return. Fred breathed easier; perhaps the fellow had really taken the train. When he locked up the office and started upon his evening walk, his fears had flown.

He felt exultant, and also pitied good-humouredly the wild-eyed foreigner and his imaginary woes.

He turned down a grassy lane, near which stood a house seclusively sheltered by shrubberies and trees. From the front gate a man and woman came forth, and walked toward him arm in arm. His fears suddenly revived as he recognised his Cuban again.

The other was a lovely lady in deep mourning. Imagine his surprise when the man greeted him joyfully, ecstatically, all his former dejection gone, and his face wreathed in smiles.

"Ah, my friend," said the Cuban, "you have saved my life and restored my happiness. Señor, I cannot tell how much to you I owe. You send me to that grave, and there what do I find? I see there alive and well, my old, old love, from whom I long separate for years. I forget my new grief. I go there sad, I come away rejoicing, and to you, señor, I owe all of zat—yes—all—all."

Explanations ensued, during which the Cuban eagerly introduced his companion. It appeared that years before, in Cuba, he wooed and won the daughter of a prominent patriot leader of the island. After a time, a price was set upon that chieftain's head by the Spanish authorities and he and his family suddenly disappeared, while our Cuban was away in foreign parts on business. On the latter's return, he could find no trace of them, and after months of fruitless waiting, he gave up all hope of ever again seeing his affianced.

Years passed. He came to England and began to think of marriage again. Hence the advertisement and the cruel practical joke that had, after all, resulted so happily. The grave to which Fred had sent him was really that of a brother of the lady now by his side. He met her there, in tears over her own family bereavement.

They recognised each other. She had remained true to him, and she was his first love. Their grief was changed into joy, and he went home with her. The strange family spoken of was hers, and for political reasons they were living in England under an assumed name.

They had renewed their troth, and, in his happiness, the mystery of Miss Nellie Jardine was not again alluded to by him. Perhaps he had not wanted his first sweetheart to know. Fred himself was only too glad to drop the subject. He left them well on towards the seventh heaven, but learned in a few days that the whole family, together with the Cuban, had left Roseton for parts unknown.

"'Twas a very queer little episode," said the editor, upon his return. "But I can't see that it brings any grist to the News, unless ye write it all up. Ye owe the paper that much, me boy, and me too, bedad."

Digitized by Google

A CONTEST OF WITS.

THE village of Aygalades is pretty enough on week-days, but it is on Sundays that it is seen at its best. Nestled, as you know, on a mountain slope close to Marseilles, placed neither too high nor too low, looking out over the sea without actually being on its border, it appears from a distance to be buried in a mass of small trees, which quite overshadow it.

You would suppose, I am quite sure, that the people of this quiet corner of the earth, with their lovely sky, their sunshine, and their famous fish soup, would have no great ambition for talking politics. Yet they do, the foolish fellows! And it was precisely about a matter of politics they were discussing one fine Sunday—some question concerning Society at large—as they were seated face to face at one of the tables in Mother Germanos' arbour, that the two oldest friends in Aygalades—friends of thirty years' standing, neither more nor less, Joséphin the postman, and stout Josué, the farmer of Ile-aux-Cébes—almost came to blows, so that it was necessary to separate them after one of those terrible Southern disputes in which the combatants become enemies for life, never speaking to each other or visiting each other again.

Strong language had been used.

"Canaille!" Josué had said.

"Old villain!" the postman had retorted.

You will say that every day in political disputes things like these may be said between old friends, such as they were. Perhaps so. But on Sunday! And before all the people who were there! That settled it. Without another word, without a gesture, the farmer set out for Ile-aux-Cébes.

Then between these two men there began one of those half-concealed, but implacable warfares that are much like the gentle fine rain which falls almost imperceptibly and silently in winter at Aygalades (and, perhaps, elsewhere), and which, little by little, without one's noticing it, in the end soaks one to the bone. Every day, in his tiresome round through the forest, Joséphin stopped, sometimes at one house, sometimes at another. People would give him drink and engage him in talk. Naturally, the constant subject of discussion was his quarrel with the farmer, and once his glass of wine finished, there were always execrations and heavy blows of the fist on the table, always the same evil predictions. "He will end his days in the penitentiary; he will never die in his own bed!"

The farmer, on his part, did not rush about from place to place, but in his thick peasant head he evolved a very neat means of avenging himself on his former friend.

This Ile-aux-Cébes, where he occasionally lived, is quite out of the world—at least six or seven miles from Aygalades. It is—once you get there—a pleasant enough corner of the country to look at, with its tilled land, its vineyards rising row upon row upon the hillside, and above all its cébes (edible mushrooms), such as you can find nowhere else. But to get there at all over the stony mountain paths is by no means an easy matter. This the farmer knew very well, but it was in this way that he expected to worry his former friend Joséphin.

The next day after their combat, abandoning his little château at Aygalades, he went to live for good and all at Ile-aux-Cébes, and every day he arranged to have sent to him by a friend in Marseilles a package or a letter—no matter what, even a blank paper in an envelope—so as to compel the unhappy postman to make that terrible trip, and to add those six miles in the sun and dust to the fatigue already sustained by his wearied limbs.

Joséphin was altogether too proud to complain; he did not flinch. Heaven knows, notwithstanding, what rage was in his heart. Not only this terrible fatigue every day, but, besides that, the jeers of the country people that he felt sure were being uttered all around him—for in a village like this people are not over-delicate, and the fine joke which the farmer had evolved struck everybody as highly amusing—all this was bad enough, but what was worst of all for Joséphin was to hear, when toward noon he arrived at Ile-aux-Cébes, and stood enduring the jeering looks of the farm hands coming up to their dinner, the deep voice of his former friend, Josué, crying mockingly to his servant-maid:

"Here! run downstairs, Annette; I think there is some mail for us again."

As long as the fine weather lasted, the postman stood it pretty well; but when cold weather began, and the paths were covered with frost, the poor wretch could hardly endure it any longer, and when one morning he slipped on the rocks, wet with the dew, and almost fell into a ravine, he determined to beg for mercy—not from his enemy, you may be sure, but from his official chief in the postal service, who, moved by his complaint, and recognising that this six mile's walk daily evidently constituted an extra and supplementary duty, gave him his choice of having an assistant granted him to make the trips to Ile-aux-Cébes, or of himself receiving forty sous by way of indemnity every time he had to take a letter to the farmer.

Joséphin did not hesitate; he chose the forty sous. He did this not so much from the love of gain, as you might suppose, but because he was resolved on revenge—and it certainly was a fine revenge that he had. When it became known in the country round about that his trip to Ile-aux-Cébes brought him in forty sous additional, there was a general admiration of the postman's cleverness; and public opinion, so easy to shift from side to side, now made sport of the stout old farmer. "Decidedly," people said, "Joséphin is the more cunning of the two."

And this he proved still better a few days afterward, when Josué, who was quite crushed, suppressed his daily letters from Marseilles, naturally supposing that he would thus cut off the supplies from his enemy. For Joséphin, by one of those strokes of genius which down in that country seem born with people, subscribed in the farmer's name to a little Marseilles newspaper, and every day carried a copy of it to Ile-aux-Cébes, thus continuing to gain his indemnity of forty sous in spite of his enemy. Now, indeed, Joséphin was regarded as a great man.

And, really it was a sight worthy of the gods to see him trotting steadily along the road with his most deliberate gait, whistling as he went, and describing circles in the air with his hollywood walking-stick. And when he arrived at the little entrance to the farm, still as before at the hour of noon, and in the presence of the same farm hands whose mocking looks were now turned toward their employer, he would in his turn cry out—

"Here! Just run down here a minute, Annette. I think there is some mail for you again."

There was no reason why this should not continue indefinitely; and, in fact, if I may believe Mariù, of the inn in the lower town, whose story I am faithfully transcribing, the great quarrel did last all summer and all winter. It was only in the spring time that they concluded peace, one clear April day when there was nothing but good in the air. It was very simple, very touching. The stout Josué in time had become interested in the paper which came to him in this odd way every day; so he would go down to look for it himself. The postman usually threw it on a table. This particular morning, without thinking, he handed it to the farmer. Their hands touched.

"Joséphin!"

"Josué!"

And since then you may see them both, as I have—a good deal older, to be sure, for this tale is already one of the distant past—again engaged on the square before the church in their games of bowling, and highly respected at Aygalades, and all the country through, because they were clever enough to gain through their quarrel—the one a paper that cost him nothing, the other forty sous a day from the Government; for I need not tell you that the paper continues to arrive every day, and that also every day Joséphin takes it to the farm.

But now Josué comes half way to meet him, and the two friends arrive at Ile-aux-Cébes tranquilly reading together the serial story in the paper, and comfortably seated in the farmer's carriage; while at the house the old servant Annette, and the farm hands—now full of respect for both—await them with the still smoking fish soup ready on the table.

Digitized by Google

The Hairless Tiger.

"WHAT do you think of him?"

"Horrible!"

"Is he not a beauty?"

"Ugh! A look at those white, glassy eyes is enough to make one's blood turn to ice. Whatever possessed you to have such a monster mounted?"

Colonel Bob Downing laughed at my plainly expressed horror of the terrible beast he had set up in his smoking-room—a creature more repulsive even than in life, because of the taxidermist's faithful reproduction of a most suggestively ferocious and cruel expression on the face of the stuffed animal.

"I had him set up there, Taylor, because of the associations," said Colonel Downing finally. "But for the Great Jhoot Demon I should have still been knocking about the world a confirmed bachelor instead of being comfortably settled here in London with the nicest little wife that ever man had."

"You told me there was an interesting story connected with your marriage," I observed.

"It is interesting and highly dramatic," he went on. "Light your cigar and take that easy chair, so that you can keep the monster in view. It'll be a realistic aid to your imagination as my history of how I won Mrs. Downing develops itself. Now make yourself as comfortable as possible."

I adopted his suggestion, and never in my life did I listen to a story with such interest.

Every word thrilled me, and I could well imagine myself an actor in the whole drama, and fancy that the lifeless beast within touch of my hand was alive and again the murderous demon of an Indian jungle.

Just before the Colonel began, I noticed that a small monkey, which had before escaped my attention, was perched among the limbs of a dwarf tree in front of the demon, that the taxidermist had used to give his subject a more lifelike pose.

I realised that the monkey was part of the picture, for its grinning face was turned toward the demon, and clinging to the limb with one paw, it had the other extended, as though pointing to something ahead.

"What has the monkey to do with it, Colonel?" I asked, my curiosity aroused.

"The lungoor? You shall hear. He plays a very important part in the story."

With this assurance I was forced to be content, and, settling himself in his chair, the Colonel began.

As an enthusiastic scientist and mighty hunter, he had travelled over every part of the globe, his wanderings having been chiefly in the wildest and most inaccessible portions of our planet.

Three years ago, while in search of a peculiar plant which grows only in the deepest of East Indian jungles, and which he was employed to hunt up and secure specimens of, for a celebrated inventor, who wished to experiment on the use of the pith of the plant in some electrical contrivance, the Colonel found himself at Ramgargh, a Bengalese village at the foot of the Behar mountains.

Here he was the guest of an ex-army officer, Edward Meaney, whose beautiful daughter, Katharine, made a deep impression on the Colonel's susceptible heart.

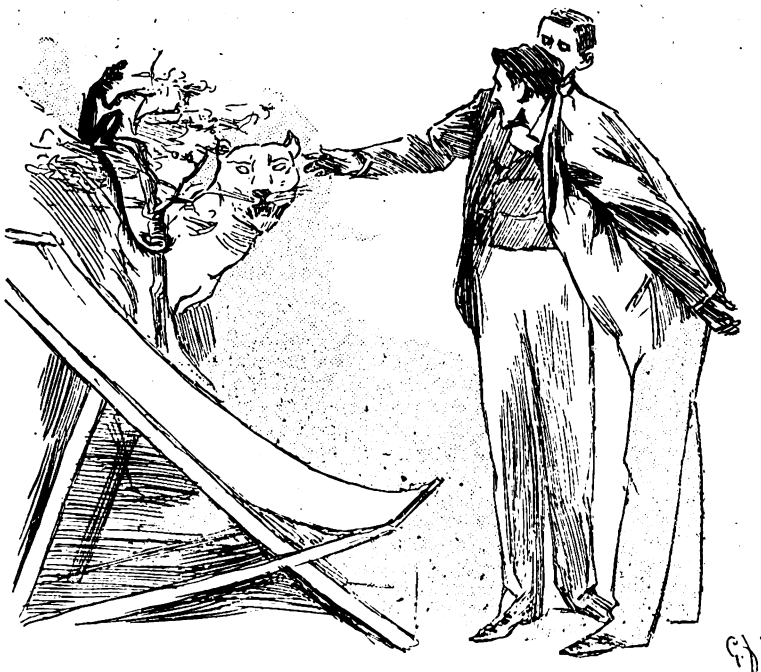
To use his own description, "she was a woman among women, courageous, gentle, kind, sensible, and accomplished."

The major was the owner of an extensive plantation, situated about sixteen miles from Ramgargh, where he had a very comfortably appointed bungalow, in which he lived a portion of the time, his only companion being his beautiful daughter.

Major Meaney had a smattering of botanical knowledge, and when his guest described the plant of which he was in search, the Major said:

"I think that I have met with it while hunting for the Jhoot Demon, in a dense jungle that lies to the south-west of my place."

"Hunting the what!" demanded the Colonel, whose sporting instincts were aroused at the very mention of the name of a creature of which he had never before heard.



"What do you think of him?"

Digitized by Google

"The Jhoot Demon."

"And what in the name of all that is horrible is a Jhoot Demon?"

"It's the name the natives have given to an enormous man-eating tiger which is the terror of the whole country."

"Ever got a shot?"

"Never."

"I'll try my luck," said the Colonel carelessly. "I'll combine business with pleasure. When I'm hunting for this plant I'll look up his demonship."

"Be careful that the demon does not look you up instead," continued Major Meaney.

"Nonsense. I'm not an ordinary shikari (tiger hunter), but a man who has slain over a hundred of the beasts."

"That's exactly what poor Dick Culverton said, and Dick shot over fifty tigers in twelve months once, for a wager."

"And did the tiger get him?"

"Yes. In the past ten years the tiger has killed every shikari, native or European, who went out against him. He has never even been seen, and, as he never mangles a body, but only sucks the blood through an orifice made over the jugular vein, the terror that the Jhoot Demon has inspired is not surprising. He does not confine himself to jungle man-hunting, and, although he never forces a door, he has got into house after house. Last March he killed two of my servants, and a third, who was lying beside them, was not even awakened."

"You excite my interest."

"I shall do well if I develop your caution. Before I went on half-pay, I was in command of a cantonment which was pitched on what is now my plantation. Two of my subalterns—likely lads—went out for him, and the next day were found dead like the rest."

"Boys are proverbially careless."

"Doubtless. One of the poor lads, with his last strength, had managed to scratch in the soft ground, the words: 'Look out for a L——.' But no amount of conjecture could solve the riddle of this uncompleted sentence."

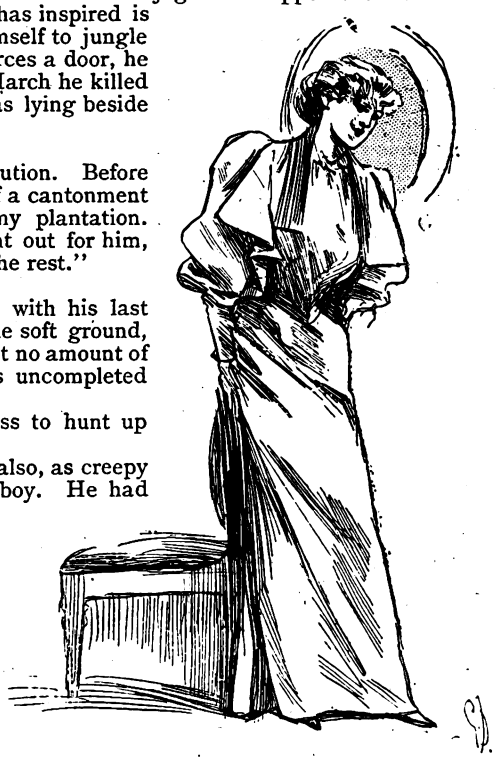
"I shall certainly make it my business to hunt up the demon."

"Poor Dick Culverton left a message also, as creepy and mysterious as that written by the boy. He had managed before life left him, to grasp a twig which was found in his stiffened fingers, and with this rude pen had written in the sand two letters only before his strength failed him.

"Those letters?"

"A M——" answered the Major.

Far into the night, Major Meaney talked of the Jhoot Demon, its cunning, its ferocity, its murderous rapacity, and the Colonel nodded his head, and more firmly than ever resolved to hunt the terror of the jungle to his death.



Katharine.

The day following they set out for the plantation—the Colonel, Major Meaney, and Miss Katharine.

The bungalow was built close to a palm thicket, and the Colonel was given an end room, the windows of which, protected only by a mosquito netting, overlooked this grove.

The front corner room was occupied by Katharine Meaney, and as all were weary from their day's journey over the rough roads, they retired early.

There was a full moon, and the Colonel, arrayed only in his pajamas, seated himself at the window to smoke a cheroot before retiring.

His feet were elevated on the low sill, and he was gazing dreamily out toward the palm grove, when there was an almost inaudible rustle of leaves among some low shrubbery which grew close to the bungalow, and looking sharply in that direction, he saw a little grey brown paw very cautiously putting aside the twigs.

Behind the paw he could discern two small green eyes attentively regarding him.

"A lungoor!" he muttered to himself, as it vanished from view. "A monkey."

Then he sprang suddenly but noiselessly to his feet, and his whole frame quivered with excitement.

"A lungoor—a monkey!" he repeated, in a whisper. "What was the message that poor lad left? 'Look out for a L——' a lungoor, he meant. And Culverton's two enigmatical letters written with the twig as he lay dying, 'A M——.' A monkey he meant. By George! There's mischief afloat!"

Moved by a sudden inspiration, for which he could never afterwards account, he picked up one of his heavy express rifles, both barrels of which were charged with explosive ball, and opening the door of his room stepped out into the wide verandah that encircled the bungalow.

A mass of creepers growing up to the thatched roof afforded him a place of shelter, from which he could keep his eye on the shrubbery and command a view of the windows of Katharine Meaney's room.

He had scarcely got himself into position when the lungoor hopped out into the clearing, the shrubbery shook, and there followed the little creature one of the most repulsive monsters his eyes had ever beheld.

It was a gigantic tiger, absolutely naked, not a hair anywhere—a huge, ghostly monstrosity—a very Caliban of tigers.

As the ghostly creature crept after the monkey, he followed the slightest curve and deviation of his guide with the delicate alacrity of a needle under the influence of a magnet.

The monkey crossed the little cleared place and made straight toward one of the windows of the room occupied by Kate Meaney, alongside of which was the beautiful girl's bed.

Holding his breath, Colonel Downing followed with wide staring eyes the movements of the two strange companions.

The adroitness displayed by the tiger was suddenly converted into a subject of horrified wonder, for, as the brute approached the window behind which lay the sleeping girl, he turned his hideous face up to the moon, and the watcher, standing breathless among the sheltering creepers, saw that his eyes were of a dull white, without light, intelligence, or movement.

The creature was stone blind, but, for all that, evidently knew what lay before him, for the saliva of anticipation was clinging to his wrinkled jaws like a mass of gleaming icicles.

The monkey, when it had come within jumping distance, gave a low signal cry, made one vigorous spring through the window upon Kate's bed, and then leaped upon the head-board.

The little guide was instantly followed by the tiger, but, while his huge, hairless body was in mid-air, the Colonel's express rifle rang out.

The tiger uttered a scream of agony, his great fore-paws dug at the air viciously, and his huge body fell with a crash upon the floor of the verandah.

The monkey, with a shill cry, sought to escape, but a ball from the second barrel stretched it lifeless beside the dead body of the Jhoot Demon.

It is no wonder, then, that, seeing the interest he had excited in the beautiful girl's heart, the Colonel pressed his suit, and was rewarded, before many days, by becoming her accepted husband.

The native servants carefully removed the skins of the demon and his monkey guide, and, as I glanced toward their stuffed forms, when the Colonel rose and announced that lunch awaited us, I could not repress a shudder of horror.

Digitized by Google

A SISTER'S TREACHERY.

SIX o'clock. The hands at John Pilborough's factory stood ready with their shawls and bonnets on waiting for the signal of dismissal, and, when the clamour of the noisy bell broke on the air, they were out in the streets of Lowell, pushing, jostling, hurrying like a flock of frightened sheep released from bondage.

The crowd dispersed in twos and threes, but Margaret Miller walked apart. There was no companionship for her in all that noisy throng, no companionship in all the wide world. A strange life for so young a woman to lead, but those who would win love must earn it, and Margaret neither wished nor courted human sympathy.

There had been but one bright spot in all the dull years. One drop of honey in her cup of life, and that had turned to bitterest gall.

Margaret at seventeen had been a wonderful beauty, and her great black eyes and peach colour had caught the fancy of John Pilborough's son, who had taken no pains to conceal his admiration, but sought her company whenever it was possible.

At last it grew a common thing for him to walk beside her in the winter twilight, on the road that lay between the factory and her home, and these walks were the events of Margaret's life, and there were tender whisperings that would have been highly disapproved of by the young man's prudent father had they come to his ears.

Margaret grew very gentle in those days. It was so sweet to think that someone watched for her coming when the weary day's work was over, that someone thought of her when she was absent. So sweet to know that someone loved her, that she was tender to all the world for that one's sake.

The girls began to grow fonder of Margaret, and some, even when they guessed the secret of the change, clung to her still, while others were filled with envy and spite toward the girl who was no better than they, yet aspired to the friendship of their employer's son.

But all this came to a sudden end, and Margaret never knew the reason. She could only guess that the young man's father objected to their intercourse, for he had met them once or twice together. They parted as tenderly as ever, but there was no leave-taking, and shortly after Arthur Pilborough left his native town, and for five long years she had heard no more of him. This love, which had seemed so much to her, was with him but an idle fancy.

But there had been a nine days' wonder and gossip about young Pilborough and Margaret Miller, and Margaret resented this, and was more shy than ever of the girls who had so concerned themselves with her affairs. Those who disliked her increased in their dislike, and those who would have been kind to her grew tired of kindness which met with no return.

The days were so like one another. She would go home to eat and sleep; perhaps spend an hour or two over her sewing, silent, while others talked of things that were less than nothing to her. But this day was destined to be unlike all the others.

There was a letter awaiting her, a letter bordered in black and signed Bessie Miller, the sister from whom she had parted many years before.

It told of the death of the old uncle who had adopted her, and offered, nay forced on Margaret's acceptance an equal share of the fortune which had fallen to his adopted child when his affairs were all arranged.

"And Margaret," said the writer, "you are my darling sister, though I have forgotten even how you looked when they took us from each other. I have loved you all my life long, and you must come and live with me and we shall be happy together."

And Margaret went.

It was a snowy day in winter, when Margaret alighted at the house that was to be her home. Bessie flew to meet her. Standing at the portal with her golden hair blown backward from her smiling face, and a welcome spoken with lips and eyes and outstretched hands, she looked to Margaret's eyes like an angel at the gates of Paradise.

When the first greeting was over, Margaret and Bessie sat together before the fire, talking of the past. Margaret in a great armchair, and Bessie on a little ottoman at her feet. They were as different as sisters could be. One tall, dark, and stately; the other a diminutive blonde with a fairylike figure, and full of life and motion, and pretty winning ways.

As they sat there, deep in reminiscences, Bessie fell to caressing her sister's hand with hers, patting them softly against her rosy cheeks, and Margaret feeling the gentle touch, looked down and thought with a sudden pang, how different they were. Those tiny rose-tipped fingers made her own look so large and coarse.

"They have the factory stamp on them, Bessie," said the elder sister, and Bessie who had been thinking of anything rather than this, blushed with embarrassment, and then sprang from her seat and threw her arms round her sister's neck for the hundredth time.

But Margaret stood before her mirror that night, and laughed a bitter laugh.

"The stamp of the factory is on me," she said. "Money can never give me back what I have lost. She might have been the drudge and I the lady with soft white hands, but for the merest chance."

But the morning brought better thoughts. No one could long have lived with Bessie Miller without partaking somewhat of her happy nature. She was a living sunbeam, a creature like the birds and flowers, rejoicing that she lived; but underneath her gaiety there was a well of pure, deep feeling which Margaret could not understand.

One evening the two were sitting alone; the elder idly dreaming—she was always idle now—the younger planting roses in a barren field of canvas.

"Margaret," said Bessie in a voice that was scarcely more than a breath, "I have something to tell you I wanted to tell you before."

Margaret laughed and roused herself to listen. One look at the blue eyes glowing like winter stars, the little mouth quivering with its tender smile, told Margaret what the "something" was.

"Come, Bessie, and tell me all about it now. Better late than never."

So Bessie left her needle in a half-blown rose and nestled in her favourite seat at Margaret's feet.

"Margaret," said she, "someone likes me"; then hid her crimson face in Margaret's draperies.

"How strange!" said the other, laughing. "Is that all?"

This time Bessie drew her sister down to her with both her hands, and whispered in her ear as though it were a guilty secret that she was engaged to be married, and the day was settled.

"And who is the happy man?" said Margaret. "Who am I to have for a brother-in-law?"

Just then the door bell rang, and Bessie sprang to her former position as two gentlemen were announced.

"Mr. Pilborough," Margaret heard the servant say, and the name came to her like a voice from the buried past. She could have prayed it might not be the one whom she had known.

But there he stood, not greatly changed. She had ceased to care for him, yet she could not feel to him as to a stranger. It seemed like living in a dream to hear his voice and touch his hand again.

Of all else that passed that evening Margaret was unconscious. His voice was the only one that had a meaning to her. She wondered at first if he had recognised her, changed as she was and in her altered circumstances. But she found that he remembered all. He spoke of their former intercourse as a boy and girl friendship, and totally ignored the manner of their parting.

But his voice was low and tender, and his eyes were the eyes of the olden time, and Margaret felt the influence of other days creeping over her, and knew that he wished she should. Meanwhile Bessie chatted and laughed with the stranger, and these two talked of the long ago.

"How do you like him?" said the younger sister, when the gentlemen had taken their departure.

Digitized by Google

"Like him? Why, Bessie, I am ashamed to say, I hardly noticed what he was like. You know most of my observation was taken up with Mr. Pilborough. We are old friends, and we had a great deal to say."

"Why, what are you thinking of, Margaret? It is Arthur I mean. Did I not tell you? I gave you ample opportunity to make his acquaintance."

And Bessie laughed her merry joyous laugh at her sister's astonished countenance.

But Margaret rose up fierce and angry.

"I hate him!" she cried; "and I hate you!" she might have added, for the thought was in her heart. But Bessie, pale and trembling, put her hand upon the angry lips.

"Oh! tell me what is the matter, sister, darling sister," she pleaded, and Margaret, frightened at her own angry words, stood still and thought how she could mend them.

"Has my Arthur done anything wrong—anything to offend you?"

Margaret made no answer; she would have given worlds to recall the hasty breath, but she was forced to tell the story at last. And her sister listened with tearful eyes. Inconstancy seemed such a terrible thing to this faithful heart.

"Margaret," said she, "I can never marry Arthur now."

But Margaret begged her to forget what she had told her, and they parted for the night with fond embraces.

Alone in her own chamber, Bessie thought till the morning broke.

He was Margaret's first love as he was her's; but, perhaps, it had not been as Margaret thought; perhaps it had been but a boyish fancy, and Arthur must not suffer if his happiness depended on herself. Come what might, she resolved to do her duty unselfishly and cheerfully. Poor Margaret, she had had but little sweetness in her life. It might be that Arthur had loved her truly in those early days and had only forsaken her upon compulsion.

So ended her meditation. Time passed on, and day by day she watched the two, and saw, or thought she saw, that they loved each other still, and as this conviction forced itself upon her, Arthur Pilborough's image faded from her breast.

He who knoweth all things could alone know the secret of that innocent heart. If she suffered she gave no sign, and Margaret, guessing nothing of what was passing in her sister's mind, and believing her happy in Arthur's love, felt all the old bad feelings return with double force, and set herself the task of winning Arthur Pilborough's love, scarcely thinking of the end of her triumph, but resolved to punish him in some way for the unhappiness he had caused her.

She strove her best to fascinate and dazzle him, and he, quite willing to be entertained by a handsome woman, entered with zest into a flirtation, all the while reserving such love as he possessed for the one who was to be his wife.

But in all this Bessie only saw the signs of feeling that could not be repressed, and one day, when the two were sitting together, she came and sat beside Pilborough with a resolute look in her earnest blue eyes.

"Arthur," she said, "the day that has been fixed for our wedding is close at hand, but I must say what I have to say before that time."

She begged of her sister not to leave them, and then, in a clear, steady voice, she told Arthur Pilborough her feelings had changed, that she no longer felt any stronger regard than friendship, and that she hoped he would try to forgive and forget her. She hinted of no change in him, of no reason for the alteration in her feeling, and Arthur, utterly abashed, knowing well what cause he had given her, listened in silence, tongue-tied in Margaret's presence.

Next morning there came to the door a missive in Arthur's hand addressed to Bessie Miller. As the letter was placed in Margaret's hand she stood in her dressing-room, holding her sister's costly wedding dress.

There was no question of right or wrong, only a mad determination to know of all that passed between Bessie and Arthur Pilborough. Margaret opened the letter and read what was never meant for her eyes—tender, penitent words, warm with the love for which she would have bartered her existence. Pleading humbly for forgiveness, for that heart which he had lost through his own misdeeds, and through and under it all a hint, not anywhere written but subtly expressed, that the fault was not all his own.

A light step sounded along the passage, and Margaret tore the paper with an angry hand and cast it at her feet, crushing it under the folds of the snowy satin.

Bessie looked in, and seeing what she held cried out:

"Oh, Margaret, please put the dress away, and never let me see it again."

Margaret laid dress and paper away in an unused drawer. But for the confession it involved of her own treachery she might even yet have given her sister the letter; but, as it was, she said to herself that Arthur Pilborough might make his peace in his own way.

That night Arthur bent over Bessie with his whole soul in his eyes, and asked her if she had anything new to say.

"I have not changed my mind," she said, quite coldly, and Arthur went, vowing never to enter the house again.

For a time the sisters saw no more of him. They ceased even to speak of him, but after a time Margaret met him frequently, and Bessie knew of the meetings, and was glad that all had come to pass as she had planned, and would have been as gay and happy as ever but for a sudden illness that came upon her.

It was heart-disease, the doctor said, and a sudden shock might be her death, but with care she might recover. So Bessie gave up all pleasure that tended to excitement, and remained at home to guard her health.

One night there was a party to the opera proposed by a lady at whose house Margaret and Arthur Pilborough frequently met. Both the sisters were invited, but Bessie pleaded illness.

"Come and see me when you get home. I'll be sure to be awake," and Margaret left her with a kiss.

That evening Arthur sat beside Margaret in the crowded opera house, and in the pauses of the music asked her to make him happy with the promise of her hand; and Margaret promised, regardless of her revenge, reckoning little whether pique or love had made him so soon forget her sister, for this was the anniversary of Bessie's proposed wedding-day.

He assisted her from the carriage on their return, and with his last touch on her hand, his last word on her ear, Margaret sped up the stairs to her own room. At Bessie's door she paused and looked within. The shutter was open wide, and the long curtain, loosened from its fastenings, blew half across the room, the gaslight flickered and flared, and on the floor lay a heap of snowy satin and lace, her sister's discarded wedding dress.

Margaret's pulses stood still. There was but a step from her to the bed that was hidden by its massive head-board, but that step seemed a yawning gulf. It was taken, and there lay pretty Bessie, the colour fled for ever from her lips and cheeks, her little fingers clasping fast a tattered paper—the paper Margaret knew so well.

Her sister had loved and trusted her with a boundless love and faith, and the knowledge of Margaret's treachery had pierced that tender heart as absolutely as though the cruel hand had held a murderous knife. For a moment Margaret hoped that she was dying too, but the horror that swept her frame left her alive to remorse and agony, it seemed to her for ever more.

When Arthur Pilborough came to look upon the lifeless form, the love that had been the purest feeling of his heart, came back to overwhelm him with a hopeless sorrow.

"Oh, Bessie! little Bessie!" he cried; "I loved you better than my life!"

There was no word of explanation, of leave-taking between Margaret and her old time lover; but the two looked into each other's eyes and knew that they must part.

They never met again. Margaret is an aged woman now. The world died to her with Bessie's death, and life since then has been a long, unceasing penance; but sometimes in her dreams she sees her sister's radiant form and hears her voice, not stern or angry, not reproachful, but pleading gently for her sinful sister, forgiving and pitiful as in her life. And Margaret, full of contrition and penitence, looks forward not quite despairingly to the life beyond.

Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

SUMMARY—Chapters I. to VII.

The story is told by Violet (Letty) Lombard, who, at the opening, is living at Galveston, U.S.A. with her grandfather, Enos Lombard, Liz the coloured servant, Justina her old nurse, and her Aunt Marg, who has been the recipient of mysterious letters, post-marked New Orleans, necessitating a fortnight's absence from home. John Scott, who married Katherine, Violet's step-sister, a very beautiful girl, pays for Violet's board and lodging, and has just decided that she is to go to a convent in New Orleans. On the strength of information gained from the torn pieces of one of Aunt Marg's letters, and curious to solve the mystery, Violet so arranges that she goes to New Orleans a day earlier, and that she stops at the Hotel Gilbert. Through a crack in the wall, she sees what happens in the next room to hers. John Scott, Captain Dana—an old friend from Galveston—Aunt Marg, and others are sitting in judgment upon a Mexican, Antonio, who has, it transpires, assisted in the seizure of Scott's wife, and of Dana's wife and daughter, and whose terrible crime has been brought to light by Yara, a spy. Antonio is compelled to end his life by taking poison, with his dying words laying the blame upon one Xarras.

Letty goes to the convent in the morning, and during her schooldays there clandestinely meets James Gregory, who is introduced as the son of a friend of her grandfather's. On her way home again, some months later, with her chaperone Miss Wilson, Colonel Dean Gregory, James's brother, introduces himself. After that, Letty sees a great deal of James, and at length promises to elope with him. Whilst waiting for him to come, she overhears Dean Gregory telling a friend of a plot whereby he has won James over, and has made it probable that John Scott's money will come to himself instead of to Letty.

* * * * * *

CHAPTER VIII.

"LETTY," he said thickly—I saw that he had been drinking, for his voice was unsteady, his manner wild—"what kind of game were you trying to play on me? It is two o'clock, and I have waited since twelve. Where did you find that old fool?"

I dropped the captain's arm, while he stood there, silently regarding us both, and looked at Jim with a hopeless air.

"You will wait for ever for me, Jim," I stammered. "I have changed my mind; I am going home."

"Do you think one of your conscience spells will change me?" he went on rudely. "I know you and your moods too well. You said to-night you would run away with me, and I hold you to your word." He started towards me, but Captain Dana interposed.

"I can hold you back, old as I am, and give her a chance to run," he said sternly. "She's as fleet-footed as a deer. I want you to talk it over, fair and square, but no roughness, Jim Gregory, and I tell you she has come to her right senses."

"It is too late," said Jim, with white lips. "You old idiot, I would not hurt her. She came of her own accord. This is all acting. Why, she wrote me herself that she would come. There is no need of hysterics on your part!"

Then I remembered my silly letters. I would have given a year of my life to have never written one. "I shall never go with you Jim," I said timidly.

"You must think me a chump, Miss Lombard. It's a duty I owe to society to show what sort you are. I have some pretty letters of yours too——"

"You think that will make John Scott break his will," I said coolly. "Oh, you miserable cur! What good will that do you? Don't you guess that he reads you? I defy you to do your worst."

Then I dragged the captain away. "That was wrong, Letty," he said feebly; "you should not set him on, for there's only old, helpless folks to stand between you and the world. I see evil days for you like many a poor girl has lived through that was foolish like you." He wrung my hand at parting, and I went softly through the hall. Our doors were seldom locked. At the foot of the stairs I stopped by the old clock and laid my cheek against the case. Then and there I, silly, repentant Letty Lombard, kissed the senseless wood as fondly as I ever touched a human being's lips.

"Home safe, because you lied to me, old friend," I thought; "because you are three, when it is only two o'clock; because you were morning when it was night. When I was a tiny, fearing child, I used to think a witch dwelt in your shining case. Now I know it was a good fairy, who watched over me until the time of helping came."

Oh, my white little room! The scent of the flowers that, warm from my breast, I had flung on my bed before I went; my gown, with a half-shaped outline of me to it, and all the carelessly-flung-about pretty knick-knacks I loved to have about me! How peaceful everything seemed, and how secure that shelter which I had scorned. I sank on my knees by the bed. Whenever I feel so lost and friendless, my heart goes back to my prayers at Aunt Marg's knee, and I cry to that one Friend she taught me to love.

But as I prayed I grew afraid. Something had gone from my spirit, a touch had blackened the white petals of my life. I had not been guilty, but what would the world say? I got up and shut the window, drew the key inside and locked my door, and in a perfect frenzy looked in every place where a person might hide.

I felt no longer safe, nor did I sleep until it was almost day, and a faint rosy tinge had softened the dark shadows of fog and night. Then I dreamed that John Scott came to me and gave me a white camelia, its petals foully stained and black.

"I told you years ago that this would come," he said gently; "you will never be white again."

In the days that followed, I saw Jim Gregory kept his word, and though a reputation dies so hard when it must be poisoned by microscopic doses to screen the murderer, mine went into the shadow of death.

I travelled in the valley of humiliation. Men looked at me rudely. Some women who had been kind to me did not see me when we met, and the girls I used to associate with hardly answered my greeting. Dean Gregory used to say some insolent pleasantry when he met me, that I could have killed him for in my helpless anger. Justina said she had heard from some Mexican sailors that my name had been mentioned lightly in a low bar-room by Gregory, and a friend of hers had flung a glass at him. "It did not kill him," said Justina mournfully.

Then one afternoon I received a letter from the pastor of the church where I sang, that my services would be no longer

"I can hold you back, old as I am.

Digitized by Google

I laid my cheek against the case.

required. A small city is like a country town in the matter of scandal and gossip, and what assassin's weapons both are! I like better the Mexican's knife, one can sometimes dodge that, but from venomous tongues there is no escape.

I went straight to the pastor's study and wondered, when I did so, if his wife would scold him for hurting his character by receiving me. I have such a way of thinking things in all my troubles. He told me gently he did not believe any of the stories. He admitted there were some, his wife had mentioned them; but he never listened to gossip; but the lady members of the choir objected to me.

"Well," I said calmly, "I am punished for looking on church just as a recreation; luckily I never did look to it for any comfort."

"Set-backs like this, such talk from young people whom we are powerless to aid, is what hurts ministers of the gospel most to-day," he said sadly; "we seem to be hampered from doing what we wish at every turn."

"By the lady members," I said wickedly.

He half smiled. "There are certain influences we cannot withstand; and believe me, Miss Violet, that, though I know you have been sadly imprudent, I am sure you are a good, true woman, and I want you to come to church just the same. Facing scandal bravely often silences it, and in time we will have you in your old place in the choir; the other singers are very nice, but a little narrow."

"The narrowness of good women and men is what keeps your pews unfilled to-day," I said recklessly. "To aid the multitude you must go back to open-air meetings. You shut the doors of your churches on sinners. I am going down to the sailors' Bethel to sing on Sunday. There are women there who are trying to lead better lives, and yet you could not induce them to set foot in your church because of the scornful looks of your narrow lady members."

"I think, out of your anger, good may come to the Bethel," he said kindly. He was such a pleasant gentleman, and I was ashamed afterwards of my silly talk. "You sing so sweetly; our hymns will have a truer meaning to their hearts and make them better."

Half angry, half pleased, I went home, where, as I sat by the window, cooling my flushed face, I heard grandfather talking to Captain Dana in the porch. My name, uttered in his angriest manner, caught my attention.

"You can't take up for Letty. I tell you, Dana, you are wrong. You must not make her quarrel yours. What was Katherine? Think of the misery she caused, and how little it ever touched her. There is no good in Letty either. I am too old to worry and suffer over her ill-doing. Look at my son—blown with ev'ry wind, no comfort to himself or to me, and his girls were that way. Selfish, heartless, and wrong-headed, she never thanks Marg for that good woman's life of devotion to her, nor my giving her a home. John is the subject of her ridicule with young Gregory. He's her kind; let her abide with him."

"I never thought you such a hard man, Enos," quavered the captain.

"I'm too old to break colts, such bad stock too. Letty flirted with young Gregory; I saw that, and she can take her punishment. If only Liz will hold her tongue, for Marg must not be worried by the stories floating about. It would kill her. It's a pity that ungrateful girl didn't die when she was a baby."

"And Marg didn't know a word of the talk?" asked the captain.

"No. She don't seem to half belong to our world. But I fear it may come to her, try as we may. She sets such a store by Letty. Poor Mary! Her life was wrecked like a fine new ship, drifting on the bar on her first v'yage and going down. I've writ to John, but he ain't back from Mexico, and I sent the letter to New York. If he was there he'd have sent for her perhaps, and got her out o' town till the talk blew over, if it ever will."

"Poor little lass!" sighed the captain; and I loved him for that. I put on my hat and went softly down the stairs. Liz, acting under my grandfather's order, made no attempt nowadays to accompany me anywhere, and that fact used to hurt me. It seemed he thought I was no longer worth guarding or loving; that I had put myself beyond both.

I used to hate to have her watch over me, but now I could have cried for her to take that old friendly interest, to make me think myself not quite so evil. I knew John Scott was not in Mexico. I saw him ride by that day; and full of a desperate purpose, I went along the beach to the street leading to the mansion.

It was very quiet in the flower-scented yard. My steps echoed guiltily after me as I went up to the porch. The great mastiff John loves came to meet me. We were old friends. There was a light in Mr. Scott's study, so I rang the bell. Bruce came to the door, and, as he saw me, drew back as if he would shut me out. "Missus sed I wasn't to let yo' in," he muttered.

"Did Mr. Scott, my guardian, say so?" I asked defiantly.

"Deed he didn't," said Bruce, brightening up. "It's a wicked shame to act like dem two. I ain't no use for the Gregorys, Miss Vi'let. I allus liked yo', but yo' bin a leetle toppy lately when yo' comed here; doan seem to see me no mo' den the furnitoor. Dem ain't no quality ways, I tell yo'."

"Go on, Bruce," I said humbly "I deserve all the unkind things you can say."

"I'se dreffful sorry I sed dem, missy.

"Missus said I wasn't to let yo' in."

Digitized by Google

Yo' got so pale and skeered lookin'. Bless yo', chile, Mars Scott set a store by yo'. He's in de dinin' room wif de kurnal and Jim. I'll fotch him out kinder sly, an' yo' step in de study. De ladies upstairs."

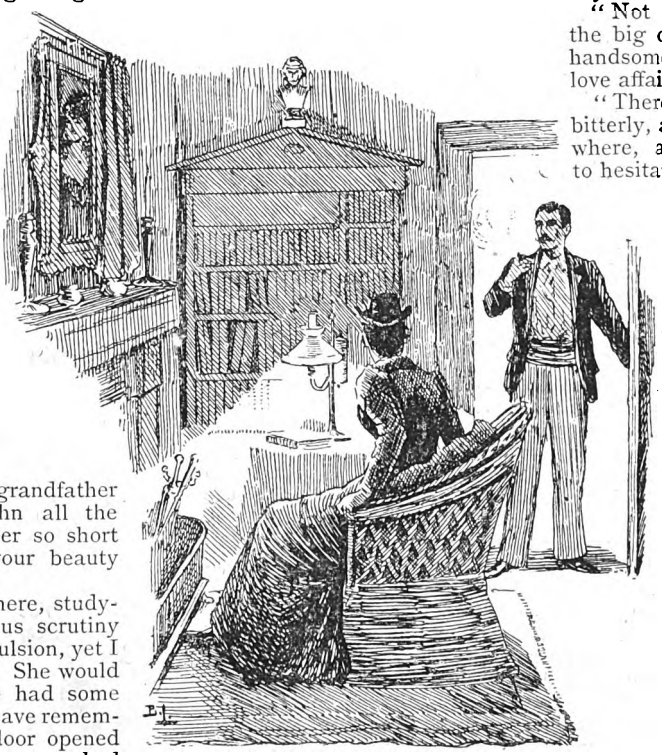
He closed the door behind me, and I stared curiously round the room, that had never been opened to Jim's and my explorations. Over the mantel hung a portrait. Once, when we looked in the blinds, I saw it veiled with a crimson plush curtain, and Jim said it was Katherine's, and John kept it covered. Now the curtain was drawn aside, and, I suppose, from the chair below the mantel, he had been sitting there looking at her.

She was worth a life's devotion, I thought then. Such a face! that glorious Spanish beauty: great dark eyes; clear, pale skin; features of perfect form and classic outline; a mouth made for kisses, full-lipped and rosy, pouting as if she would smile, for her eyes had already the merry light in them. Over her blue-black hair was a Spanish mantilla, half revealing her matchless shoulders and bosom, and falling over the sheen of her yellow satin gown. I fancied she loved rich, warm colours, none too glowing and brilliant for her beauty to cope with.

How proudly her head was set on her full round throat—not a large head either, but so well shaped, and her forehead low and broad, defied you to dare ask for intellect when beauty satisfied your every sense. I don't believe in high foreheads or narrow ones, despite Tennyson; I have seen some bald foreheaded women with their frizzes on the tops of their vacant heads, and all they knew was the last pattern in worsted work or tatting. As I looked, the eyes took on a mocking light; the lips a meaning smile.

"The artist knew you better than your husband," I thought; "that stranger read you as grandfather did. How did you blind John all the years, or were you only together so short a time that the glamour of your beauty held him enthralled?"

I forgot my errand as I sat there, studying that perfect face in jealous scrutiny and with a curious sense of repulsion, yet I knew I should have loved her. She would have understood me and have had some pity had she lived. She would have remembered her own youth. The door opened and the fragrance of a good cigar reached me as I started in my chair. I felt that my hour had come as I turned to meet Mr. John Scott.



I turned to meet Mr. John Scott.

CHAPTER IX.

"The idea of Bruce not telling me you were here," he said quickly; "he gets more useless every day. I kept you waiting, and you look so pale and worn." He did not offer me his hand, and sick at heart I thought he must already know all. He read my thoughts. "Remember you would not shake hands with me once," he smiled.

I held out my cold hand and he pressed it in his big warm, palm, and still holding me, led me in front of Katherine's picture.

"Don't contrast us," I pleaded, "it is not kind of you."

"You hold your own very well, Miss Jealousy, and are like and unlike her, the same mouth and chin."

"Oh, that is enough," I cried breathlessly, "I am more than satisfied; most women would be content with one of her perfect features, and you have given me two."

He laughed, drew the curtain across the painting, and brought me a chair. "There must be something direfully wrong, Letty, to bring you to your pet aversion."

"There is," I stammered, "and I need a friend, someone to be kind to me. I thought that you——" then the room grew suddenly dark, and I must have fainted, for when I remembered I was lying on the sofa by the open window, and he was bathing my forehead with some strong perfume, while Bruce, very scared and round eyed, stood staring at me.

"Where is my mother?" said Scott anxiously; "I sent you for her."

"Tel de troof, Mars John," answered Bruce uncomfortably, "dey bof down on de po chile."

"If anyone has hurt that little heart he shall answer to me," said John, with that metallic ring in his voice.

"It was my own doing," I said, sitting up and pushing my wet curls out of my eyes, "and I am all right now. I was so afraid to come, and all of a sudden I lost courage and sense too." The tears came then and I hid my face. Bruce quietly went out at a sign from John.

"Don't try to talk to-night, Violet," said John; "why not another day?"

"Because I can bear it no longer. Please sit there, and don't look at me nor say one word until I'm finished."

"Not a whisper," he smiled, taking the big chair near the sofa, shading his handsome eyes with his hand. "Is it a love affair, you poor little maid?"

"There was no love in it," I cried bitterly, and with many sobs and pauses where, ashamed and miserable, I had to hesitate, I told him the truth about my engagement to James Gregory and all our stolen meetings, and of my knight-errant, and what a friend he had been to me.

"You must destroy that will," I said. "I know you must. If you left me one coin it would haunt me; I am so unworthy of any one's kindness."

"You knew of my will?" he said sternly, then leaned forward and took my hand, holding it tight. "Tell me how you learnt that. You have kept something back. You only said you heard that talk by Justina's cottage. Who were the speakers?"

"That I will not tell you, Mr. Scott. I shall not bring you more trouble than I can help. That would not be your quarrel."

"Yet you said you were going to be honest."

"If you do not help me I will drown myself. I have got to the end of my tether. I am desperate."

"The will shall be destroyed," he said coldly; "but can you be honest? How much truth and how much falsehood is there in what you have told me?"

"It is all truth," I sobbed; and like the camelia, a rude touch has blackened the petals of my girl's life. I can never forget all he said, it stings me now when it comes back to torture me.

He rose and walked up and down the room; his hands behind him, his eyes on my face. "If I could believe you," he muttered.

"Don't," I cried recklessly, "be like the rest! Why I came here, I don't know. There is no pity in any man or woman. There is one road for me, and I am driven to it. I have the blame now, why not——."

"Hush!" he said, and came and took me by the shoulder as I stood there. "Don't soil your lips with such sentiments, or I shall side against you. You do look good, Letty. Your pure child's face, your innocent eyes; you would never have come to me if there had been wrong. I believe you, dear."

Digitized by Google

He went to the bell. "Bruce, send Mr. James in here."

"I will not see him," I cried; "you shall not force me to. It is wicked, cruel. Is that the way you would help me?"

"Yes; what have you done that you must be a coward?"

I knew Bruce did not tell Jim that I was there, for he stopped short when he saw me, and half turned to escape.

"This isn't fair, Uncle John," he choked.

"I am glad you acknowledge it," said Scott quietly. "Now you see your victim it does put you in a bad light. It marks you for life as a cur and a sneak."

She gave me her hand with a polite little speech.

"I will not listen to this," cried Jim, with white lips.

"You will," said Scott, his back against the door.

"A great brute like you can bully," sneered Jim.

"Yes, and I have taken up Letty's cause. She has told me everything."

"Has she?" echoed Jim, with an indescribable accent; "everything?"

"You contemptible cub," said Scott, "I've a mind to take a whip to you."

"I am not one of your Mexican peons," cried Jim, "or one of the women they say you beat. If I haven't your strength I have arms with me."

"Don't draw that revolver, Jim," said Scott coolly, "for before you get it your arm will not be fit to handle it. Even if I beat my slaves, as you say, I think I would stand a better show than you do now. Pshaw! I won't quarrel with you. Now give me Letty's silly notes. All of them, and——"

"I don't propose to."

"Yes, you will, for I am going to buy you, Jim. You want to go to New York and start in business. Give me the letters and your word to say no more about Letty, never to mention her name, save in kindness, and I will help you as you and your mother wish. Refuse, and I will adopt my slave-driver methods. Truly, Jim, I am a better friend than enemy."

Jim pondered for fully five minutes, while Scott watched him quietly, with that mocking smile in his bright eyes and on his lips. Then Jim handed the packet of letters to him across the table. He always carried them with him for fear I might get them, with Bruce's assistance, if they were hid in the house, I suppose. Scott tossed them to me.

"They are all here," I faltered. "What shall I do with them?"

He took them from me, and Jim watched him with an ugly smile while I hung my head. If he read one of those silly, silly things, he would hate me. Scott, with a tender smile at me, flung them into the grate, touched a match, and they burned into a bright little flame, then quivered into white ashes. He went to his desk and wrote a cheque.

"Here is your money, Jim. I have written it carefully, so you cannot add a cipher. I never trust a blackguard. My house is no longer a home to you, the sooner you go the better it will be for both of us."

"That will suit me," said Jim, pocketing his cheque; "but I tell you this, you don't know her. They all say any woman can fool you."

"Don't give me your brother Dean's sentiments second-hand," said Scott coldly. He flung open the door and Jim departed, with a malignant look at me.

"Now, Letty," said John, coming back, "you see when you face a danger it often disappears. Honesty is a very good weapon. I only ask of you one promise, that if you are ever tempted to write to a man again, one that you love and think worthy, you will tell me and let me judge. I don't want to pry into your affairs, but after this I think I deserve your confidence."

"I hate all men," I cried angrily, "and with what I have cost you, and all the trouble and the quarrel I have made in your family, I seem to be a blot on everyone's happiness."

"Because you do not try to add to it. Turn over a new leaf and find sunshine in your home and duties. Try to be loving and kind to Margaret and your grandfather. It will cost you very little, Letty, only patience and gentle, kindly ways, to make people love you. Then (with the half-pathetic smile) leave us our mysteries, us old folks, and live in your own present. Now, will you try to do these things for me?"

"I will, with all my heart," I sobbed. What a swollen face and red eyes I had! Such a fright as I looked in the glass! I drew my hat over my face. I knew he was laughing at my vanity, too, for his voice had a merry ring in it when he told me to wait a moment and he would go home with me. He came back with his mother after a few moments, and she gave me her hand with a polite little speech, that I knew John had made her say.

"Letty is to go to church with us on Sundays, and to dine here after this," he said firmly; "you will make arrangements for that, mother."

A big rebellious sob choked itself up, and I could not control it.

"Repentance is so hard," I said, "and that very same minister too."

I hated myself then. Did I not know he meant to show the world it had no right to slander? Would not all those venomous tongues be silenced when they saw me with his mother in the family pew? Even then a wicked thought came into my mind, of how every one would stare as they saw me between the crêpe draped ladies.

"My mother always liked you, Letty. She has the kindest heart in the world," John went on, his arm about that tiny, dainty figure.

"But she is so naughty," said Mrs. Scott helplessly. "I thought the convent would have changed her; perhaps they were stricter in my time. And then you know about that skeleton. Suppose the Bishop had seen it first. But, John, I do think James was to blame; but you must not say so for the world."

"I intend to win over Aunt Ann," laughed John. "What fortresses I have stormed for you, Letty!"

Mrs. Scott put out her little wrinkled hand again, and I, with a sob, bent and kissed it.

"My lips, dear," she said. "I know you will be a very good girl now."

Blinded by my tears, I went out with John. I had been rude to that dear lady, and even that powder speech came back to haunt me. In silence we walked along the beach. At last I said, clumsily:

"I used to write in my copy-book, 'Honesty is the best policy,'" then I relapsed into shamed silence.

"And 'A friend in need is a friend indeed,' was that not one of the copies too? Am I to be the friend, Letty? Don't fret your little heart about Jim. I meant to send him away. If there is a cub on earth it is my nephew."

"But I have said such nasty things about you," I cried. "I called you a 'Mexican,' and 'Old John Scott,' and all such hideous and ungrateful things."

"What a very deluge of tears and repentance, Letty. Only keep half those good resolutions, especially about the 'Old John Scott,' and we can be very good friends. Good-night."

He pressed my hand and left me. I watched him with wistful eyes. I would have given half my years if there had been no memory in my heart of that awful night at the Hotel Gilbert to stand between him and me, to darken the gratitude and affection for him that had come into my life.

(To be continued next week.)

Digitized by Google

THE END OF THE FAMILY FEUD.

"WHAT in thunder——" began Colonel Starrett.

"Confound them! Why haven't they straightened things? Where's my breakfast?" He rang the bell savagely. "Here! Jane—Kitty—where are you?"

A minute later the door was timidly opened.

"Please, zur," said a very small voice.

A girl of ten, her dark, pert face peering out from a dark blue hood, stood on the threshold.

"Well?" questioned the Colonel sharply.

"Kitty told me to wait in the hall till I heard the bell, zur, an' then to come in an' tell you as how Jane got took bad last night with the influenza an' went home."

"Why couldn't Kitty tell me that herself? Where is she?"

The diminutive envoy shook in her well-ventilated shoes.

"My—my sister Kitty, zur—she's gone to get married."

"Married!" roared the Colonel.

"Yes, zur. To the butcher's young man."

Colonel Starrett's indignation had been appallingly fierce, but now he broke down laughingly. He tossed the child a coin.

"She was right. Now, then, off you go—and save me a bit of the wedding cake."

She ran off grinning, and he set himself to light a fire in the kitchen grate, and make a cup of coffee. Half an hour later he gulped down a drink of the bitter, blackish mixture he had evolved from the best Mocha; then, saddling his horse, he rode toward the neighbouring town.

Less than a mile down the road he passed a long, low hedge, now leafless, a skeleton orchard, and, set back from the road, a comfortable gabled house. The sight of it brought up an annoying recollection, and he actually groaned.

"That idiotic lad!" he muttered, referring to his only son. "The idea of his writing me to say he had met a daughter of George Stine's, and that she was so pretty he had forgotten all about the feud, and fallen in love with her. I think," grimly, "that my letter brought him to his senses."

It would have puzzled Colonel Starrett to explain lucidly the original cause of the feud. It was something about a disputed strip of meadowland. His grandfather had begun the quarrel, his father had reverently perpetuated it, and he would have considered himself a traitor if he had failed to harbour resentment against every member of the Stine family.

Not that there were many left. There was George Stine's plump, brisk, bustling widow; the girl, of whom Harry wrote, who had been away at school almost all the time of late years; and a wild young slip of a lad, just entering his teens.

In the small town, Colonel Starrett found it impossible to replace his vanished domestics. That is, to replace them to his satisfaction; for the Colonel was inclined to be a trifle exacting. However, a few hours later, he wished he had not been so hard to please, for after supper he went into the cellar to get some firewood, stepped on a potato lying on the stairs, lost his balance, and fell headlong down the vegetable-scented darkness.

He lay there half stunned. After a while, with a painful effort, he managed to drag himself upstairs, and into his cheerless sitting room.

He lay on the sofa, wondering how long it would be before any one happened to come in. His nearest neighbours were the Stines, and he reflected, with a sarcastic snort, that there was no danger of any of them dropping in.

"Thank goodness, Robin will be home to-morrow," he murmured, as he fell into an uncomfortable sleep.

And, sure enough, about eleven o'clock the following day, Robin Starrett, a tall, good looking, well-dressed young fellow, strode up the avenue to the paternal mansion, and discovered his helpless father railing against things in general and servants in particular.

"Desolation, indeed!" assented Robin. "No fires—no promise of dinner—no comfort at all. What luck!"

He put down his bag and grabbed up his hat.

"Where are you going?" demanded Colonel Starrett.

"To hunt up a girl who got out of the same train as I did at the station. Good cook and first-class housekeeper generally. A treasure for us, if I can induce her to come."

His arguments, whatever they were, proved successful. In three-quarters of an hour he triumphantly presented his prize to the Colonel. The old man regarded her searchingly. She was a slender, pretty girl of nineteen, with a soft little fringe of dark hair across her white brow; large, grey, appealing eyes, and "a mouth like a baby's, dewy red." Even his masculine eye perceived that she was not only well, but fashionably dressed.

"Humph!" he muttered to Robin. "Too stylish to be worth her salt. But let her try."

And, six hours later, he was willing to admit his mistake, for the cool bandages the doctor had ordered to be frequently renewed, were reducing the swelling of his injured ankle; his favourite room was neatly swept and dusted; a bright fire burned in the grate; and on the small table set for two, that was drawn up beside his lounge, a tempting little dinner steamed savourily.

"I'll give her half as much again as I gave Kitty," the Colonel declared, as he drank his coffee. "I haven't eaten such an apple turnover since I ate those my mother used to make." And he beamed approvingly upon her while she removed the dishes.

Robin lounged about the house reading, smoking, talking prospects and politics with his father, apparently well satisfied with his dull holiday.

One dreary, dismal February evening, when the rain was coming down in noisy sheets, and the trees were waving their black arms in contortions of unrest, the old man, who had been hobbling about the corridors with the aid of his stick, called to the girl, when he saw her lighting the hall lamp.

"Run upstairs, Dolly, like a good child, and bring me down the book you'll find on the window-sill of my room."

"Yes, sir," she answered, and ran up the stairs to fetch the book he required.

The Colonel heard a knock at the back door. He made his way to the kitchen. The large room was clean and well-lighted. There was an appetising smell of muffins and devilled ham in the air.

Rap-tap-tap! The Colonel opened the door.

A dripping boy sidled in, and stood looking up at the Colonel in a stupor of affright.

The Colonel, who always looked over the heads of his small neighbours, did not recognise the lad.

"Well?" he demanded. "What do you want?"

The little chap grew bold with the importance of his errand.

"Mother's had a spill," he said, "and want's Dorothy as soon as she can come."

"Dorothy? There's no Dorothy here."

"Oh, yes, there is—my sister, Dorothy Stine. There she is now. Mother's ill, Dorothy."

The girl in the doorway stood dazed a moment, her colour coming and going. Then a firm arm was clasped round her waist, and she was drawn gently forward

"What—what's this?" stammered the Colonel, staring hard at the girl and his son.

"This is my wife, father," said Robin. "We were married three weeks ago. I left her in the town the day I came from the city, until I learned how you would receive her. But, after I saw the real state of affairs, I persuaded her to give you a chance to learn to love her for her own sake."

"But," spluttered the Colonel, "the feud?"

"Let it die a natural death," advised Robin. "Get your hat, dear, and a coat, I'll take you over to your mother's."

When they returned the master of the house, sitting by the fire, looked up and said, "I—I hope your mother is better."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NO MORE DANGER FROM DROWNING

Either from Accident, Inability to Swim, or from Cramp, when wearing the

"MINNOW" LIFE BELT

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN, and CHILDREN.

This invention is of the utmost simplicity, being a belt which can be inflated in less than a minute, and it is so constructed that in the event of accidents, the wearer is turned into a floating position, with face well out of the water. The objection to most of the appliances at present in the market is their bulkiness and difficulty in immediately insuring aid; this has been carefully considered, and, without incommoding a swimmer, combines at the same time the maximum of security with a minimum of difficulty. The belt can be carried conveniently in the pocket, ready for immediate wear; it weighs from eight ounces, according to size, is made of the best and strongest materials, will bear a pressure of 200 to 300 lbs., and withstand any climate. To those visiting the seaside it will be found most valuable; parents can with perfect confidence allow their children to bathe without fear of danger. It will also prove invaluable to anyone yachting or boating, also to those learning to swim; and to passengers making ocean voyages this safeguard is an absolute necessity. The value of the invention is attested by its large sale, the very flattering testimonials received by the patentee from all parts of the world, and the Belts being used not only on some of H.M. ships, and by coast-guardsmen, but also by yachtsmen, and others connected with the sea. Worn as an ordinary belt. State size of waist. Price 7s. 6d. for a 21-inch belt; each additional inch 3d. extra. Post-free U.K. Cash to accompany all orders. Cheques to be crossed "Bank of Liverpool."

For further particulars, apply—

W. R. HARGREAVES, Waterloo, nr. Liverpool.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

FOR

TRADESMEN'S WINDOWS, FASCIAS, SIGNS, OR TABLETS.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

Most Effective Medium

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

ENAMELLED IRON PLATES.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

Call and see our Stock, or send for Price Lists.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

Only Address—

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise. A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case. Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. S. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON S.W.

RUBBER STAMPS

Free by Post.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your Monogram, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,

92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

NOSE

Ugly shape altered and redness cured, permanently. Stamped envelope for full particulars, LEES RAY, Specialist, Waverltree, Liverpool. Treatment thorough. Uniquely testimonialised by Clients and by Press.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s. 6d.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.

LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.

LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S

M.B. FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth. For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

30 YEARS SUCCESS AMONG THE DEAF.

The Rev. E. J. SILVERTON, Specialist, of Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, will be happy to send his book on the Ear, "How to Cure without the Use of Instruments, or Operation." Price 6d. Sufferers from Deafness, Noises, or Discharges in the Ears should obtain this work, or consult E. J. S. by letter or personally. Hours, Monday and Tuesday, 11 to 4 other days 11 to 12 only. Wonderful cases:—A person cured after 40 years' deafness, and one of the age of 90. A gentleman after 17 years' deafness cured. A remarkable case of a lady at Grimsby substantiated by a Clergyman, Addresses on application. All communications as above.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention paper.

Patronised by Royalty.

SILK UMBRELLAS

Direct from the Manufacturer, 2/6 each.

Ladies' or Gents' Plain or Twill Silk. Parker's Hollow-Ribbed Frames, Carved and Mounted Sticks.

THE "PARKER" UMBRELLA REGISTERED.

Sent Parcel Post Free, 2/9 Postal Order (or 36 Stamps).

Re-covering neatly done, Plain or Twill Silk, Ladies' or Gents', 2/6 each, returned next post. List and Testimonials Free.

J. B. PARKER, Umbrella Works, Broom Close, SHEFFIELD.

"SKIN TROUBLES."

Eczema, irritation, and all skin troubles are cured merely by using "ANTECZEMA." Of Chemists, &c., or post free for 1s. 3d., of the ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Book on diet, &c., free.

SOUND WHITE TEETH

Ensured by use of "Ibis Tooth Powder," 1s. boxes, post free, from the ANTECZEMA CO., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Samples free for one stamp.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' CO.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S STRENGTHENING SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from

THE INFANTINA CO.,

LONDON, S.W.

Digitized by Google

All communications respecting Advertisements for "Short Stories" should be sent to the Advertisement Department.

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 290.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 21, 1894. [Price One Penny.

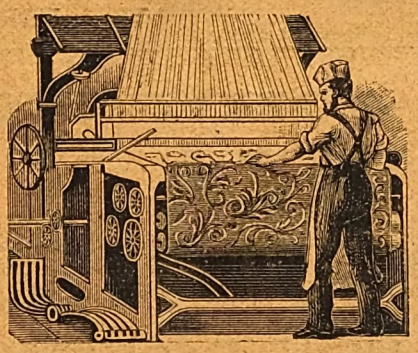
EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS.

4/- LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. 4/-

EACH. EACH.

THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 stamps, we will forward direct from our looms to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.



GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says: "unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our Customers:

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.

M. Lock writes:—"I received the Carpets, Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.

Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. Hargreaves.

Established 1872. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY,

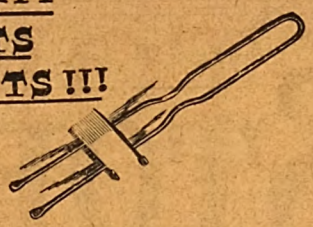
31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

All communications respecting Advertisements for "Short Stories" should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

A HAIR PIN

WITHOUT POINTS HAS GOOD POINTS !!!

SEE THE POINT ?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

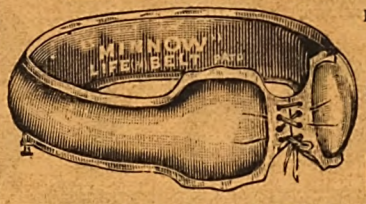
NO MORE DANGER FROM DROWNING



Either from Accident, Inability to Swim, or from Cramp, when wearing the

"MINNOW" LIFE BELT

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN, and CHILDREN.

This invention is of the utmost simplicity, being a belt which can be inflated in less than a minute, and it is so constructed that in the event of accidents, the wearer is turned into a floating position, with face well out of the water. The objection to most of the appliances at present in the market is their bulkiness and difficulty in immediately insuring aid; this has been carefully considered, and, without incommoding a swimmer, combines at the same time the maximum of security with a minimum of difficulty. The belt can be carried conveniently in the pocket, ready for immediate wear; it weighs from eight ounces, according to size, is made of the best and strongest materials, will bear a pressure of 200 to 300 lbs., and withstand any climate. To those visiting the seaside it will be found most valuable; parents can with perfect confidence allow their children to bathe without fear of danger. It will also prove invaluable to anyone yachting or boating, also to those learning to swim; and to passengers making ocean voyages this safeguard is an absolute necessity. The value of the invention is attested by its large sale, the very flattering testimonials received by the patentee from all parts of the world, and the Belts being used not only on some of H.M. ships, and by coastguardsmen, but also by yachtsmen, and others connected with the sea. Worn as an ordinary belt. State size of waist. Price 7s. 6d. for a 21-inch belt; each additional inch 3d. extra. Post-free U.K. Cash to accompany all orders. Cheques to be crossed "Bank of Liverpool."

For further particulars, apply—

W. R. HARGREAVES, Waterloo, nr. Liverpool.

30 YEARS SUCCESS AMONG THE DEAF.

The Rev. E. J. SILVERTON, Specialist, of Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, will be happy to send his book on the Ear, "How to Cure without the Use of Instruments, or Operation." Price 6d.

Sufferers from Deafness, Noises, or Discharges in the Ears should obtain this work, or consult E. J. S. by letter or personally. Hours, Monday and Tuesday, 11 to 4 other days 11 to 12 only. Wonderful cases:—A person cured after 40 years' deafness, and one of the age of 90. A gentleman after 17 years' deafness cured. A remarkable case of a lady at Grimsby substantiated by a Clergyman. Addresses on application. All communications as above.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

For Tradesmen's Windows, Fascias, Signs, or Tablets.

The durability, elegance, and striking brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the Most Effective Medium of all kinds of indoor and outdoor advertisements. Enamelled Iron Plates. Swinging Signs in great variety.

Call and see our stock, or send for price lists.

Near the Farringdon Road Station.
Inventors and Manufacturers.
Agents wanted.

ONLY ADDRESS:—
61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 290.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 21, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A Lost Soul

IT was a chance remark, and one that is often made concerning an intelligent animal, but its effect upon my friend Sidney Darrow was very remarkable indeed.

His shoulders twitched nervously, and his hand went up to his throat as though something choked him.

I have a large mastiff that I call Wodan. A moment before he had left his accustomed place on the rug in the corner of the room and had come to my side to receive the caress which at intervals through the day he seems to find necessary to his happiness. As I smoothed his wrinkled forehead and patted his soft large ears, I observed with what trustful affection his great eyes beamed on me.

It was then that I remarked to Sidney Darrow, who sat near at hand carelessly watching us through the smoke of his pipe:

"Does it not seem to you sometimes that Wodan has a very human look?"

And my friend made answer with the peculiar motions which I have described.

Wodan left my side and walked slowly back to his rug. Darrow watched his movements with half-closed eyes, his hand still clutching his throat. When the dog had laid down, my friend turned his gaze upon me.

"Don't—don't ever say that about Wodan again. It will make me hate him."

He was plainly much disturbed, and the seriousness of his appeal was not to be doubted.

Presently, before I was ready to make any reply, he separated the heavy beard that covered his chin and neck, disclosing a deep zigzag scar.

"See here," he said, "I never showed you this."

"What made it—a burn?"

"No. Let me tell you the story."

* * * *

All Rights Reserved

There was a period in my life, some years ago, that I spent on my uncle's ranch in Australia. At that time, as I believe it is now, the raising of sheep was one of the chief industries of Victoria, and much of the land in our vicinity was devoted to pasturage.

About half-a-mile from my uncle's house, in a lonely valley, stood the hut of a herder—built of wood, repulsive without, cheerless within, grim and squalid, that one might think he had constructed it about himself, as the nautilus does his shell.

He was a tall, hard-visaged Basque, with a great shaggy black beard, haggard features, and eyes that you could not look into without a shudder. Do you understand what I mean? He was one of those wild beasts of men whose faces, seen but once, live always in your memory; and when sleep will not come they show themselves—bodiless masks as they are—through your tightly closed eyelids.

The trail of the valley passed within a few yards of the hut, and my duties—I assisted my uncle in the management of the ranch—frequently led me in that direction. When not away on the hillside with his flock of sheep, the herder usually stood or squatted motionless in front of his hovel. A few feet away from him crouched his dog.

The pair, man and beast, stared at me from the moment I came in sight, until I passed amongst the oaks beyond, making no movement, save a slow turning of the head, and offering no response to my salutation. At last I came to pass them in silence, but never without a vague sense of dread.

I learned from the men on my uncle's ranch that the Basque was considered queer, or, as they expressed it, "locoed." They said he was in the habit of talking to his dog, as though he were a man, and that even his fellow-countrymen feared and avoided him.

Crazy he may have been; a drunkard he certainly was. At frequent intervals he appeared in the town with a large black demijohn, which he carried away filled with liquor of the sort that makes men maniacs.

One afternoon, as I came down the valley, I heard the yelping of a dog, and, approaching the hut of the Basque, I beheld a sight that filled me with anger and distress.

The fellow had hung up the dog by the hind legs against the side of the house, and was beating him with a large knotted stick.

I did not stop to think much of consequences. I did as you or any man who has ever known a dog would have done. I jumped from the saddle, and drawing my knife as I ran, cut the animal down. Then I turned and faced the Basque.

I suppose he thought I was armed—which I was not—for he did not take up the gage of battle—but stared at me fiercely out of bloodshot eyes. The dog hobbled away to a short distance, shook off the riata with which its legs were ensnarled, and, crouching low, watched us.

"Come," I said in Spanish; "why should you kill your dog? You have drunk too much. To-morrow you will be glad that I saved his life."

He emitted a strange sound through his teeth and lips. It was very like the snarl of a wolf.

"If you do not care for the dog, will you sell him?" I asked.

Digitized by Google

"No!" he replied with an oath, "I will not sell him; I mean to kill him!"

"Very well," I said, "if you do wish to take the animal's life, shoot him; but you shall not beat him to death."

The Basque turned towards the hut muttering imprecations against the dog and myself. When he came to the door he called to the dog,

"Demonio, come here!"

The animal eyed him, but did not move. Then the herder disappeared from view in the dark interior of the hovel.

I remounted, and continued on my way down the trail. I had gone about a hundred yards when suddenly there was a crashing in the chaparral behind, and I wheeled hastily round, to discover the dog. He had followed, evidently for the purpose of making my acquaintance, and to thank me for the rescue.

I called to him, and patted the side of my saddle, meaning that he should come where I might touch him. He started to obey, but as he approached nearer, my horse gave a violent snort, showed signs of fear, and began to shy away from him.

The act surprised me not a little, for the animal was a stolid old bronco that rarely started at anything, least of all at a dog. The dog stopped his advance and watched us, while I struggled to bring the horse nearer to him, and to calm his very evident terror.

But my efforts were unavailing, though I used whip and spur, and threw all my strength on the bridle. The horse would not allow the dog to touch him. For some strange cause he even trembled in his presence. At last I gave up the undertaking, and examined the Basque's companion from a little distance.

He was considerably larger than the average collie. I imagined that he must have had some Newfoundland, or, perhaps, St. Bernard blood—the sheep dogs of Australia are rarely of pure breed. His hair was short, curly, and black as night. He squatted on his haunches and looked steadily at me during the time that I was occupied in making this survey; and when at last I spoke to him, he lifted his ears a little, but made no other movement.

"Demon," I said, "is that your name—Demonio?"

"Let me tell you the story."

At first I thought that the name had been given him because he was dark in colour, as the popular belief paints an evil spirit. But a moment later, when my eyes rested on him, I saw, or I should say I felt, that there might be some further reason. I scarcely know how to describe the effect that his steady gaze produced upon me.

It was at first merely an impression that this dog was different from any of his species that I had ever known before; then a conviction that something was wrong; and then, an uncontrollable terror. These sensations followed one another in quick succession, almost in a flash; and without stopping to ask myself any questions, I gave my horse free rein and we plunged headlong down the trail.

Once again in the open plain, I tried to deceive myself into thinking that my terror had been only apprehension lest the Basque should come upon me from behind. The rapid descent of the twilight, and the peculiar behaviour of the horse, served to heighten the effect of this dread.

A few days later, when I passed the hut, the herder and his dog, in their usual attitudes, stared at me, sullen and silent. I looked closely at the dog's face, but could see nothing beyond keen animal intelligence.

Several months passed.

One morning, as I went out towards the corral, one of the men employed on the ranch came up to me and said:

"I believe that something has happened to that crazy Basque sheep-herder. His dog came here last night and would not go away."

"What, Demon?" I said, and as I spoke the animal came running up. I patted his head and talked to him, but he jumped uneasily about, as though he were anxious to be gone.

I suggested to the man that we should ride to the valley, and mounting, we followed the dog out into the road. He ran along several yards in advance of us, looking back occasionally to make sure that we were coming. When the valley was reached his pace slackened, and some distance from the hut he stopped and fell in behind us.

"He dreads a beating," said I.

From the trail we called to the hut, and receiving no answer we rode to the door and looked in.

There lay the Basque in the middle of the floor, his arms outstretched, and his head thrown back—dead.

An uncared-for corpse is always a disagreeable object to look upon, but something had happened to this one that rendered it impossible for me to give it more than one quick glance.

I hastily turned my horse's head away, and rode over toward the spot where the dog was crouching. The man, more resolute than I, dismounted, and went into the hut. When he came out again he said:

"I covered it over with one of those sheepskins, so it wouldn't scare anyone else. His bottle was lying near him, and I guess he must have drunk himself to death. That was probably done by coyotes, or maybe a mountain lion."

We rode to town, where we gave notice to the authorities of the man's death and also to several of his countrymen. In talking with one of the latter I asked what disposition would be made of the dead man's sheep and of his dog.

"The sheep," answered the man, "were not his; he had sold them. As to the dog, nobody wants the brute, I imagine."

"Why not?"

The man shrugged his shoulders, and looked askance at Demon, who had followed me.

"Very well," I said, "then I will take him."

No objection was made, and Demon passed into my possession.

My uncle had several hundred sheep, which were tended by an old native Australian and his son. I took Demon to them, and offered his services in the care of the flock. To my surprise they refused. I urged the matter, and finally demanded the ground of their opposition. At last the old man said:

"He looks like a sheep-killer."

This accounted for the refusal of the Basque shepherds to take the dog; they, too, suspected him. Knowing how prone such men were to superstitious prejudices, I would not allow the animal to be condemned without cause.

He shook his head. Then I asked if anyone had ever seen the dog prowling about at night, or behaving in a suspicious manner? Again he shook his head.

Digitized by Google

One of the men employed on the ranch came up to me.

"It is all nonsense," I said, finding myself fairly forced into the position of the dog's defender.

"Now, I tell you," said the old shepherd, "I know that dog. I think that a bad dog. I will show you something."

He went into his hut and brought out two half-grown puppies—lively, wriggling little fellows—and put them down on the ground before Demon.

"You see," he said, "puppies always try to play with strange dogs—never afraid of them. Look! I told you he was a bad dog."

The infants waddled up to Demon, who approached them wagging his tail good-humouredly. The instant they got a good view of his face they whirled about and went off ki-yi-ing at a great rate of speed.

The performance struck me as amusing, and I laughed, but the old shepherd looked very grave.

"A bad dog," he reiterated slowly, "very bad."

"Well," I said, "I will take him myself, since you will not. But if I ever learn"—here I instinctively looked down into the dog's face, as though speaking to him—"if I ever learn that he has killed a sheep I shall have him shot."

The dog's eyes looked into mine with a keen, intelligent gaze; and I could not resist the belief that he had understood.

It is not improbable that my prejudice against the animal was even stronger than that of the shepherd's; but as I was an educated, reasoning man, proud of my freedom from every form of superstition, how could I bring myself to countenance such irrational fancies?

On the contrary, my duty seemed to lie in the opposite course, to defy this prejudice and to protect and defend the object at which it was levelled. Besides, I had come to feel a powerful curiosity with regard to this creature which, though apparently inoffensive, was so generally hated and feared.

What was it that inspired all other animals with such distrust of him? Not my horse alone, but every quadruped on the place manifested a very evident unwillingness to have him about. The other dogs would not associate with him. Yet he was not quarrelsome or bad-tempered.

One thing he did which, though not a serious fault, was often annoying. He had a habit of watching closely every motion of the person nearest him—usually myself. Sometimes I almost imagined that I could feel his eyes, when I did not see them, his gaze was so constant and intense.

Demon had been in my possession several weeks, when all at once I began to hear complaints about the killing of sheep. Every morning a fresh victim was found dead—now of one flock and now of another, yet all within a limited range.

They were all mutilated in the same way, and the work was plainly that of a dog practised in sheep-killing. As I had expected, suspicion immediately fell upon Demon; and one morning, when I came out of the house, I found a couple of herders waiting to see me.

They had no evidence against the dog, yet they demanded that he should be put to death. The injustice of it roused my indignation, and calling Demon to me I said:

"I want you to look at him. You say that a sheep was killed last night. Where is there any signs of blood about his jaws?"

One of them examined Demon's mouth, but found no mark of a slaughter. The other said:

"That does not prove anything. A regular sheep-killer does not spill much blood, and sometimes he learns to wash it off."

This sounded improbable to me, but I did not argue the matter.

"Very well," I said, "to-night Demon shall be shut up in the corral, and if a sheep is killed we shall know that he is not the guilty dog."

They shook their heads. "He will find some way of getting out of the corral," said one of them.

"Then he shall sleep in my room with me," I said, "and the doors and shutters shall be closed. Does that suit you?"

This arrangement seemed to satisfy them, and they went away.

That night I took Demon into my room, and gave him a mat in the corner for a bed. His only possible means of escape was by the door or the window. I locked the door and closed the venetian shutter and hooked it in place. Then I went to bed and almost immediately fell asleep.

In the morning, when I woke, Demon lay upon his mat apparently in sound slumber.

I began to dress. When I was nearly done my uncle rapped at the door.

"Have you Demon in there?" he called out.

"Yes," I answered opening the door.

He exhibited much surprise. "Another sheep was killed last night," said he.

"Well," I replied, "that merely proves what I said—that Demon is innocent."

"Yes, of course," said my uncle, looking doubtfully at the dog. He went over to the window and inspected the fastening.

"Impossible," he said.

"For him to open it?" I asked—"of course."

My uncle threw the shutters back and pointed significantly at the flower-bed below. The plants had been crushed down and the earth displaced, and round about were numerous dog-tracks.

"That was not there yesterday," said he.

My room was on the ground floor and from the window to the earth was only two or three feet. Had the shutters been open the dog might easily have climbed out and in again, but it had been locked all night.

I turned and looked at Demon. He was watching us steadily with the expression in his eyes that I knew and dreaded.

"Yes," I answered opening the door.

Digitized by Google

My uncle made another examination of the fastening of the shutter. At last he said, "I am convinced that the sheep-killer is not Demon. There is no dog in existence who could manipulate that crooked hook to open the shutter. Those footprints were left there by some stray animal."

The conviction seemed inevitable, and I agreed with him. At the same time I was resolved to try the experiment again, and watch the dog more carefully.

That night I shut Demon in as before, and closed and fastened both door and shutter. There was a full moon, which made the landscape bright as day without, and it occurred to me, just as I was about to turn out my lamp, that I could throw open the upper section of the shutter and admit the light.

It fell in a broad white square directly across the mat where the dog lay, and after I got into bed I found that I could watch him easily, without turning my head upon the pillow.

Then I discovered that he was watching me. There was nothing unusual about that—only his eyes were strangely bright.

I tossed about in the bed for a time, but he never moved.

At last I determined to deceive him into the belief that I was asleep. I closed my eyes and presently by a careless movement drew the lace edge of the pillow-slip across my face. Thus I could watch him and yet conceal the fact that my eyes were open.

When I had lain in this position motionless for perhaps ten minutes, Demon suddenly lifted his head and turned it on one side. Plainly he was listening—for what I could not imagine. He put his head down and for another ten minutes did not move. Then gradually and noiselessly he rose to his feet and came towards the bed. A little distance away he stopped and listened again. Evidently he did not hear what he had expected, for after standing a moment he returned to his corner and lay down.

Suddenly I found the explanation of his strange conduct. He had listened to my breathing that he might determine if I slept.

Resolved to deceive him, if possible, I began to slowly lengthen my respiration, and to expel it with more sound and force.

The thing sprang at my throat.

At the end of a few minutes I saw that I was succeeding in my design. A second time he rose with perfect stillness and came to the bed. His face wore an expression of devilish cunning, so utterly foreign to his customary mien that under other circumstances I should have failed to recognise him. A swift flash of satisfaction in his eye showed that he thought me asleep, and he turned to the window to make his escape.

His motions were slow and cautious, reminding me of a cat rather than a dog. I had expected him to make some slight noise in unhooking the shutter, for I doubt if I myself, with my life in hazard, could have accomplished it inaudibly. But there was no sound to be heard in the room except that of my slow, steady respiration.

I think it must have taken him five minutes to draw the hook. Then the shutter was swung back quietly inch by inch, and his way was clear.

He stood for a moment with his forepaws upon the window-sill and looked back at me. As he did so, I felt again the same strange impression of terror that had overwhelmed me the first time my eyes met his in that lonely valley. For an instant I held my breath, and had he continued to look he must have discovered that I was not asleep. But now, with a sudden yet noiseless leap, he went out of the window—gone on his murderous quest.

It was several minutes before I ventured to move. At last I rose and went to the window. Far away, where the bright moonlight fell upon the side of the hill, I could see a small piece of darkness scudding swiftly along. It was Demon on his way to the sheep pastures.

I scarcely know what impulse sent me, but I went to the closet in my room, took down a large navy revolver, and when I got back into bed, slipped it underneath my pillow. I did not then, and I will not now, confess to any real fear of the dog—that is to say, physical fear.

There was dread—a vague indistinct horror—at something unexplainable that I seemed to see in his eyes. But had I really feared him I should have immediately closed the shutter, rendering his return quite impossible.

I lay still and watched for an hour. The nearest flocks, I knew, could be reached in a few minutes, and his return might be expected at any time. I drew the lace over my eyes again and listened for the sound that should indicate his approach.

Suddenly a great black head appeared in the window—without warning—materialised as it seemed out of the darkness of the night. In it two round red lights gleamed like coals of fire. The moon shone clear and full on his head, and I could plainly see the blood and foam with which his jaws were covered.

He climbed slowly into the room. Then, with an ingenuity that was even more than human, he drew the shutter back—noiselessly—and fastened it in place.

He gave one quick glance at me, and went over to his corner. Through the network of lace I watched him, while he licked the bloodstains from his feet and washed his face and neck, with the motions and attitudes of a cat.

I grew faint with the horror of it all, and at last forgot the part which I was playing, and ceased to counterfeit the respiration of one who sleeps. Even when Demon suddenly started up, looked at me and listened, I did not notice my mistake.

Then he came nearer to the bed, a few feet away, and glared at me out of those horrible eyes.

That was the moment in which I saw the thing and understood it all. You will not believe it. I don't ask that you should, but I saw through that creature's eyes down into the lost human soul that occupied its body.

It was the soul of a murderer—the destroyer of the drunken Basque in his lonely hovel, the slayer of the sheep—now, at last, throwing off all disguise.

With a strange half-animal and half-human cry the thing sprang at my throat, I threw my hand up and it missed its aim, the teeth closing only on the skin. The next instant I fired the revolver, and it rolled over dead.

The wound was not serious, but it left that ugly-looking scar. There is another scar that the experience left, which is probably much larger, if one could see it. I mean on my memory.

Digitized by Google

THE JEW OF ROUDNIA.

I WAS travelling post-haste through Poland on most important business, and stopped for a change of horses at a little village called Roudnia. Here, as everywhere in this country, the population is divided into Jews and Catholics, and a church sacred to each religion lends dignity to the miserable collection of huts which constitutes a town in Poland.

While the horses were being unharnessed, I stretched my cramped limbs by a brisk walk up and down the bit of road before the post-station. Night was coming on and a singular rosy light appeared in the sky, against which the cross of the Catholic church loomed blackly.

"There is a fire in the town," said my driver laconically. "It is the house of a Jew."

"How do you know?" I asked in surprise.

"Ouf!" said the man, "I can smell the grease!" He was a Russian.

On a long weary journey any incident is a distraction.

"It is not far; I will walk on," I said. "You may follow when your horses are ready."

When I reached the scene of the fire, a great crowd had gathered. My driver was right; the house of a Jewish butcher was burning. The Jews were running in and out of the building, saving what they could carry in their arms. The Catholics stood with folded arms watching the progress of the flames. The butcher, himself, had gathered his family of frightened children together on one side of the road, and beside them, on a pallet stretched on the ground, he had laid his wife, with her new-born baby at her breast. He turned and looked at the burning house and his cries rent the air.

"Ah! God of Israel! What a loss!"

"We have saved a great deal," said a neighbour, pointing to the furniture piled on the road.

"But not everything—not everything!" wailed the Jew. "I have lost ——" he broke off with a sharp cry as his eyes rested on his family group by the roadside. "God of Israel! my mother! my old mother!"

The woman on the pallet rose with a groan. The cries of the children mingled with her sobs. A shudder ran through the crowd. Even the Catholics were stirred. A Jewess—yes! But a woman—an old woman.

The soldier lifted the figure of the woman high in the air.

The Jew took a step toward the burning house, but his wife, who had struggled toward him, fell into his arms.

"You shall not!" she cried, holding him fiercely.

"God of Israel!" shrieked the Jew, "she is paralysed! Who will save her? I will give half my fortune. I will give five roubles!"

Not a soul stirred.

"I will give half my fortune!" repeated the Jew, desperately.

A huge Cossack stepped from the crowd of Catholics. It was plainly to be seen that he had been drinking heavily.

"Pig!" he said, addressing the Jew, "where is your mother?"

"In the room to the left, my good kind friend! In the room where the fire has not yet reached, my noble friend!" whined the Jew.

"And you will give five roubles? Good. You hear?" turning to the crowd. There was a murmur of assent. He set his shoulders and took a long whiff of his pipe. "Peste! it looks warm in there!"

With a bound he disappeared in the smoke pouring from the open doorway. The crowd shivered in silence. Scarcely an instant passed before the huge figure of the Cossack struggled back through the blinding smoke, carrying a light burden in his great arms. His hair and beard were burned, and his face was blackened, but he had not removed his pipe from his mouth. The crowd broke into a wild cheer.

"There is the old woman," he said, placing her not ungently on the ground. "She has fainted—that is all! Give me my money!"

"What!" cried the Jew, his avarice reasserting itself now that fear was at rest. "At once, my good friend? Ah! that cannot be. I have not so much as that here with me. You must give me time to pay; when my affairs are settled; when I have rebuilt my house."

The Cossack advanced furiously upon him. From force of habit the Jew raised his arm to ward off a blow.

"Dog of a Jew!" thundered the soldier. "Do you think you can play with me? Do you think it was for pleasure I went into that fire? Give me the money!"

"I am a poor man," whimpered the Jew, "but the living God knows I am honest. I pay my debts."

He drew a greasy wallet from his breast, and fumbling in its depths, fished out a ragged piece of paper. As he held it out to the soldier the roof of the burning building fell with a crash, and a shower of sparks was scattered over the crowd. A great volume of smoke rose in the air and the flames leapt and danced like devils.

The Cossack glanced at the dirty piece of paper and, with an oath, flung it back in the Jew's face.

"Dog!" he thundered, "Thief! robber! One rouble——."

"The rest in good time," began the Jew. "In good——."

"One rouble!" roared the Cossack. "Is that a price for entering a burning house? Good! You shall see me enter it again for nothing."

With incredible swiftness, he picked up the helpless figure of the old paralytic, and, before the crowd could gather his intent, rushed toward the burning ruin. Nothing remained of the building but the door-frame outlined blackly against the vivid background of fire. The soldier sprang on the sill, with a roar like a beast in rage, lifted the figure of the woman high in the air, and, with all his strength, flung it from him unhesitatingly into the bed of fire.

It was so sudden, so awful, that not a sound escaped the crowd.

I was stunned by the horrible tragedy—sickened by the infernal picture still before me. The silent, horror-stricken crowd swaying and surging before that sea of fire, the huge figure of the Cossack grotesque and awful in silhouette, the agonised face of the Jewish woman, ghastly in the red light!

The voice of my driver reached me. I seemed to hear it from a great distance:

"Your Excellency, the horses are waiting."

To prevent unnecessary labour, and consequent disappointment, to any readers of this paper, who in the past have forwarded original stories for insertion, we would take this opportunity of saying that our arrangements for the provision of matter for "Short Stories" are complete for some time to come.

Digitized by Google

THE OLD PEOPLE.

"A LETTER?"

"Yes, Monsieur, it is from Paris."

Good old Father Azan was proud that it came from Paris. Not I. Something seemed to tell me this dainty Paris letter, from Jean, Jacques Street, coming so unexpectedly and so early in the morning, would torment me and take up my entire day. That I was not mistaken you may see. Thus ran the letter:

"Would you be good enough to do something for me, my friend? Close your mill for the day and go immediately to Eyguières. Eyguières is a small village six or seven miles from your house—only a pleasant walk. When you reach there, ask for the Orpheline Convent. The first house beyond the convent is low, with green blinds and a garden in the rear.

"You must enter without knocking—the door is always open—and on entering call out, 'Good morning, good people, I am a friend of Maurice.' Then you will see two little old people. Oh, very, very old—as old as anyone you have ever seen. Seated in their great armchairs, they will hold out their hands to you. Greet them warmly, with all your heart, as though they belonged to you.

"Then begin to talk. They will talk to you of me alone. They will tell you of a thousand of my childish pranks, but you must not smile. Listen, but do not laugh—do you understand? They are my grandparents, two beings to whom I am all the world, and who have not seen me for ten years. Ten years! A long time! Yes; but what can I do? Paris holds me captive. As for them, they would come to me but for their age. If they tried to come they would die on the way.

"Happily, you are near them, my dear Miller, and in seeing you those pobr old folk will feel they have seen a part of me. I have often spoken to them of you, our good friendship that——."

"Plague take friendship!"

It was, indeed, a charming day, but not the day to walk along country roads. A violent, north-west wind blew, and, besides, it was too sunny to walk. When this tormenting letter arrived, I had already determined on a shelter between two rocks. There I planned to spend the whole day and bask in the sunlight like a lizard and listen to the sighing pines. But what was I to do? I closed my mill, growling and grumbling meanwhile, hid the key in a hole, took my stick and my pipe, and departed.

I arrived at Eyguières in about two hours. The village was deserted—everybody in the fields. In dusty elm trees by the roadside the grasshoppers hummed. Before the Mayor's office was a mule sunning himself, a flock of pigeons on the fountain in the churchyard, but no one to tell me of the Orpheline Convent.

Fortunately, an old woman appeared suddenly, sat down in the shadow of the doorway and began to spin. I told her what I wished to find, and, like a witch, she seemed all-powerful, for she raised her distaff and pointed. There before my very eyes was the convent. It was a large building, dull and black, and proudly above the porch, in a pointed arch, was an old red snag cross, with a short Latin inscription round it.

By the side of this building I saw a small house. Green blinds, a garden at the rear. I recognised it immediately and entered without knocking.

All my life I shall remember the long, clean, cool hallway, the rose-tinted walls, with their panels of flowers and faded violins, and the little garden at the end, with its wealth of colour. It seemed as though I had gone back to the time of Sedan, and stood in some old bailiff's house.

At the end of the hall, to the left, through a door half open, I could hear the tic-tac of a great clock, and the voice of a child—a school child—who, in reading, stopped at each syllable.

"When Saint—I—re—née—call—ed—out—I—was—the—wheat—of—the—mas—ter—I had—to—be—bro—ken—by the—teeth—of—these—an-i-mals."

Softly I approached and looked in.

In the quiet and half-light of the little room was an old man with red cheeks, and wrinkled to the tips of his fingers. There he was, asleep in his chair, his mouth open, his hands on his knees. At his feet was a little girl dressed in blue—a long cape and a little hood, the costume of the convent orphans—reading the life of Saint Irenée out of a great book as big as herself. This reading affected all alike.

The old man slept in his chair, the flies on the ceiling and the canaries in their cage by the window—all slept. The great clock kept up its tic-a-tac, tic-tac. Only a beam of sunlight moved; glinting through the closed shutters it danced and shone. In the midst of this calm the child gravely kept on her reading:

"Sud-den-ly-two-li-ons-pre-cip-i-ta-ted-them-selves-on-him, and-de-vour-ed-him."

Just then I entered.

If the lions that precipitated themselves on Saint Irenée had entered the room, greater consternation could not have been. The child screamed and let the book fall to the floor, the canaries and the flies woke up, the clock struck, and the old man, sitting up with a start, stared.

As for me, I stood on the threshold, a little disconcerted, but said in a clear voice: "Good day, good people. I am a friend of Maurice."

Oh, if you could have seen the old man—if you could have seen him come towards me with his arms stretched out, and fold me close, shake my hand and wander round the room, saying, "Oh, my! Oh, my!" All the wrinkles in his face smiled. He blushed and stammered, "Ah, monsieur and monsieur!" Then going to the door he called, "Mamette!"

A door opened, and the sound of a light, quick, mouse-like footfall in the passage—it was Mamette. Nothing could be prettier than this old lady, with her high shell-comb, her carmelite dress, and carrying in her hand her lace handkerchief, according to the old-fashioned custom, to do me honour.

How beautiful! How tenderly beautiful! They two resembled each other. With the aid of the comb and gown the little old man might have been mistaken for Mamette herself. Only Mamette's face showed the trace of sorrow. She was more wrinkled. Evidently she had shed many tears during her life. But, like him, she had a little orphan, with the inevitable blue cape, by her side. It was a touching sight to see these old people protected, as it were, by the little orphan tots.

On entering, Mamette began to make me a deep curtsey, but one word from her husband cut the bow in two. "He is a friend of Maurice." Then she began to tremble, she cried, lost her handkerchief, blushed, grew redder and redder, even more than he. These poor old people. At the slightest emotion the few drops of blood left in their veins mounted to their cheeks in a second.

"Quick, quick, a chair," she said to the little girl at her side.

"Open the blinds," said the old man to the child at his knee.

And each taking my hand they led me to the window to scan my face lineament by lineament. Then, between them in their armchairs, I seated myself in a folding chair, and with the children behind us the questions began.

"How is he? What is he doing? Why doesn't he come to see us? Is he happy?" etc., etc., for hours.

As for me, I answered as best I could, giving what details I knew concerning my friend, and inventing others, of which I was ignorant, even going as far as to declare his windows faced the best way, and what coloured paper he had on his walls.

"The paper of his bed-room?"

"It is blue, madame. Light blue, with garlands."

"Truly!" interrupted the dear little old lady. And turning to her husband she added, "Isn't he a great child!"

"Yes, indeed he is!" was the enthusiastic response. And all the time I talked it was between shakings of the head, little laughs, winkings of the eye, a manner of quiet understanding. Or, perhaps, the old gentleman would say, "Speak louder! She is somewhat hard of hearing." And then she would interrupt and whisper, "Just a little louder, please. He doesn't hear very well."

Digitized by Google

Then I would raise my voice and each would thank me with a smile, and with these smiles they would search my eyes for a trace of the picture of their Maurice. As for myself, I was too much moved to recall his face. It seemed vague, veiled, almost unrecognisable, as though I saw my friend smile on me through a mist.

Suddenly the old man got out of his chair. "But think, Mamette, perhaps he has not breakfasted!"

And Mamette, in her astonishment, raised her arms in the air, replied: "Not breakfasted? Mercy me!"

Believing they were still thinking of Maurice, I hastened to assure them that their good grandson never fasted beyond the noon hour. But no, indeed, it was of me they spoke, and it was touching to see their hurry when they learned I had not eaten.

"Quick! the tablecloth, children! The table in the middle of the room. The Sunday linen and the plates decorated with flowers. And don't waste any time, if you please, but hurry!"

And, indeed, no time could have been wasted, for before one could hardly turn round breakfast was there, served.

"Only a little breakfast," said Mamette, as she escorted me to the table. "You see, you will have to eat alone, for we ate ours earlier this morning."

Poor old people. At what hour must they have risen, and already breakfasted!

Mamette's little breakfast consisted of a small glass of milk, some dates, and a crisp white roll. It was enough to feed her and her canaries for at least a week.

There was great indignation round the table. The little blue-caped children nudged each other and whispered, while the canaries in the bottom of their cage seemed to say, "Oh, see that gentleman eating a whole roll!"

But, indeed, I did eat it all; and, meanwhile, without my kind host's perception, I furtively looked round this bright, peaceful room, which seemed to breathe a perfume from the past. I could not keep my eye off two little beds. I could imagine these two beds, almost like cradles, in the early morning, their fringed curtains still closed. The clock strikes three—the hour when old people waken. "Art thou asleep, Mamette?" "No, dear." "Isn't Maurice a good lad?" "Oh, yes, such a good lad!" I could seem to hear the conversation while I looked at those two little beds placed side by side.

While thus musing, a great commotion was going on at the other end of the room before the cupboard. He was trying to reach the very top shelf, where there were some brandied cherries which had been waiting ten years for Maurice, and which he now wanted opened for me. In spite of Mamette he would get those cherries himself, and, standing on a chair to the great terror of his wife, he tried to reach up.

Can you imagine the picture—the old man trembling and reaching up, the little blue-caped charity children holding the chair, and Mamette back of all, breathless, her arms held out? And from the open cupboard a great perfume of bergamot. Oh, it was charming!

Finally, after much effort, he brought out of the cupboard the famous jar and also an old silver cup, all embossed. It was the cup Maurice had when a little child. They would feed me with those cherries—Maurice had so loved them; and when serving me the old man whispered in my ear, with an appreciative air: "You ought to be very happy to eat these. My wife preserved them. You are going to have something fine."

Alas! his wife had made them, but she had forgotten to sugar them! That was only natural. One becomes childish as old age creeps on. The cherries were atrocious, my poor Maurice, but that did not prevent my eating them, just the same, without the least quiver of an eyelash.

. . . . . .

The repast finished, I rose to take leave of my hosts. They would have gladly kept me longer to talk of their Maurice, but day was darkening, my mill was far distant, and I had to go.

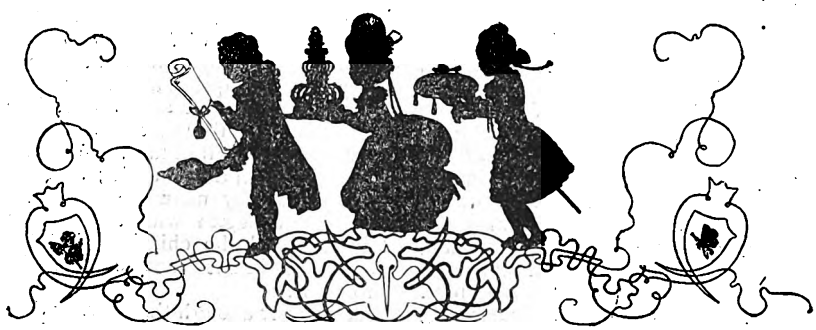
The old gentleman rose with me and said: "Mamette, my coat. I wish to escort him to the square." I felt sure Mamette thought at the bottom of her heart it was too cold for him to go out, but she said nothing.

Only when she helped him put his arms into the sleeves of his coat—a nice coat, Spanish tobacco in colour, with pearl buttons—I heard her say softly: "Thou wilt come back before it is too late, wilt thou not?" And he, with a little air of resistance, replied: "He, he; I do not know—perhaps."

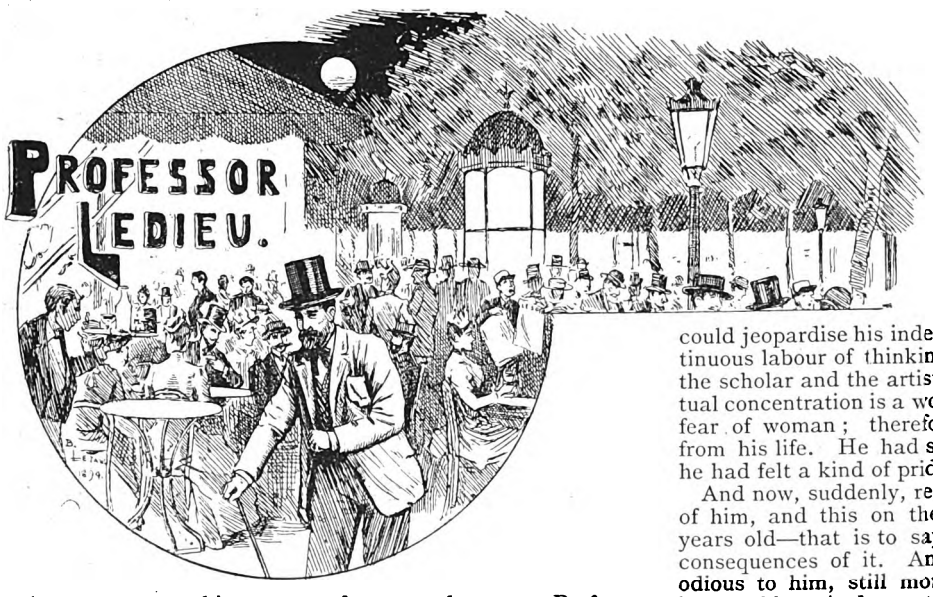
And then they looked laughingly at each other, and the little children laughed to see them laugh, and in their corner the canaries laughed, too, in their own way. Indeed, the odour of the cherries had affected all of them a little.

Night was falling when we left, the grandfather and I. The little maid followed us afar to lead him back. But he did not see her, and was proudly walking by my side, his arm in mine, like any other man.

Mamette, beaming from her doorway, shook her head proudly, as though to say: "All the same, my old husband walks as well as the best of them."



Digitized by Google



ACCORDING to his custom for several years, Professor Ledieu on Sunday evening, a few minutes before seven, turned the handle of the door that leads into the restaurant Cherbois, Place de la Sorbonne, Paris.

After a glorious day the sun was setting behind the little hills of Meudon, purpling with the last rays the gables of the houses of the square and the old dome, which glistened under the pure azure of the heavens. All Paris had been rushing into the country since morning, and was now returning in haste before nightfall. Everywhere the crowd, moving from the circumference to the centre, were filling the highways with bright toilets, gay countenances, ringing laughter and bundles of flowers, bringing into the depths of the old musty streets the assurance of spring and the perfumes of the country.

With a bow to the maid behind the bar, Professor Ledieu turned to the left and seated himself at a table placed in a corner beside the window, which was kept vacant for him each Sunday. After giving his hat to Leon, he sat down abruptly, threw his pamphlets on the table with a frown, and, when the waiter placed the bill of fare for the day in his hands, he perused it with a gloomy stare, as if he was reading there his sentence of death.

When Leon came to help him in making up his menu, he agreed silently with all the opinions of the waiter, but without responding this time with the benevolent smile with which he was in the habit of thanking him, and, as Leon disappeared, crying, "A printanier for one!" he murmured, "What can have happened to monsieur le professor this evening?"

However firm his will, what man is there who has not had his hour of discouragement? However plainly his way may be traced before him, who has not asked himself once in his life, "Have I followed my true path?".

This same day Professor Ledieu had entered his forty-eighth year. Attracted by the glorious sun, he had gone to take his Sunday walk into the woods of Meudon. By what odd reaction did it happen that all the joys of Nature condensed themselves into a profound sadness in his soul? How was it that this intellect, so well balanced, instead of pursuing the laborious dreams that made the enchantment of his whole life, should suddenly lay him flat in the groove of human realities?

Stopping to think for a moment, he had looked around him. Here and there, in the country, people were coming and going, laughing and chatting, families overflowing with little children, groups of noisy young people, all had been passing before his eyes, crossing him without even giving a single look in his direction, and he only had been alone.

Yes, alone with phantoms—Tiglath-Pilezer, Bel-Kat-Irassu, Sennacherib, Salmanazar, Semiramis—phantoms that haunt, penetrate, and envelop him. And now the intensity of the life that surrounds him makes this intimacy of his with the dead appear sinister to him. He is thinking that in a few hours he will be sitting alone at dinner, will then return to his obscure lodgings, will light his lamp, and there, too, will be alone in raising up his spectres; and for the first time in his life this abandonment weighs upon him, and he complains, and he suffers from that which till now he had considered the chief food of life—solitude.

He had so valiantly defended his beloved solitude. He had so resolutely banished from his path all that could jeopardise his independence and disturb him in that continuous labour of thinking which is the supreme pleasure of the scholar and the artist. The great enemy of this intellectual concentration is a woman. Therefore he had an instinctive fear of woman; therefore he had pitilessly eliminated her from his life. He had so far escaped from every chain, and he had felt a kind of pride in the fact.

And now, suddenly, regret for his misogamy took possession of him, and this on the very day when he was forty-eight years old—that is to say, when it was too late to escape the consequences of it. And now his beloved solitude became odious to him, still more odious from the fact that it was irreparable. And now the longing for feminine tenderness, for the family life, sprang up in him, held him fast, the more alluring that it could no longer be realised.

This thought seized him with irresistible force; it took entire possession of him. He walked with it the whole day, gloomy and despondent, under the blue sky and amid the verdure. He brought it back in the evening with him to Paris. He sat down with it at his solitary table at the restaurant Cherbois. It absorbed him to such an extent while he was eating his "printanier" that he did not see a new group of guests enter and take their places opposite him. But Leon having replaced the "printanier" by a "gigot Bretonne," as the professor was about to swallow the first mouthful, and had raised his eyes mechanically, the picture presented to him was such that he let fall his arm and fork, and remained open-mouthed, not tasting a morsel.

The group which thus riveted the attention of Professor Ledieu consisted of four persons—husband, wife, and two childen; evidently a family belonging to the class of little Parisian shopkeepers, who dine at the restaurant on Sundays, in order to give a holiday to the woman who does the cooking for the household the other days of the week.

She was pretty, this young mother. Her beautiful chestnut hair framed a rather refined face, somewhat pale, with irregular features, but lit up by two large laughing eyes. She had the roguish, self-possessed air of the Parisienne out for a holiday, as indefatigable in pleasure as in labour. With a graceful movement her hands rose to a level with her head to take off her hat, throwing her fine figure into relief as she bent backward, while the two children, a little girl of about seven, and a boy somewhat younger, clung to her. While replying to the questions of her husband—a brisk, squat, little fellow, with waxed moustache, hair brushed back from his forehead, and the gait of a corporal—who was asking her opinion on the bill of fare, she took off the children's hats and arranged them at the table; and soon the whole family being seated, the boy near the mother, the girl beside the father, the dinner began with a noise of dishes and forks, with laughter and the chirping of children—in fine, with an air of noisy merriment that completed the melancholy of the professor.

It was not enough that during the entire day the thought of his isolation had pursued and tortured him. It was still necessary that the spectacle of the happiness he had so long disdained, which he regretted now and to which he could never henceforward aspire, should be paraded under his very eyes. And yet these people were not very fortunate. It only required a glance to tell that their life was laborious and hard, their toil incessant, without hope of fortune possible. Whence did they derive that fine temper, that contented air, that joy, if not from mutual love and the common affection for the little beings sprung from them—in a word, from the family life?

Digitized by Google

Thus was clearly demonstrated to him the natural law he had disowned. How could he have taken so long to comprehend that man is not made solely for the purpose of burrowing in tombs and deciphering puzzles, and that there are other means of pleasure in this world besides adding a name to the incomplete list of kings of Nineveh or a date to Assyrian chronology? He saw it well now. The true sense of life was revealed to him.

As to the joys one has lost, there remains at least the memory of having tasted them. But are there any regrets more bitter than those for a happiness we might have enjoyed, and yet have voluntarily deprived ourselves of? Wifely tenderness, the laughter of children, household pleasures, mental rest, and relaxation—what a clear idea he had now of all this! How he felt its value, and how he understood that for him it was all over, over for ever!

"Monsieur does not eat his mutton!"

Professor Ledieu raised his saddened eyes to Leon, who was watching him with anxious solicitude, then lowered them immediately on his plate.

Absorbed in the contemplation of his neighbours and by the painful thoughts the sight of them suggested, he had remained without eating, fork in hand, for now nearly half an hour. A pale layer of grease had formed on the surface of the "gigot Bretonne." It looked like a kind of frozen pond in his plate, from which the meat emerged as a barren isle and the beans like little scattered rocks. Still he resisted the attempts of Leon to have the whole re-warmed. Cold mutton was good enough for a poor wretch, deserted by everybody, who was never to know the delights of a comfortable home, the attentions and caresses of a loving wife; and he began to eat with a kind of fury.

"I would never have to slap his ears if you did not give him his own way always."

At this moment the voice of the little girl was raised—

"I say, Robert, will you stop?"

It seems that young Robert was not disposed to yield to the entreaties of his sister, for, after a few minutes, the latter cried:

"Papa, make Robert stop; he is kicking me under the table. Please speak to him."

"Come, come, Robert, be quiet," said the mother, and she resumed her conversation with her husband.

But the amiable Robert did not appear to have more respect for the maternal commands than for the entreaties of his sister. Having assured himself by a glance that his father was not attending to him, and yielding to that need of motion which children feel at table when it is impossible for them to eat more, he continued the sport that amused him, and stretched his legs energetically in the direction of those of his sister.

Unhappily for him, the latter, foreseeing the attack, had drawn her chair back out of his reach. The clever child, seeing that he could no longer reach her without projectiles, found nothing better to do than to steep his hand in the coloured water in his glass, and sprinkle his little sister, who uttered loud cries.

"Papa, he has stained my dress."

The father, furious at being interrupted, turned toward his son and darted a menacing glance at him.

"Wait a little," he shouted, "you are going to have such a whipping as you never had in your life!"

The criminal, seeing already the paternal hand suspended over his head, made a terrified movement, when, unfortunately, his arm encountered the glass of coloured water. The glass and the child lost their balance at the same moment, the glass spilling all the liquid it contained on the mother's gown, the child catching at the table cloth and dragging with it to the floor bottles and glasses, plates and dishes, sauces and viands. Heavens, what a noise! The waiters ran up; the mother wipes herself; the children roar, and the father swears like a trooper, while young Robert is being picked up.

"You young scoundrel," shouts the father.

The child bellows louder than ever. The mother in fury interferes and says to her husband:

"It is your fault, too!"

"How, my fault?"

"Yes, your fault!"

"Well, that's rather good, that is!"

"If you had not frightened him, this would never have happened."

"Ought I to let him behave so abominably without minding it?"

"That's no reason why you should knock him down. No one ought to be such a brute with a baby like that."

"What! knock him down? Why, I haven't even touched him."

"Oh, you might restraint ourself a little!"

"I would never have to slap his ears if you did not give him his own way always."

"Oh, yes, of course, it's all my fault now."

"Yes, it is your fault."

"Do you dare say that to my face?"

Professor Ledieu lost nothing of the scene, and, in proportion as it developed, the smile spread again over his lips. Now, without ceasing to listen, he was eating his asparagus (in oil, according to the advice which Leon had given him).

His neighbours attacked each other with increasing acrimony. The replies exchanged became more bitter, and in this oratorical struggle it was easy to see the husband would not get the upper hand.

His wife bombarded him with words so rapidly that he no longer found an answer. She had extinguished his fire.

"And for all that, what pleasure have I ever had in my my life? Nursing children, cooking, a maid-of-all-work, indeed."

"Ah! it was my luck to have met with such a good-for-nothing as you! And monsieur complains! Well, if you are not content, you have only to say so."

The husband, annoyed at seeing himself the object of all eyes, tried to make her at least lower her voice. "Humbug! Little I care who hears me!"

A blush mounted to the face of the poor man, who was rapidly losing his self-possession under the scathing sarcasm of his wife's words.

The dispute between husband and wife lasted through the dessert, which the professor was enjoying with ever-increasing cheerfulness.

Then Professor Ledieu, having first of all paid his bill and given Leon a tip so unusually large as to make that functionary open his eyes, replaced his book and pamphlets under his arm, left the Restaurant Cherbois and directed his steps to the Rue de Monsieur le Prince, thinking with delight that in the calm solitude of his little apartment, all encumbered with books, he would again find Tiglath-Pilezer, Assur-Bani-Pal, and Queen Semiramis.

Digitized by Google

AUNT CAROLINE'S WEDDING PRESENT.

YES, we were really married.

The clergyman, with impressive solemnity, announced that we were now one, and sanctioned our union with the blessing of the church. He shook my hand, and the tears stood in his eyes as he wished me unending happiness. He kissed Eleonore, whom he had christened twenty years before, and repeated again: "God bless you, my dear child!"

Then came the wedding-guests, one after the other, to congratulate us. There was quite a procession.

The sixth person in the procession was Aunt Caroline. She is Eleonore's aunt, but I am quite as fond of her as if she were my own. She is the best of creatures, always ready to come when you need her, and quite as willing to stay away when she fancies that her society might be burdensome. She is one of those generous, patient aunts who in winter always have on hand a store of goodies for hungry nieces and nephews; and in summer are ever ready to take charge of a particularly restless schoolboy or girl, whose exuberant vacation spirits render him or her an annoyance to the quiet home circle. In a word, Aunt Caroline is a noble example of what an aunt really ought to be.

"Dear Felix—Dear Eleonore," she said as she clasped our hands, "my wedding present is so cumbersome that I arranged to have it sent directly to your house, where you will find it when you return from your bridal tour. It will welcome you to your new home, and I trust it may give you much pleasure, and daily remind you of your old Aunt Caroline."

A dozen times a day during our journey we spoke of Aunt Caroline's present, and tried to guess what it might be. Eleonore was certain that it was a handsome book-case, while I maintained with equal confidence that it must be a superb bronze ornament.

At last, after fourteen October days of crimson-tinted forests, and deep blue bays, enchanting sunsets, and cosy evenings beside sparkling hearth-fires in comfortable hotels—after two weeks of perfect enjoyment, we returned to the charming little home which had been prepared for us, and which was henceforth to be our haven of happiness.

I kissed Eleonore when I helped her from the carriage, and murmured: "Welcome home, my dear wife."

She returned my caress rather hastily, and, running past me into the house, said: "Now we shall see what it is."

Alas! we learned only too soon. Martha, our little maid-of-all-work, had illuminated the little drawing-room for our reception. The handsome swinging lamp above the centre table—a present from Uncle Augustus—was lighted. Red wax candles burned brightly on each of the two bronze candelabra—Uncle Christopher's present—on the mantel; while two lighted student lamps, likewise other wedding gifts, stood on the piano. The light from all these served to illumine, and to direct our glances the moment we entered the room toward, Aunt Caroline's present, which hung directly opposite the door. It was an atrociously painted representation of the parable of the Prodigal Son, and looked as if it might have originated in a manufactory of "curiosities." Its true origin I never learned, although I had ample opportunity to study it.

It is quite certain, however, that dear Aunt Caroline, knowing my own and Eleonore's fondness for pictures, and with her heart overflowing with benevolence and affection, had purchased the huge canvas at some auction, paying for it a good round sum, and consoling herself for the extravagance with thoughts of the pleasure the picture would give us.

The canvas measured eight feet by ten feet. The frame was a broad, gilded affair; the composition itself absurd in the extreme. In the middle foreground a group of figures in gala attire represented the returned prodigal, his parents, and the guests invited to celebrate the return. On a sort of raised gallery in the background were a number of figures with cymbals, dancing and singing. All these persons were in a kind of pillared hall, to the left of which was an abject-looking individual in tattered garments, feeding some swine with ears of corn. To the right of the hall was an Oriental butcher with a Turkish scimitar, slaughtering the fatted calf.

Aunt Caroline confided to me afterwards that it was because the canvas contained really three pictures instead of only one that she decided to secure it, adding with a triumphant smile:

"You see, my dear nephew, you have the entire allegory on one canvas!"

And there it hung—taking up almost one entire wall of the room in which we had decided Eleonore should spend the most of her time.

We surveyed the monstrosity in silence; in silence listened to Martha's admiring comments on the "perfectly lovely painting"; then we went to inspect the dining-room and my study. We spent the evening in the latter cosy chamber.

. . . . . .

But Eleonore could not at all times use the study as a sitting-room, especially when I had business callers. At such times the poor child would bravely conquer her aversion to the "Prodigals"—thus she designated both the bipeds and quadrupeds in the picture—and, with her back turned resolutely upon them, would sit in the drawing-room until my visitors had departed.

We have a large circle of acquaintances. Of course, they all called on us, and Eleonore said she always felt as if the "Prodigals" helped her "do the honours." Indeed, the picture seemed to receive the larger share of our visitors' attention. Some of Eleonore's more intimate friends asked her why she had hung such a "very large picture" in our small drawing-room. Some, who considered it impolite to make such remarks, maintained a discreet silence; while those who thought it "good form" to talk about pictures, and to pretend a familiarity with art, would inquire if "that large painting was the work of a British artist," or remark that it reminded them of something similar which they had seen at the Academy—or somewhere.

Then there were some who would observe that the same subject had been treated in so many different ways—that it was very "instructive," and so on. There was still another class of art critics. It was composed of those who knew nothing about pictures, but who were quite ready to admire anything the moment they found out that somebody else admired it.

Now, there was no one in our village who was as familiar with really good pictures as myself. When any of my neighbours wanted to buy a painting, or engraving, he first consulted me; consequently the fact that I had the "Prodigal Son" hanging on my wall was sufficient to convince, even those of our friends who really thought the picture an abominable daub, that there must be "something in it"; and they exerted themselves manfully to discover this something.

"How very natural those swine are!" one would say.

"Just see what brilliant colouring in those clouds!" another.

"How repentant the 'Prodigal' looks," a third would remark, with the air of a connoisseur.

"It is really quite interesting to see those ancient fashions. Now, that tunic is really quite picturesque," and so on, until my poor little wife actually grew to despise these well-meaning art critics.

When I came home in the evening, and found Eleonore almost worn out, and would inquire tenderly what wearied her, she would sigh, "Oh, those 'Prodigals.'" And really, it was almost unendurable. But we could not offend dear Aunt Caroline—whose admiring gaze always hung with devouring interest on the mammoth canvas every time she visited us—by cutting it in pieces, burning it, or hanging it in the cellar.

However, after everybody had called, and had been called on in return, there came a season of comparative peace, during which Eleonore went to pay a two days' visit to an old school friend.

During her absence I had the upholsterer and two of his men to come and remove the "Prodigals" into the dining-room; and when Aunt Caroline, on her next visit, missed the picture from its accustomed place, she seemed quite downhearted. I, however, boldly declared that the light in the dining room was much better, and that the subject—feasting—was more suitable for a dining-room than a drawing-room.

Digitized by Google

Dear Aunt Caroline! She had so much faith in my reputation as an art connoisseur that, notwithstanding her disappointment, she said I was quite right to move the picture.

Now, thought I, with self-gratulatory feeling, Eleonore can receive her callers in comfort.

But I reckoned without my "Prodigals."

Although the picture gave us less annoyance in its present position, we did not become reconciled to it. Far from it! but as I sat with my back toward it during meals, and Eleonore had only a side view, it was not so constantly obvious as it had been, and when the warm weather came, we covered it with gauze—on account of the flies!

It happened that the distinguished botanist, Doctor S——, visited our town during the holidays.

There were no flies at that time. Our guest was a most amiable man, and the friends whom we had invited to dine with him did their best to help entertain him.

During the soup he related a highly amusing adventure he had had in Egypt. When Martha removed his plate, he looked up—the "Prodigals" were directly opposite him—and, well-bred though he was, he could not help a look of wondering surprise at sight of such a travesty on art. He paused, stared at the picture, then, turning toward my wife, stammered confusedly:

"I—I beg pardon, madam, but—really I forget—ah, yes—what a marvellous painting—ah—ah——!"

Naturally every glance was directed toward the object which had so confused the learned gentleman.

Eleonore declared that from the moment his eyes fell on the "Prodigals" the doctor talked to her as he would to a child; and she is certain that it is because of that unfortunate canvas that he did not pay us a farewell call, notwithstanding my assurance that he was hastily summoned away by a telegram.

A few days later Eleonore went to visit her mother, and while she was gone, I again sent for the upholsterer and his men, and had the picture removed to my study. To do this, I was obliged to take down about two hundred books, together with the shelves.

The light here was execrable, but that did not matter. I placed my desk so that my back was toward it, and commended my visitors of taste to the mercy of their good angels. On New Year's Day Aunt Caroline dined with us, and you may imagine her surprise when, seated in the chair Doctor S—— had occupied, she looked up and found the picture gone. She didn't say a word, however.

"We hung your picture—your lovely picture, dear aunt—in my study," I answered casually, adding, in my desperation, "I intend to exhibit it to my Sunday class."

The dear old soul did not say anything, nor was she offended; but she appeared so melancholy that I was conscience-striken. Before I went to bed I tried to make amends for the detestable story I had told Aunt Caroline. I wrote to a friend of mine, and invited him to bring his Sunday class on the following Thursday evening and take tea with us. The invitation was accepted.

I received my friend and his scholars in the drawing-room. I asked the little fellows all sorts of questions about their studies, and Eleonore showed them our photographs. At last came the welcome summons to tea, after which I invited the children into my study to see the picture of the "Prodigal Son."

The lamps were placed in the most favourable positions. The youngsters ranged themselves in a row in front of the picture, I took my station on one side, my friend on the other. I cleared my throat, and began in a didactic tone:

"This picture, my dear children, is partly allegorical, partly realistic. These two rows of columns on either side of the centre divide the different eras of the parable. Here on the left you see the prodigal, hungry and wretched, sharing the swine's food—as the Scriptures tell us. Here in the background you see them singing and dancing, rejoicing over the return of the prodigal. Here, again, on the right is the butcher in the act of killing the fatted calf."

While I delivered this highly-instructive lecture my friend pointed with a ruler toward the designated objects.

The silence which followed my remarks was actually oppressive. At last one little fellow, Frank Diegel, the butcher's son, feeling that something ought to be said, stammeringly asked:

"Be them Berkshire pigs?"

The laughter which followed the general oppressiveness was wonderfully hearty, and, the clock striking nine soon afterward, Eleonore and I gave thanks for our release.

These are only a few of the many annoyances which Aunt Caroline's well-meant wedding present brought upon us.

Fortunately, there were some very warm days in March—quite warm enough to bring to life two flies in my study. Once I should have put an end to their premature existence. I did not do so now. I fetched the gauze veil and draped it securely over the Prodigals. The next day Aunt Caroline called. Said I to her when she came into the study:

"Have you noticed, dear aunt, how very early the flies have made their appearance this spring?"

Aunt Caroline had not noticed.

I should not be adhering strictly to the truth were I to say that we were not perfectly happy in our little home. We were—even though there was hardly a forenoon, afternoon, or evening that one of the Prodigals—either the son, one of his parents, the butcher or one of the swine—did not somehow mix in our conversation. It was not for this—though it helped somewhat—that, when summer brought my holiday, we determined to spend it in the New Forest.

Those were enchanting days!

Eleonore embroidered, sketched, and read to her heart's content, while I wrote diligently at a new book I had begun.

Thus we passed six delightful weeks with never a thought of the Prodigals, when one morning, Fate, in the person of the postman, brought me a newspaper.

"Are you Mr. Trubury, from Bromley?" he inquired.

"I am."

"Then here's something that may interest you," he added, pointing to a paragraph in the paper. I read:

"Yesterday, in Bromley, a fire consumed the residences of Miss Surrey and Mr. Felix Trubury. The loss is partly covered by insurance."

I summoned my poor little wife, to whom I communicated as gently as possible our great loss.

We began at once to prepare for our return journey; and as our train would not leave until the afternoon, I wired a friend for further particulars of the fire.

The answer came as we were leaving the hotel:

"Fire started in the Surreys' house. Unfortunately, very little saved."

As I concluded this rather depressing message, Eleonore clasped my hand in both her own, and whispered assuringly: "We have each other, dear Felix, we shall not be poor—we have each other—and our love."

A few hours later we were in Bromley. As we drew near to the station, Eleonore leaned toward me, and said, smiling through her tears:

"Felix, dear, we have one comfort."

"What is it, love?"

"We are rid of those detestable swine."

"That's so," I assented. "There is never a misfortune that has not some recompense."

I had sent a word to a friend to meet us at the station. He had not come alone. There were several sympathetic acquaintances with him.

"It was so late," said my friend, referring to the fire, "and so sudden. There was a furious wind——"

"But," interrupted another friend, "one thing will give you great pleasure."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Eleonore expectantly. "What, pray?"

"You have to thank Frank Diegel's courage for it. When all hope of saving the house was gone, he and several of my Sunday scholars broke open the shutters of your study window, and Frank bravely entered the burning dwelling and cut the large painting from the frame. That was the only thing saved!"

Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

SUMMARY—Chapters I. to IX.

The story is told by Violet (Letty) Lombard, who, at the opening, is living at Galveston, U.S.A. with her grandfather Enos Lombard, Liz the coloured servant, Justina her old nurse, and her Aunt Marg, who has been the recipient of mysterious letters, post-marked New Orleans, necessitating a fortnight's absence from home. John Scott, who married Katherine, Violet's step-sister, a very beautiful girl, pays for Violet's board and lodging, and has just decided that she is to go to a convent in New Orleans. On the strength of information gained from the torn pieces of one of Aunt Marg's letters, and curious to solve the mystery, Violet so arranges that she goes to New Orleans a day earlier, and that she stops at the Hotel Gilbert. Through a crack in the wall, she sees what happens in the next room to hers. John Scott, Captain Dana—an old friend from Galveston—Aunt Marg, and others are sitting in judgment upon a Mexican, Antonio, who has, it transpires, assisted in the seizure of Scott's wife, and of Dana's wife and daughter, and whose terrible crime has been brought to light by Yara, a spy. Antonio is compelled to end his life by taking poison, with his dying words laying the blame upon one Xarras.

Letty goes to the convent in the morning, and during her schooldays there clandestinely meets James Gregory, who is introduced as the son of a friend of her grandfather's. On her way home again, some months later, with her chaperone Miss Wilson, Colonel Dean Gregory, James's brother, introduces himself. After that, Letty sees a great deal of James, and at length promises to elope with him. Whilst waiting for him to come, she overhears Dean Gregory telling a friend of a plot whereby he has won James over, and has made it probable that John Scott's money will come to himself instead of to Letty. She consequently refuses to have anything to do with James.

* * * *

CHAPTER X.

THE next morning Bruce brought me a kind little note from Mr. Scott, telling me I had better not mention my visit to him, but to let my grandfather think the world itself had found out its mistake. He was so wise and helpful, and I felt I had one friend I could trust; and dear me! the resolves to do better that I made that day; and I even caught myself singing. After tea, when grandfather was sitting in the porch, I went out and offered to read him his paper. His sight is poor, and Aunt Marg's voice is too weak for her to read aloud.

"It'll last one reading," he grunted, giving up the paper unwillingly; but after a week, when I persevered in being accommodating, he surprised me one night by going down to his pet rose-bush and cutting off a handful of blossoms. These he handed me with quite a courtly air. My voice choked a bit when I thanked him and I forgot he had called me a living conscience.

Sunday morning, when John Scott's carriage surprised grandfather in his shirt-sleeves in the garden, he was vastly astonished, and I saw him peeping behind the blind as I drove away in great state with those shrouded sisters. Mrs. Scott was kind, but never have I seen such a statue of ice as Mrs. Gregory was. She even suggested that I had better take her place, for John might not wish me to ride backward, and other pleasant feminine flings that I bore with marvellous patience and silence. I could feel the eyes just scorching my back as I sat in that pew, but I held my head high and looked haughtily round at the wondering members.

John and I had the same hymn-book, but not a note would I sing. I had not repented so far as that, in spite of the best resolutions in the world. I watched his profile during the service, and began to think him handsome. I wondered of what he was thinking with that far-away look in his eyes. He insisted on my walking home with him, knowing, I suppose, the misery I endured coming in the carriage. I talked very meekly all the way, but I did admit that the new alto sang very flat. Then he laughed in that quiet way.

"What a very human Letty you are," he said; "and you wouldn't sing either—not a note."

"I am out of practice," I answered, and he only smiled the more. He seems to read one's very thoughts.

On Monday morning, although she was grumpy and cross, I helped Liz fold the clothes, and made a cake for tea.

Just about then old Captain Dana was taken very ill, and one day I asked Aunt Marg if I might cook something nice for him.

"Of course you may, dear," she said; "isn't this your home? I would go with you if I were strong enough."

I stooped and kissed her, though I am not much given to affection, but she did look so sweet and frail. I wish she had not kept me at arm's length all my life.

"Yo' go 'long outer here," growled Liz. "I won't have you boderin' me, yo' g'long 'bout yo' business."

"You know that purple sash of mine, Liz; I've been meaning to give you that."

"All wore out an' faded," she snapped. "I know yo' palarverin' ways."

"I'll drape it over your corn-colour gown, Liz," I pleaded; "and if the captain died you'd be sorry you were so nasty."

I conquered her and concocted some dainties for the captain, who, I know, has a sweet tooth, and set out across the beach for his cabin, a mile from our house. He lives alone, in a regular doll's house, always as neat as wax. I found him sitting by the window, wrapped in an old coat, looking very ill and feeble.

"Hullo, Sunshine," he said, as I brought him my dainties; "well, you didn't forget the old man, and such a room to see you in, an' I look so wretched."

I stood there on the chair.

I went and kissed him. "You do look forlorn. Let me get you a pillow, and brush your lovely white hair; now you are like yourself."

I fussed over him, washed his face, got a chair for his feet, and made him comfortable, then I brewed him some tea and brought that to him on a little table.

"You're a born nurse," he smiled; "now don't go putting the house in order, I'll be about myself in a day or two."

"I know it frets you not to see things ship-shape, cap'n," I said, trying to be nautical.

"You'll spile your gown."

"My old blue gingham, and Liz's kitchen apron," I laughed rolling up my sleeves; "now I am going to wash that window, for you've got to sit there and you can't see a thing." I made such a joke of it, he stopped making objections and watched my efforts with considerable pride. Outside, I mounted on a chair and finished the job. Just as I got it done, something bounced up against the chair, knocking my pail over, and nearly upsetting me. It was Mr. Scott's mastiff, and there right behind me—I was blindfolded with a sun-bonnet—was his master watching me.

Digitized by Google

"Out cleaning by the day?" he asked soberly, his hands in the pockets of his short coat. "Shall I fetch a pail of water in the Jack and Jill style?"

"No, I have just finished. I wanted the captain to see out of doors. I'm beginning to look at life through clean windows myself."

He only smiled that tender smile of his, and I noted how soft and fine his eyes were.

"She would do it, John," the captain said, apparently much disturbed. "She can't be ruled."

"Only by kindness," whispered John. "Do you know I used to think, when I was young, that I would like to kiss a girl in a sun-bonnet. They are homely things, but bewitching over a pretty face."

I stood there on the chair and looked straight into his eyes.

"It's lucky you are old," I said. But he turned and walked soberly to the house.

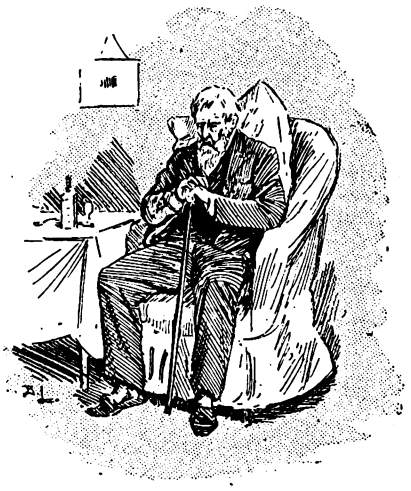
"You needn't blame me for flirting," I muttered, "you brought it on yourself."

"I don't," he answered, turning and laughing at me. What sharp hearing he had, but I was rather pleased, and went home in great good humour. After that, as the captain grew worse, I went often to the cottage, and finally stayed there all the time for the captain was so fond of me. He said no one else did him good but me. Aunt Marg, Liz, and the neighbours helped me, and grandfather stayed at night with the sick man. It was so pitiful to see those old friends together. "You're good for twenty years yet, Josh, if you only thought so," grandfather would say.

"This is my last voyage; I'm near port, Enos," the captain would answer, but grandfather would obstinately hold to his own opinion.

One night, when I lay in the little room off the captain's, Justina snoring on the floor beside my cot, I heard voices in the next room, and saw that grandfather was gone, and Mr. Scott was sitting, holding the captain's wrinkled hand.

From the few words I heard, I knew they were going on a long journey to the past, living through dread days and heavy sorrows. Often the captain mentioned his wife and daughter in sobs, and I knew there must have been a most dastardly crime against his nearest and dearest, to make that good old man an executioner. I realised his heart's blood had been drained, drop by drop, all those miserable years, and that even his last hours were saddened and made fearful by the recollection of a crime.



"This is my last voyage; I'm near port, Enos."

When a pioneer finds his cabin in ashes, his baby's bleeding body, his wife's dishonoured corpse, he does not call aloud in his agony for the law, nor send a slow petition for troops—not he. On his swift-footed steed, he rides night and day across the desert a spectral lonely figure with a white set face; he watches the burning sands for the trail, then on and on, until he nears his prey. When his hands are deep-dyed in Indian blood; when on lonely hillsides, under the gnarled scrub-oaks, or rotting in lonely canons, Apaché corpses lie unburied, then he turns back to his ruined home to go mad and die.

"I don't want to see any parson, John," said the captain; "how could he that never suffered as I have tell me the right? We men made no mistakes—no innocent man died through us; but you, John—when your hour of retribution comes—be sure of proof, swear on your honour to withhold your hand until you know the truth."

"I swear it," said John steadily; "but why say that? Did I not furnish you with proof for all the rest? Would I fail in my own case?"

"You won't forget Margaret—how she has suffered for us?"

"I hold her the noblest among women," said John softly.

"And little Violet—wonderful how she was saved too! And what a ministering angel she has been to me! I followed her those nights on the beach, John. She's an innocent little girl, and you must tell all I've said about her to the man she will love some day, for evil tongues might bring back the old story and mar her happiness."

"I will guard her while I live," said John, "for her own dear sake and Katherine's."

"John," and there was a troubled note in the feeble voice, "I know ye of old, allus brave and fearless, just, but terrible when in anger. If the worst should come to you—I'll not say that—stay your hand. We ain't all strong, God-fearing creatures, though why we're weak I can't say, but we are. Reckon according to the nature and the blood, John, and have pity and forgive. Now bring the child I like to watch her innocent face. As I pass out of life, I think of how she was saved, that helpless baby, and I see a purpose in it."

When John called me I was ready and went into the room. My brain was sadly confused. Who had saved me, and from what? I saw John sitting by the window watching the sea. Something was troubling him, for he sighed, and passed his hand often across his eyes.

"Read about the storm on Galilee," said the captain; "them poor mariners, no sort of sailors neither, but them boats in 'postolic times warn't never seaworthy."

As I read, his face grew calm and peaceful. "I'll sleep now, Mary. I thought you were your mother, you looked so like her then. I'm weary, dre'ful weary." He reached out his hand to me. "My blessin' on ye, Violet. Some day you'll find your happiness in a good man's love. I want to think your life will be bright, not like my girl's—my Clarice. John, I can't forgive," he cried, with a bitter moan; "on my death-bed I will not forgive."

When he slept, John made me go home, and that afternoon took me for a long drive on the beach. I was so sad and tired, I talked little, but he was kind and gentle When we turned homeward, the sunset sky was ruddy and golden, shimmering beyond the dark rolling waves, and the spray from the sea dashed in our faces, and over the horses shining coats. The blinds of the captain's cottage were down, and there was a Sunday quiet about the place. John went in, and when he came back I knew by his face the worst had happened.

"The captain's ship has sailed," he said, "he is beyond the sunset gates. And oh, such a sad life, too, Letty, borne so bravely, so patiently. I believe he went to heaven," cried John, with quivering lips; "men could not be so sorely tried if there was no forgiveness."

All that night I dreamed of Antonio, waking often with a shuddering cry, thinking I saw that dark, restless face, those terrible eyes. How I prayed that I could forget; and yet, when the clods of earth fell on my old friend's coffin, that dreadful scene came back to me. A power wiser than mine must settle the question of guilt and crime, if there was that injustice. Not all the adverse comment of the world can keep me from believing that old man a good man. Though he sinned much, I think I am sure there was forgiveness and pity for Captain Joshua Dana, that he found rest at last, and met somewhere those dear ones, torn from him so cruelly in this world.

CHAPTER XI.

If I ended my story here, the reader might go on believing my conversion complete, but, like many of the shining lights of revivals, I slid back. There was so little to occupy a girl like me in my life—the neighbours were well, my efforts at indiscriminate charity were notable failures, and at home there was no work for me.

Digitized by Google

With enthusiastic praises of my voice.

John went away a week after the captain's death, and though Mrs. Scott was always kind, Mrs. Gregory contrived to make my visits to the mansion decidedly unpleasant. Before John went he sent me a piano, and that was such a pleasure! Still, grandfather and Aunt Marg would have liked my playing and singing just as well if I had no talent at all. Anything I did was delightful to them, no matter how it was done, until after a time I felt all my best work was wasted on blank walls.

Then it was that I met Maestro, a queer little Italian, who believed through his political views he was forced to flee to the new "contraire." I used to believe all he said about his foes and troubles, but now I know they existed in an extremely fertile imagination. He heard me sing at church, and once met me in the street, introduced himself, and said I had "ze grand voice, and did I not long for ze career?"

I had money saved, for John sent Aunt Marg so much for me, and Maestro got this and all I could ask for besides. They were golden, those hours in the shabby back-room, where he sat at the piano and played for me to sing, sometimes breaking off with enthusiastic praises of my voice, clapping his hands or wiping tears away—he wept so easily, especially about his political troubles! What girl, placed as I was, would not dream of a future! He said I had the voice, and it was only a question of time and teaching when I would be famous.

"I haf one pupil who will make me known," he would cry, "me ze exile. I vill show ze world ze grande alto, ze greatest dare is now to-day."

As my lessons went on, I ceased to care for clothes, or even to comb my hair more than once a day. I fell into artistic disorder. I walked very straight, though, and threw out my chest. I carried my head high, and regarded my past and present life as interesting biographical facts. I held wealth and power in my hands. I could pay John Scott all I had cost him, for the desire had returned. I pictured the scene often. With what grief and reluctance he would accept the money! how he would realise I was not a silly girl, but a woman and an artiste.

He would be sorry—then I had to think a good while what he would be sorry about, for in all my escapades I was the culprit, not he. I scorned allegiance to grandfather and Aunt Marg. They should be glad I had the talents to rise above other women, and certainly they were old-fashioned and odd, anyhow. Only to Justina did I confide, and how her brown face lighted up and her little eyes sparkled.

"You shall go with me always," I said, "to take care of me."

"Si, and I carry a knife to stab anyone who makes Chica angry, like Jeem, the black heart." She hates Jim because I do. She is my echo in everything. Then here is another piece of my wickedness that I hate to confess.

Justina is a clairvoyant. Lots of old Mexican women pretend they are, but Justina really is. She told me when Captain Dana was going to die. She said once (after my trouble) that she knew all the time I would not marry Jim, and she used to go into trances and tell the girls all about their young men.

So one day, after my music lesson, I got her to go into a trance and tell me my future prospects. She sits and looks at the wall, then a quiver goes through her. She shivers all over and finally turns rigid, her eyes dull like a dead person's. She won't say a word till she comes out of her spell, sometimes not then.

"Well?" I asked, as she shivered, and began to rub her elbows, her usual habit on waking up; "am I going to be great?"

"If I tell you, Chica," that is her pet name, meaning "small" in Spanish, but I know not what in Mexican; she invented it when I was a baby; "if I tell you what you do not want, you will be angry; if I do not tell you one word, you will not know."

"Pshaw!" I said, and went away in a very bad temper. She is really like a Mexican sometimes. As I went along the beach I saw advancing toward me a singularly miserable figure. A lean, limping Mexican, clad in rags through which his limbs showed like the bones of a skeleton. Over his long, straight black hair, was a faded sombrero that shaded his seamed and bronzed face and deep-set, wild black eyes.

As we met I looked full in his face. It was the spy at the Hotel Gilbert, Jose Yara. A sudden resolution leaped into my reckless mind. I would speak to him, offer him shelter, and find out that story of the past. I have been cursed with an ungovernable curiosity all my life, and into what pitfalls it has led me.

"Are you ill?" I said in Spanish. His yellow face gleamed at the friendly question in his native tongue.

"Si, I have walked so far." He thrust out his foot in its ragged shoe, and I saw there were unhealed sores and blisters on the dark flesh. "I am so lame, and I have neither friends nor money."

"I know a Mexican woman who will take care of you; my old nurse, Justina."

He looked at me suspiciously. "You are friendly to a stranger, senorita."

"I try to be charitable," I said airily, "and I know more than you think of your people. When you are well I will help you to get work." What a simple and arrogant idiot he must have thought me.

"You are an angel," he cried; and angel in Spanish does not sound so odd as in English; "and the name of señorita?"

I saw a singularly miserable figure.

Digitized by Google

"Is Violet Lombard," I said slowly, my eyes on the sand, such an innocent expression on my face. I knew he was studying me.

"I thank you, I will accept your gracious goodness," he said, and I led him to Justina, who scolded roundly at first, but, as I gave her some money in advance, consented to care for the stranger a few days.

"He has been among the Apachés, Justina, and you should pity him." She hates the Indians, for they murdered her husband and her children, so she was more willing to do for him after that.

"How do you know that I was among the Apachés?" Yara asked with bloodless lips. "You are a spy! I never told you, how you know?"

I freed my arm from the clutch of his talon-like fingers. "I know things that happened before I was born," I answered solemnly; "I dream them."

Out on the beach who should I meet but Maestro. I will not write his name, for the poor little soul suffered enough through me without seeing his name in print. He was dancing up and down, wringing his hands, and waving a letter frantically in the air.

"Mees," he cried, running up to me, "mees, this is fortunat. I haf been to your home, I look for you, I meet you. Oh, mees, all are lost!"

"What?" I faltered.

"Ze career, ze artiste. I loaf mees, so I write ze guardeen, Monsieur Scott. I find his address. I zay his charge haf ze grande voice. She vill be prima donna; I am intrest in her. He moost furnish ze monaire to put her on ze stage; she vill repay it."

"You wrote that to John Scott without telling me! That was foolish," I cried bitterly.

"I do not comprend," he replied; "I man of honour, mees; I fil you wif vanity about ze voice, I do wrong until I write ze guardeen. Ze old man he not comprend, he know notin', ze gran'pere; but ze guardeen, I hear he was a gentleman. He is a beaste. Diavolo! Ze lettre is frightful."

Waving a letter frantically in the air.

I tore it from his trembling hand while he roared out his grief in Italian, French, and broken English, calling the very waves to witness what a beast John Scott was. The letter, in John's clear and forcible style, plainly intimated that the writer considered Maestro a charlatan and a fraud, who had taken advantage of the vanity of a very young girl; and that he, John Scott, would be in Galveston in a few days and would see Maestro personally and explain matters to their mutual satisfaction.

"He has no right to interfere," I said angrily; "he is not my guardian, save by his own desire. I have no money of my own, but you told me I could make so much."

"You moost study years. It cost so mooch; zare is no room for poor girls wif voice eef they haf not ze monaire. It is one grande disapponmen to me; I go no farther."

"Some other teacher will give me lessons, and you will be sorry for this some day."

"I may, mees, I may," he said pompously; "but ze honaire of a man is more to me. I haf been insult; I will haf satisfaction."

"They don't fight duels here," I said cruelly; "they don't wait. They simply shoot on sight. John Scott is a monstrous man—the strongest, they say, in the new country you hate."

Having terrified him to my satisfaction, I departed, and for three days indulged in a real fit of temper. I planned revenge on John Scott. I would humiliate him, and show him he had no right to even pretend to guide me. I would let him know I was aware of his past, and silence any objections he had to my career as a singer.

"It is like blackmail, Letty," I said to myself, as I walked to Justina's cabin late one afternoon; "but a vocation excuses all." I would consult my adviser, Justina.

"Chica wants something," she grinned, puffing rings.

"Yes, you know what I asked you?" (I had never told her of the Hotel Gilbert.) "I want you to find out that mystery about my parents and Aunt Marg, and that self-righteous John Scott. You can put Yara into a trance, I know. You have put me to sleep lots of times. You could mesmerise him ever so easy."

"He is a very bad man. He would kill me."

"How would he know it? You say they are never aware of being in a trance. I say, dear," and I laid my cheek against her shoulder, "tell me about me when I was a baby?" She loved to tell that, so she began slowly stroking my hand as she talked.

"I was very miserable, Chica. My husband, my children, my little baby, all killed by Apachés. We lived on the border of Mexico and Texas in a little house, and one day I went way out to pick some flowers for my shrine, for my bambino's birthday, she was just one year old; and when I come back there is only some ashes, still smoking and hot, and some human bones. The Apachés have passed by.

"I walk three days; then I hear horses' hoofs behind me. I turn swift and there are two people on horseback. There is a big man on a bay horse, and there is blood on the man's coat, and his face is the face of the dead; his eyes blaze; his lips are set, and he looks straight before him as if far off he could see his vengeance.

"On the other horse is a woman; she is dusty and her gown is torn and draggled; she has that wild look too and sees nothing; she is a young woman, but her hair is as white as snow.

"'It is a Mexican woman,' said the man, 'and quite mad I think. Margaret, those ashes we passed must have been her home.'

"The woman did not seem to hear; she looks that queer way, straight before her, and then the baby cries, such a wee, feeble little cry, but I hear, I hear! something stirs in me; a great longing. I ran to that big horse, and stretched out my arms. Ah, Chica, how I cry!

"'My baby, my baby, give it to me, mine is burnt! O, gracious God, no, this is mine, my baby!'

"I drag it from his arms, and hold it to my breast. I feel it alive from my life; it opens its blue eyes like the sky; it is such a white baby, and mine was so brown with its bright eyes; God has sent me this one though, and I take it. He lifts me up on the big horse behind him, and we ride on to San Antonio. I keep you five years in my cabin, my Chica, and when they take you away I follow you."

"And you never asked any more about me?"

"I never asked, Chica, I wanted only my baby."

(To be continued next week.)

Digitized by Google

UNDER THE SOFA.

THE room was hung in pale blue silk; the Prayer from Orpheus was open on a spinet; the chairs had lyres for backs; a mahogany writing desk; a white bed with its decoration in roses; painted doves in pairs along the cornice; the whole seems to smile with a tender grace. The lamp shone softly, and the flickering firelight filled the dusky corners as with palpitating wings. Seated before the writing-desk in a loose gown, her delicate neck inclined under the pale, magnificent aureole of her hair, Juliette is looking over old letters, which have lain, tied up with ribbons, forgotten in the drawers.

The stroke of midnight sounds; it is the sign of the merging of the old year into the new. The dainty clock, upon which a laughing, gilded love is perched, announces that the year 1793 is ended.

The sharp, pure air quickens the flame in the fireplace. Julie is going to burn the letters, but not without reading them.

They are arranged in order, for Julie infuses everything pertaining to her with the exactness of her mind. Some, already yellowed, are dated three years back; and Julie, in the silence of the night, lives over again enchanted hours. Not a single page is consigned to the flames before the beloved syllables that cover it are ten times spelled.

The calm is profound around her. Occasionally, as the hours pass, she goes to the window and, lifting the curtain, sees in the silent darkness the spire of Saint Germain-des-Prés silvered in the moonlight; then she takes up again her work of slow and regretful destruction. And how can she refrain from drinking in for a last time these delicious pages? How can she give to the flames those dear lines without first engraving them for ever on her heart? The calm is profound around her, and her soul is palpitating with youth and love. She reads:

"I see you when absent, Julie. I walk surrounded by the images my fancy creates. I see you, not motionless and cold, but warm, alive; always changing, always perfect. I draw around you in my dreams the most magnificent spectacles of the universe. How happy is he who is Julie's lover! All things charm him, because he sees her in them all. Loving her, he loves to live; he admires the world that she illumines; he cherishes the earth that blooms under her footsteps. Love reveals to him hidden meanings in all that surrounds him. He understands the infinite forms of creation; they all picture forth Julie's image: he hears the innumerable voices of nature; they all murmur Julie's name. Enraptured, he lets his gaze float out upon the broad sea of daylight, knowing that the same radiance bathes Julie's face, like a divine caress thrown over the most perfect of human forms. To-night the first stars will make him tremble; he will think, 'Perhaps she is too looking at them now.' He breathes her in all the perfumes of the air. He could kiss the earth that bears her. . . ."

She reads and dreams. The night is ending. Already a pale, grey streak shows under the curtains; it is the dawn. The servants have commenced their tasks; she wishes to finish hers. Were those voices she just now heard? No; the calm is profound around her.

The calm is profound, but it is because the snow deadens the sound of footsteps. Men are approaching; they are here; loud knocks shake the door.

She has not time to hide the letters, to close the desk. All that she can do she does; she gathers up the papers in her arms and throws them under the sofa which has a deep valance around it. Some of the letters are scattered outside on the carpet; she shoves them under with her foot, seizes a book, and falls into an arm-chair.

The President of the District enters, followed by twelve patriots. He is a former chair-mender by the name of Brochet, whose limbs tremble as though with fever, and whose blood-shot eyes are perpetually rolling as though at sights of horror.

He signs to his men to guard the doors, and addresses Julie:

"Citizeness, we have just been informed that you are in correspondence with various agents of Pitt, and with emigrants and conspirators in prisons. I come to seize your papers in the name of the law! You were designated to me a long time ago as an aristocrat of the most dangerous kind. Citizen Rapaix, who stands before you"—he pointed to one of his men—"has admitted that in the severe winter of 1789 you gave him money and clothing to corrupt him. Lenient magistrates, without proper public spirit, have spared you too long. But I am master now, and you shall not escape the guillotine. Give up your papers, citizeness."

"Take them yourself," said Julie, "my desk is open."

Sundry notices of births, deaths, or marriages, old bills and business papers still remained in the desk, and Brochet examined them one by one. He turned them from side to side, and felt them as would a man uncertain of his ability to read, and at intervals ejaculated, "Bad! the name of the ci-devant king is not erased. This is bad, bad!"

Julie concludes from this that the search is to be a long minute one. She cannot refrain from casting a furtive glance toward the sofa, and she sees the corner of a letter peeping out from under the valance like the white ear of a cat. At sight of this her anguish suddenly ceases. The certainty that all is lost brings a tranquil assurance to her mind, and upon her face a calm like that of security. She is sure the men will see this point of paper that she sees, gleaming white upon the red carpet. It seems to force the eye toward it. But she does not know whether the discovery will come at once or later, and the doubt occupies and amuses her. She even in this tragic moment watches the patriots as they approach or turn from the sofa, as though their movements were part of a game.

Brochet, who has finished with the papers in the desk, becomes impatient, and declares that nothing shall prevent his finding what he seeks.

He overturns the furniture, examines the back of the pictures, and raps with his sword-hilt on the wood-work to discover possible hiding-places. He finds none. He removes the glass from the mirrors to see if anything is concealed behind. There is nothing.

During this time the men are tearing up some of the boards in the flooring; they swear that a worthless aristocrat shall not make game of good sans-culottes, such as they. But not one of them has seen the little white point peeping out from under the valance of the sofa.

They take Julie through the other rooms of the house, and demand all the keys. They break up tables, smash the window panes in fragments, rip open chairs and disembowel couches. And still they find nothing.

But Brochet has not yet given up; he returns to the bedroom.

"In the name of God! The papers are here—I am sure of it!"

He examines the sofa, declares it suspicious-looking and thrusts the whole length of his sabre through it five or six times. Still he finds no trace of what he is seeking, and with a frightful oath he gives his men the signal for departure.

He has reached the door, when, turning to Julie with his fist extended toward her, he exclaims:

"Tremble when you see me again!"

He is the last one to pass out.

At last they are gone. She listens to the sound of their footsteps dying out in the stairway. She is saved! Nor has her imprudence betrayed him!

. . . . . .

Julie shone for a time with considerable brilliancy under the Consulate; but in the midst of her splendour she would often murmur at night sad secrets to the trees on the park. She was stronger to withstand the terrors of death than the trials of love.

Her husband became a baron and a prefect under the Empire, and little Pierre her son died, a colonel of gendarmerie, at Versailles, in 1859.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Six Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

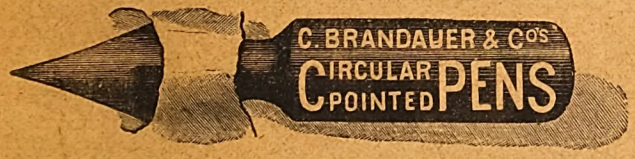
Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

Patronised by Royalty.

SILK UMBRELLAS

Direct from the Manufacturer, 2/6 each.

THE "PARKER" UMBRELLA

REGISTERED.

Ladies' or Gents' Plain or Twill Silk. Parker's Hollow-Ribbed Frames, Carved and Mounted Sticks.

Sent Parcel Post Free, 2/9 Postal Order (or 36 Stamps).

Re-covering neatly done, Plain or Twill Silk, Ladies' or Gents', 2/6 each, returned next post. List and Testimonials Free.

J. B. PARKER, Umbrella Works, Broom Close, SHEFFIELD.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

NOSE Ugly shape altered and redness cured, permanently. Stamped envelope for full particulars, LEES RAY, Specialist, Waverltree, Liverpool. Treatment thorough. Uniquely testimonialised by Clients and by Press.

HAIR REMOVED permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope. G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Adresse de M. SUEZ. 9, Rue de Prony, PARIS

VINAIGRE LACTÉ de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE

EAU de SUEZ

VACCINE for the MOUTH
Strengthens the Gums
Perfumes the Breath
The only Dentifrice securing
BEAUTIFUL TEETH

POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICES DE SUEZ.

London Agents: WILCOX & Co, 239, Oxford Street.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second - hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s. 6d.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.

LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.

LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

"SKIN TROUBLES."

Eczema, irritation, and all skin troubles are cured merely by using "ANTECZEMA." Of Chemists, &c., or post free for 1s. 8d., of the ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Book on diet, &c., free.

SOUND WHITE TEETH

Ensured by use of "This Tooth Powder," 1s. boxes, post free, from the ANTECZEMA CO., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W. Samples free for one stamp.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED.

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,

92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES
TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. S. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON S.W.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

MADAME FRAIN'S

M.B. FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth. For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

All communications respecting Advertisements for "Short Stories" should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 291.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 28, 1894. [Price One Penny.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

Beetham's World-Famed Corn & Bunion Plaster

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns and bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy.

(It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial o a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists, CHELTENHAM.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd., 61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S Strengthening SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from

THE INFANTINA COMPANY, London, S.W.

PREVENTS COLDS AND CHILLS

BOVRIL

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST STOCK FOR SOUP.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE

FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 291.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 28, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

THE PORTRAIT OF LADY BEATRICE.

I REMEMBER perfectly how it happened. I received an invitation from my old friend and fellow-artist, Stanley Harcourt, to spend a week with him at Harcourt Park. It was early in the season, and only a few other guests were invited. Although my friendship with Stanley dated back to days at Eton, I had never visited the Park, and I accepted with alacrity.

Before starting I slipped into my pocket my latest purchase at "the old curiosity shop"—a bracelet of twisted gold, with a miniature on it, surrounded by diamonds. This out-of-the-way corner in London, called by Stanley "the den," and which I had christened "the curiosity shop," attracted us frequently. Here we bought a good deal of our studio paraphernalia—effective drapery, swords, and old armour.

The bracelet, I felt convinced, had a history, although Mr. Isaac, proprietor of the shop, could give me no information concerning it. He had purchased it a few months before at the bankrupt sale of L——, the celebrated jeweller. The gold, Mr. Isaac remarked, was good, but the brilliants were off colour, and the miniature of doubtful execution. I did not agree with him on the last point, for I admired the portrait extremely. It represented a man of about eight-and-twenty, with a sad, pensive face.

From the dress—high rolling collar and stock—I concluded that it had been painted some time in the fifties. It attracted me strangely from the first, nor was I content until I had become the owner of it. The sum paid was, no doubt, but a fraction of its real value; for although Mr. Isaac was a Jew, he would often let us have things for a mere song. Perhaps he was not wholly disinterested in these transactions, knowing well that we could speak a good word for him. Indeed, we gave the little shop quite a boom, and one particular style of candlestick became so popular that it was known as "the Isaac."

I considered the bracelet a treasure, and I anticipated surprising Stanley with my good fortune, at the same time making him quite green with envy.

Arriving at my destination, I found a cordial welcome. Stanley made an ideal host, while Lady Harcourt, his mother, did the honours most gracefully His sister Edith I had not seen for years and I found her a charming girl—tall and superbly proportioned, with reddish brown hair and that wild rose complexion which seems to belong exclusively to English maids.

As for Harcourt Park, it was fascinating.

The house was of grey stone, a rambling structure which had been remodelled, until hardly a trace of its original design remained. The older parts—the tower and outer staircase—were almost in ruins, and were covered with ivy.

"You are to choose your room, old fellow," said Stanley, as we were exploring the grounds. "What will you have? Tower, time of Queen Bess; east wing, Charles II.; west wing, Queen Anne; northern projection, George I.; southern projection, George III.; and the rest, grand medley, principally Victoria in the thirty-fifth year of her reign, You see you can choose any period of history and your favourite sovereign, but if you have an eye to comfort, I should recommend Victoria."

"Isn't there a haunted chamber?" I asked. "Such a mixture ought to develop something of the sort, and I am particularly fond of ghosts. Wait a minute," I continued, not heeding my companion, "I see just what I want. Look! the three windows up there. No! higher up—to the right, with the stone ledges and blue hangings.

My friend's face fell.

"Really, Hal, I am afraid it's impossible. It hasn't been occupied for years. In fact, when the whole house was put in repair, that room and the one next to it were left out. My mother had a little sentiment about them, for they belonged to my father's favourite brother; he is dead, you know. Still, if you don't mind being rather uncomfortable, it might be managed."

"It was merely a whim," I answered. "I was thinking what a glorious view you must get from the last window; but of course I shall be delighted with any other. Pray don't give it a thought."

"I have no earthly objection," Stanley continued, "and I doubt if my mother has. Your traps have been carried up to the room next mine, but Wilson shall move them."

When Lady Harcourt was asked, she graciously consented, but I noticed that she seemed absent-minded all that evening, and I feared that I had stirred up unpleasant memories.

When the room was shown me, I could hardly suppress an exclamation of surprise and delight.

"You admire, it, I see," said Stanley. "Nearly everybody does."

"Admire!" I answered. "Admire is a poor word. It is superb."

The walls were hung with gobelin-blue tapestry. The woodwork was ivory-white, and the ceiling was beautifully carved in arabesques of gold. Above the hangings, in the wide, carved frieze, were medallion portraits of the court of Louis XIV.

The furniture was very beautiful, and in perfect harmony with the decorations. There were luxurious divans, such as Madame de Maintenon might have reclined upon, exquisite tables of inlaid wood, and dainty chairs of blue and gold.

One article, a writing table, heavily inlaid, was apparently all ready for use, with a bewitching array of materials—trays and candlesticks of Dresden china, wax of palest colours, and a little pile of tapers.

The bed was a massive structure, with a canopy of old blue brocade.

"And you would never have shown me this, if I had not insisted on taking possession?"

"We often show the room, but it is seldom occupied—I might say never."

"But it is in such perfect condition!"

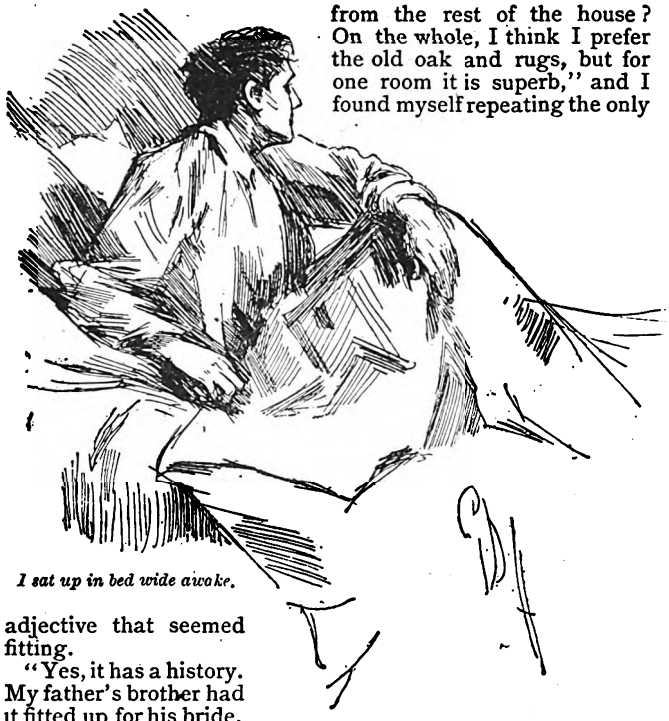
Stanley smiled a little sadly. "My mother's orders!"

"This room has a history, I know. How came it to be furnished so beautifully, and in such a different way

My friendship dated back to days at Eton.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google



I sat up in bed wide awake.

from the rest of the house? On the whole, I think I prefer the old oak and rugs, but for one room it is superb," and I found myself repeating the only adjective that seemed fitting.

"Yes, it has a history. My father's brother had it fitted up for his bride. It was the reigning fashion then—early in the fifties. He died shortly after his marriage, and the room has never been occupied, save once or twice; but it is a long story. I will tell you later, say to-morrow, when we have more time."

The evening passed off agreeably, and it was late when we retired.

"Happy dreams, Hal," said Stanley, as he left me at the door.

By the light of the candles, the room was more beautiful than ever. The faces from the frieze seemed to look down upon me. There were Madame Maintenon, cold and cynical; La Valliere, mild and gentle; fascinating Madame de Rambouillet; and Julie d'Argennes, fairest of all.

What was the mystery connected with the room? What secret did these patched and powdered ladies guard? I found that I could not drive the subject from my mind, and after I had gone to bed, and lay looking up at the ceiling, the gold tracery dimly visible in the moonlight, I still wondered what it could be.

I do not know how long I had slept, when I was awakened most suddenly. There was no noise—not a sound pervaded the room—and yet I sat up in bed wide awake. The silence seemed oppressive, almost suffocating. I scanned the room to see if everything was the same as when I went to bed. Yes, the position of each chair and table was identical. I looked up at the faces. They were one confused mass. Then I followed the tapestry hangings with my eyes, beginning at the left and looking into every fold. As I neared the right, my attention was riveted on what seemed to be a full-length portrait of a young and beautiful girl. How, in my close examination of the room, I had failed to notice it, seemed to me inexplicable.

The light that streamed in from an adjacent window showed every line. The face was pale, with dark, luminous eyes, while the hair, equally dark, was parted and puffed slightly at the sides. As nearly as I could make out it was the fashion of thirty or forty years back. The gown was white, soft and clinging, with short waist and loose sleeves. The frame seemed lost in darkness, but the face and figure were wonderfully clear.

I now felt certain that the picture was not there when I entered the room, and yet, how was its existence to be accounted for?

Could the wind have drawn back the tapestry, thus revealing some old family portrait? And who was this charming girl?

I now noticed points which had escaped me at first—the exquisite moulding of the arms and hands, the jewelled dagger in the coils of dark hair, which even in paint seemed to change and flash, and the background, which appeared to be copied from the very tapestry of the room. The face fascinated me. The eyes, so dark and magnetic, seemed to burn beneath their arched brows, and as I gazed they drooped, almost closed, then dilated.

Good heavens, this could be no portrait! The arms were moving!

The hands clasped and then fluttered to the sides; then slowly went up to the head, and took the dagger from the black coils of hair.

Surely this was no painted canvas. I tried to rise, to reach for the bell, but I seemed bound hand and foot. Every trace of energy had left me. It was as if my own life and activity had been transferred to the figure before me, leaving me lifeless as clay. As I looked, the girl bent her head over the dagger, and when she raised it I shuddered. The face was beautiful still, but every bit of feeling was gone, leaving it cold, sinister, cruel.

Then she raised her arms high above her head, and the lips moved. No sound came, but I felt that in that moment she had made a vow. The lips parted as if in laughter. All was silent, but it was so hard and cruel. Then all grew confused. The face and figure seemed to melt away. I closed my eyes for a moment, and when I looked again, the background of the picture seemed the same, but here the resemblance ceased.

On a low divan reclined a man, of perhaps nine-and-twenty. His eyes were closed; his face was very pale; but it was not the pallor of death. His dress corresponded in period with that of the girl's gown, although he looked ten years her senior.

The face was very familiar. Somewhere—and I racked my brain in vain to remember where—I had seen that face. Every line I knew. How long the man reclined thus I cannot tell. It seemed hours. It was, in all probability, a few moments, perhaps only seconds. A door seemed to open somewhere in the rear, and the girl entered. She bent over the man and listened; then softly knelt at his side. When she rose, the jewelled dagger slipped to the floor, Her hands trembled now, but the face remained unchanged.

Once more all grew indistinct, and when I could distinguish form and colour I seemed to be looking into a room, panelled with oak, from floor to ceiling. Before one panel stood the girl. Her hands moved uncertainly over it, and then chose the next one. It opened, as if by magic, disclosing a space about a foot square. Into this she dropped the dagger. For the third time the colours mingled, and again I was looking at the motionless figure on the divan.

His face seemed like alabaster in contrast with his dark hair. One hand, delicate as a woman's, hung at his side. Suddenly it flashed across me that the face before me was identical with the miniature on the bracelet. Yes, every feature was the same. The high rolling collar and stock which he wore completed the resemblance. Had it been in my power to sink back on my pillow, I certainly should have done so at this discovery, but as movement of any kind on my part was impossible, I could only gasp.

Near the divan stood the girl. Her arms hung motionless at her sides. She was almost as pale as he, save her lips, which were scarlet. Her beauty repelled and yet fascinated me. Never had I beheld such a face. She shivered slightly, and slowly, very slowly, sank down at his side. Her hair became unfastened and fell over her like a veil. For an instant I closed my eyes. The horror of it was overpowering. When I opened them she lay as if lifeless, and her hair, no longer black, gleamed in the moonlight like driven snow.

A moment later there was only the tapestry stirring in the wind.

Then I lost consciousness, and when I came to my senses the sun was high in the heavens. Before descending the stairs I took the bracelet from the case, for a close examination.

Digitized by Google

There was no room for mistake: the face and that which I had seen in the night were one and the same.

To come down from that chamber to the cosy breakfast-room seemed like stepping from one world into another. It may have been imagination, but I fancied that all regarded me rather curiously.

Lady Harcourt was the first to break the silence. "You rested well, I trust?" she said quietly, but, as I thought, with veiled interest.

I answered in the affirmative.

"And had pleasant dreams, Hal?" inquired Stanley.

"I don't think I dreamed at all," I replied, and the subject was dropped.

Immediately after breakfast, I found opportunity to remind my host of his promise in regard to the room. It is needless to say that I was now doubly anxious to know its history.

An hour later, we were seated alone in the small library acknowledged by all to be Stanley's special property.

"It is a long story," he said, "and I hardly know where to begin, but perhaps it would be as well to get to the point at once. First, let me say that it is only my great friendship for you, Halstone, that leads me to speak of this. It is something we seldom mention.

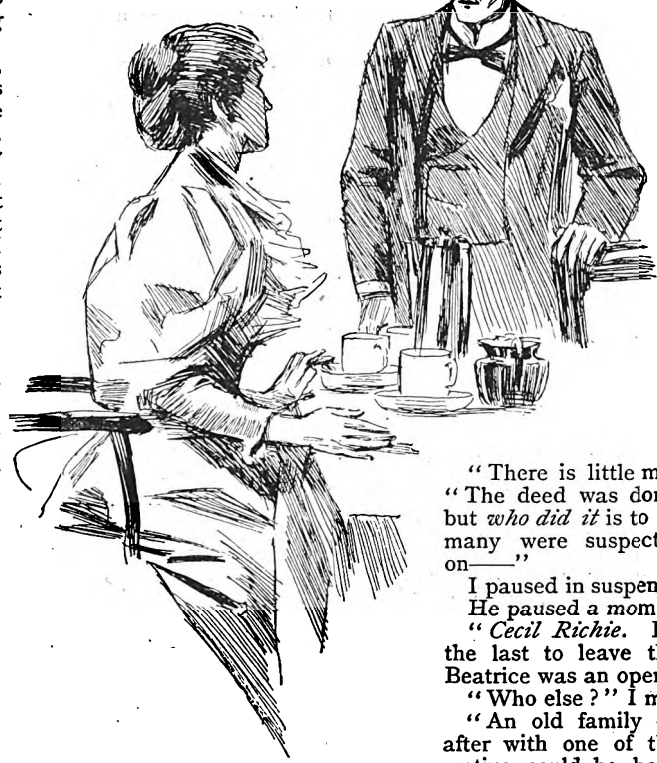
"My uncle, Lord Stanley, after whom I am named, was my father's eldest brother. He married a Miss Hartwell, Beatrice Hartwell, the only child of old Harold Hartwell. She was very beautiful, but absolutely without heart. At least, so I am told; of course I know nothing of her, for this was over thirty years ago. But her beauty is almost a tradition. There is a miniature of her, which I will show you later, and you can judge for yourself.

"Before her marriage with Lord Stanley, she had been engaged to Cecil Richie, her cousin. You know of the Richies?"

I nodded.

"It was broken off, and she married my uncle. He was a better match, of course; but now, when I think of it all, I believe she always cared for Richie.

"Well, my uncle had the west rooms fitted up, and she came here a bride. I will show you the second one later. You will like to see it, I expect. It is panelled entirely in oak—rather interesting in its way."



"You rested well, I trust?"

The book I was toying with fell to the floor.

"It was only a short time after the wedding that a very strange thing happened."

He stopped short and glanced quickly round the room.

"Edith knows nothing of this," he said. Then, dropping his voice, he continued:

"It was in September—the eleventh, I think."

"Last night," I said softly.

Stanley did not hear me.

"A large party was given, and half the county was here; among others, Cecil Richie. I remember my old nurse telling me how beautiful Lady Beatrice looked in her white gown and jewels. She had magnificent jewels, by the way. That evening, at dinner, a strange thing happened, and my old nurse used to say it was an omen of what followed.

"Beatrice wore a pair of bracelets—Stanley's bridal gift. They were of twisted gold, each with a miniature surrounded by diamonds. One represented Lord Stanley; the other her ladyship. It was a quaint fancy, carried out by a famous French artist."

I sank back in my chair.

"Why, good heavens, Hal, how pale you are! Why, what is the matter, man?"

"Nothing," I answered, "go on! Your tale interests me strangely."

"After dinner, as the ladies were leaving the dining-room, Lady Beatrice drew back the portières for them to pass out.

"As she did so, one of the bracelets caught in the meshes of the curtain, and although of excellent workmanship, or apparently so, when it was disentangled it was in pieces. It seemed a trifle at the time, but superstitious people remembered it."

"Was it the bracelet containing her portrait?" I asked.

"No, it was his."

Stanley rose from the chair and paced the room, looking at me in some anxiety.

"Odd how the mere relating of something you know only by hearsay stirs you up."

He seated himself and continued:

"The guests were late in taking their departure, and it was long after midnight when the family retired. My uncle had gone to his room some what earlier, not feeling particularly well.

"That night," and his voice sank to a whisper, "he was murdered—yes, murdered in his own house. Next morning they found him stretched lifeless on one of the blue divans, and Lady Beatrice unconscious at his side."

I leaned back in my chair, while a feeling of deadly faintness came over me. I could hardly breathe.

"There is little more to tell," Stanley continued. "The deed was done; there was no doubt of that, but who did it is to this day a mystery. Of course, many were suspected, but suspicion fell chiefly on——"

I paused in suspense.

He paused a moment and then said softly:

"Cecil Richie. It was brought out that he was the last to leave the house, and his devotion to Beatrice was an open secret."

"Who else?" I managed to ask.

"An old family servant, who disappeared soon after with one of the maids. But what possible motive could he have had? He was devoted to Lord Stanley and always had been, and was a favourite with the whole household. At this time certain jewels also disappeared. The dagger that Lady Beatrice wore in her hair that very night was never seen again, and the broken bracelet seems to have melted into thin air, too. I regret the loss of the latter extremely, for it was the sole portrait of Lord Stanley, and the marked resemblance he bore to my father would have made it doubly precious. Then the diamonds made it very valuable, for they were of the purest water. The servant, as I said, disappeared, and Cecil Richie, evidently finding English air not quite to his taste, went abroad and to all appearance dropped out of existence."

"Was no one else suspected?"

"My mother," and Stanley again dropped his voice, "had one theory, which differed from that of everybody else, and that was, that Lady Beatrice herself did the deed." He paused for me to take in the full import of the words.

"Poor mother! She never liked Beatrice. There had always been a good deal of girlish rivalry between them, and I sometimes think Richie was at the bottom of that, too."

Digitized by Google

"Rather odd," I interrupted, "providing they cared for one man, that they should have afterwards married brothers."

"Yes, the whole affair from beginning to end is strange, and one I should certainly doubt, if I were to hear it from any one else."

"What is your own theory, Stanley? Do you agree with your mother?"

"Do you think I am mad?" he replied. "How could I believe a young girl capable of such a thing? She was heartless; but, good heavens, it takes more than lack of heart to do such a deed! I should suspect Captain Richie far sooner, and yet all his conduct was very straightforward and manly at the time. But as for Lady Beatrice, why, man, it nearly killed her. In that one night her hair turned white as snow. Oh, they say she was 'regal,' and that she was far lovelier than before! People were not at all surprised when five years later she became Countess de Rousillon. Poor Beatrice! misfortunes followed her. It was a very unhappy marriage, and, to crown all, her only child was stolen. Kidnapping seems to have been in vogue twenty years ago; only this child was never recovered. It is small wonder that the Countess died of a broken heart."

Lady Beatrice drew back the portières.

I rose from my seat and went to the window. "Stanley," I said, "who has occupied that room since the affair?"

"Let me think. Two persons, I believe."

"Do you mean to say that I am only the third?"

"Why, yes! What is it! You don't mean you saw or heard anything? The servants call the room haunted, but that is scarcely to be wondered at. Besides, in these enlightened times, ghosts are out of fashion."

"Tell me about the other two," I persisted.

"The others—why, one was my cousin—and it was years ago. He was taken ill that night with a raging fever, and died a few weeks later. But the room had nothing to do with it. The doctors said it had been in his system for weeks. The other was a little scatter-brained French governess. She was put in there, when the house was crowded with guests. She was a queer thing—believed in spiritualism and all that, and I was not surprised to hear of her becoming insane."

"One died," I muttered, "one became insane. I wonder——." At this moment the door opened, and Edith stood on the threshold. She made a charming picture in her simple cotton gown and garden hat.

"May I ask the meaning of this solemn conclave?" she said. "I don't think it's a bit kind of you, Stanley," turning to her brother, "to drag Mr. Craig off to this stuffy room when the tennis court is just suffering to be used."

"I will compel him to release me as soon as possible," I answered gaily, and the door closed.

"I fear I have been rather selfish, Hal."

"Not at all. I haven't had my say yet. First let me ask if you have ever doubted my sanity; that is, you have believed me to be of tolerably sound intellect."

"Generally—yes," laughed Stanley.

"Very well, then, listen to what I am about to say, and never again express your disbelief in ghosts."

I began disconnectedly; but before I had gone very far, my friend was as white and speechless as I could wish.

"Now," said I, "let me see Lady Beatrice's portrait, for that will be the final test, and after that I have something to show you," and I drew out the little box. When Stanley handed me the bracelet, I gave a cry, for the face that looked out from its frame of diamonds was the one I had seen the night before—the same dark eyes, the puffed hair—even the gown was not unlike. The bracelet was of twisted gold, the only difference in the two being that the diamonds in mine were of inferior quality and a suspicion now flashed across me that they were not the original stones.

"Now," said I, "you will see my latest purchase from Isaac," and with considerable pride I opened the box and handed it to Stanley. I have seen surprise depicted on the human countenance, but I never saw, nor have I seen since, quite such an expression as came into my friend's face. After that, our talk was absorbing, and it is needless to say that Edith and tennis were forgotten. Stanley was eager to go to London, find L—— and ferret out the bracelet mystery at once.

Later in the day we examined the panelled room, but no amount of tapping and pressing would reveal the hidden recess.

That night we watched in the white-and-gold room, but the silent guests did not appear. The rest of the week passed off delightfully. Edith and I became excellent friends. When I left Harcourt Park, I carried away two distinct impressions, one of Lady Beatrice and the other of Edith Harcourt.

Stanley and I spent a fruitless week in searching for L—— and when at last we found that worthy, the information which he gave us was anything but satisfactory. He remembered vaguely about the bracelet. It was left to be mended years ago—he thought, by a woman—and was never called for. As for removing the diamonds, he was shocked that one of his high standing should be accused of such a thing. As for the Jew, he had purchased the bracelet at his sale when many such articles went for nothing—positively nothing.

Almost immediately, I began a full-length portrait of Lady Beatrice, as I first beheld her against the tapestry hangings. I had the miniature as a guide, but that was scarcely necessary, for her face haunted me continually. One morning, when the picture was nearly finished, I received the following telegram from Stanley:

"West wing totally destroyed by fire. I send you something found in the ruins."

A box arrived later, and when opened disclosed a dagger of quaint workmanship. It was dim with rust, and the blade was badly damaged, but the jewels were in perfect condition.

The portrait was finished. It won me fame and fortune, and fame and fortune won Lady Harcourt's consent to my marriage with her daughter

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

Insures your life while travelling by rail for £1,000, insures Cyclists against fatal accidents for £100, and protects its readers against loss by Burglary to the extent of £20.

P.W. has paid over £3,000 on account of its different insurance systems.

It is the only paper which insures against Burglary.

Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

CHAPTER XII.

JUSTINA was in the right mood now to do anything for me, so we went into the house. Yara sat by the table, and after speaking to me, he asked her to play monte.

She sat down at the table with him, and I watched them—their brown evil faces and small bright eyes; straight, black hair; he so gaunt and lean; she so wrinkled and old; they age so young, those women. I thought what a queer girl I was, and what company I kept, and I wondered if there ever was a worse charge to unfortunate relatives than myself.

Justina joked about putting him in a trance. She had evidently mentioned it before to him; finally he agreed, saying she could not. Shading the flickering candle with a book from his face, she went to him and began making passes over his forehead with her fingers, wringing them lightly each time, as if she had dipped them in water.

"He will talk soon," said Justina softly. I looked at the man; his eyes had a strange, dull look, staring straight before him, and his breath came heavy and regular like a sleeper's.

"Tell me, who was Xarras?" asked Justina, repeating my whispered question.

"Xarras was our captain once," said Yara proudly. "He was very young. He was one of the band, but so brave that when our old leader died we elected Xarras in his place. He was brave, but not prudent; he loved women, and through them our band was scattered."

"Tell me how?" asked Justina.

"Xarras was mad for a woman in Texas; he loved her years; he often went to see her. When she married another man, he was never the same afterward. One day he came to us in great joy. She had written him that her husband and other men were going to Mexico; she told the route they would take. There would be only one or two old women, the rest young wives and two girls. 'Emigrants have no money,' said one of the band. 'But these have,' answered Xarras, and described the leader.

"We knew him, a dashing young fellow who had hunted us when we robbed his father's ranch on the border; for his family owned great properties in Mexico. 'They will have arms and plenty of men,' said another of the band. 'One can buy Mexicans,' said Xarras, 'we must watch for an opportunity to raid the camp. All I want is one woman; the plunder you can have.' 'Why the trouble? The lady must be willing to come since she herself wrote you,' said an objector. 'It is this,' he answered, 'she fears her husband; he loves her madly, he trusts her; if she is stolen bodily, he will believe her innocent and will not kill her.'

"The rest argued; some wanted the other women; then the band divided, and—I went with Xarras.

"We followed their train of waggons for days, often meeting them, two or three of us, on pretence of asking the way or getting tobacco. Xarras never went near, though he directed us. Dios! what a time it took, but one day our spy came to us; the men were hunting; only one on watch, his name Lombardi, and some Mexicans, two of whom were our own men whom we had smuggled in.

"They were camped on the borders of a little stream. It was near sunset when we rode down, seven of us and the captain. We were painted as Indians—we did not wish to be tracked or known. We killed Lombardi, the Mexicans ran away. Caramba! how the women screamed, the captain's lady loudest. Dios! she was a beauty! They were idiots, those women; they all wished to die."

"Where are they now? How did they die?" asked Justina eagerly. I clutched her arm and shook my head. I could not bear that.

"I am weary," answered the man, "I cannot tell you all; they are dead. The captain's lady too. I have heard those emigrants swore an oath to hunt us down and kill us. They succeeded. I and my captain only are left. He is a great lord in Mexico."

"How did they know you were not Indians? One of us tell?" asked Justina; she has no faith in her own people.

"They dared not; it was a woman; too late the captain's lady remembered we had not all the women. One girl had gone for a walk that afternoon, and was missed in the excitement. She, hidden in the trees, saw us, and she knew us all. She identified all but the captain. She never will find him."

"Why didn't the captain help you among the Apachés?" I cried, and the man gasped, moved uneasily, half-waked, then fell forward on the table.

"You broke the spell," cried Justina, "I told you not to speak. See, he is really sleeping now."

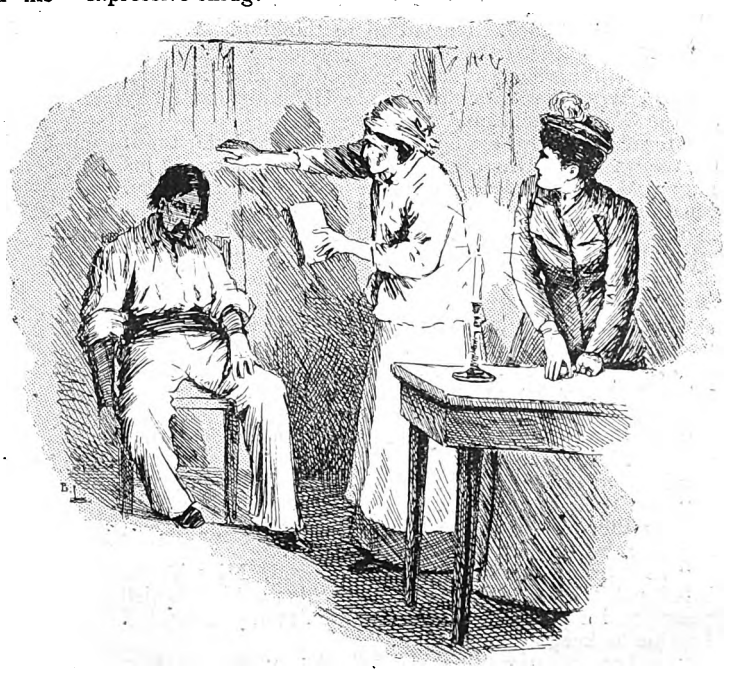
I ran past her, out into the air, over the beach like a mad creature, even in my room hiding my head and locking the door. I could not shut the horror out, and all that night, and many more, I saw Antonio's hideous face and a throng of ghastly, murderous men. I hardly dared look Aunt Marg in the face for fear she would read my guilty thoughts, and Justina became to me as grandfather said I was to him, a living conscience.

At last, however, unable to bear my terror alone, I set out to her cottage. There she was, ambling along the beach, just ahead of me, looking very smart for her. She heard me running, turned quickly to see who it was, and dropped from her hand something yellow and shining that rolled along the sand. I picked it up, a gold piece. She took it from me, looking away from my eyes.

"I went to buy Yara medicine."

"Justina," I said severely, "you are lying. Yara said he had not a farthing; if he had you'd have robbed him when he was ill. You couldn't help it."

"I couldn't help it, Chica," she repeated coolly, with that expressive shrug.



She began making passes over his forehead.

Digitized by Google

I could not shut the horror out.

"Well, where did you get the money?"

"I found it in the street."

"You never did; Galveston isn't paved with gold. If you don't tell me I will never come to your house again; never be your Chica any more."

"A gentleman gave it to me."

"What for?"

"Caring for Yara."

"Was it Mr. Scott?"

"Yes, Chica, he has been twice to see Yara."

"You awful story-teller," I cried; "Bruce told me to-day John Scott had not got back from up North, where he went with his mother and aunt. You see I have caught you. If you will act the liar with the only being you love and who loves you, we part here, Justina."

I turned away, and she, seeing I meant it, hobbled up to me. "You take the money, Chica; don't be angry with Justina."

"You insult me."

"The man was Colonel Gregory," she hissed, in a frightened whisper. "Chica, if you tell he will kill me; he is a wicked man. Don't you cometo my house and make me do wrong. I will go back to San Antonio; what prayers I have to say, because you have made me sin; and the priest says I must burn for years in purgatory because of lies for you. Never a mass will you have sad for my soul; and when I am dead you will forget me."

"You shall have all the masses I can buy—I love you!" I cried, and hugged her; "and no more trances, dear, nor will I come till Yara is gone. Send him away any time. I hate him; but that was a real true trance, Justina, not one you used to play on the girls."

"It was true, sweet," she said, scuttling away with a queer sly look on her face. I stood there thinking. Why did my Aunt Marg hate the Colonel, and how did Xarras know Katherine, the wife of a man who stood as high as John Scott? What had brought Yara to Galveston, and why did the Colonel visit him?

I turned quickly round and walked toward the town. On the way Dean Gregory rode by. He never raises his hat; only an insolent nod, like a slap in my face. Meeting him spurred me on. I went straight to the market, where I thought I would meet Bruce. It was about his time to be there. Sure enough, he was just driving down the street. I called him to stop and take me in the waggon.

"Mr. Scott told me to come up and get flowers when I wanted them," I explained. He was pleased to have me for company, and as we drove along I said carelessly, "Did you ever see my sister Katherine, Bruce?"

"Yes," he said shortly.

"Was she married to John Scott long before they went to Mexico?"

"Dat ain't none ob yo' affairs," grunted Bruce.

"You used to have such good manners, Bruce, I've heard; they said you were like the doctor, John's father, so polite, but you are cranky enough now."

"Yo' own manners ain't none too good, Miss Vi'let, I tell yo'," he said crossly; "yo' allus askin' foolish questions dat ain't yo' business. I won't tell you nothin'. I gwine to keep my mouf shut."

"Just one question," I said coaxingly. "Wasn't Dean Gregory just a little bit in love with my sister Katherine?"

What Bruce had known in the past of the affairs of those two I never knew, but there must have been something, for he jumped as if he had been shot.

"I declar' Vi'let, yo' mo' debbil in yo' den enny libbin' creetur'," nor would he say another word. I got out of the waggon in sulky silence. In the garden, in a spirit of wantonness, I picked handfuls of roses and crushed them in my arms until my gown was covered with their petals, and my face moist and sweet from their dying fragrance.

I prowled along, then, in the shadiest path, seeing none of the beauty there, hearing neither the soft echoing of the sea nor the tinkling fountain. I only watched a little window under the eaves where I knew Dean Gregory's belongings were stored. When I saw the servants were at dinner, I went softly into the hall, where the door stood ajar, and then, with a guilty look over my shoulder, fled upstairs, then up another flight, and then up a third, short one, to a dim, low room under the roof. In the wilderness of boxes and trunks I burrowed, but not a sign of the past I wanted to read came to me.

There were plenty of curious relics in the box marked D.G.; letters from many ladies that I fancy they would not have liked me to see, faded and simpering photographs, unpaid bills, lots of them, and garments of every style and cut. In despair I gathered up my roses and started away. On the wall hung a faded grey coat; the uniform of the Confederate army. I went to it and searched the pockets. In the breast pocket were two letters postmarked New York and Charleston. I looked at the signatures: "Ever yours, Katherine."

I thrust them in the bosom of my gown and went quietly down the stairs. I had proofs that Katherine was not the angel John Scott thought her. He should fling her in my face no more. The fact that I was aiming to destroy the good name of my sister never occurred to me. I was sure Dean Gregory was Xarras. Had I not heard his mother say he used to be so often in Mexico, in his youth, and how she used to worry about him?

I went softly into the cool dark parlour to think over my store of information, and what I should do with it. The room was darkened with blinds and thick lace curtains, very cool and fragrant with flowers from the garden. It was divided from the front room by heavy portieres, that I blessed afterward. I sank into a chair, my roses still in my arms.

"If I tell all this to John Scott," I thought, "he may murder his own cousin, and there's another horror to haunt me all my days."

At that very moment a voice sent the blood to my face.

Dean Gregory rode by.

Digitized by Google

"Show the gentleman in here, Bruce," said John Scott. I heard the sound of footsteps over the soft carpet and the rolling of chairs. I saw through a chink behind the portiere that the visitors were Maestro, white and scared, and two solemn-looking Italians. "This is better than outdoors," said Mr. Scott pleasantly. "Now I assure you I meant no offence in my letter, not the slightest. I will even apologise."

"We came to demand an apology or to seek satisfaction," said one of the solemn men stiffly.

"I don't believe in fighting," said Scott, and I could detect a ring of laughter in his voice; "besides, I am in the wrong. Before I met your friend I thought him an adventurer seeking to impose on the credulity of a young girl; I find my mistake. He meant well, and I am sure that he will pardon me and accept my hand."

I could imagine Maestro gingerly shaking that iron hand, looking as if the whole Italian Government was on his trail.

"When I went to the gentleman's house," continued Mr. Scott, "he evidently distrusted my motives. He shut the door in my face, and informed me, from an upper window, that he would call the police. Truly, I am not a ruffian. You will find us very civil men in this new country, if you only knew us better."

"I seek not ze knowledge, I vil not try ze experiments," cried Maestro; "I depart for ze city what you call Boston."

"I am sorry," said Mr. Scott, "for I hoped that you would continue Miss Lombard's lessons."

"Nevare! ze young mees haf deceived me. I understan' she was reech."

"She will be," continued Scott cheerfully, "much better off than most singers, unless she has a wonderful voice. Bruce, bring some wine." I heard the click of glasses, the popping of champagne corks, and a flow of conversation soon afterward.

"You must not think Miss Lombard deceived you," said Mr. Scott; "she will have a large fortune some day, but her family would never consent to her going on the stage."

"Ze old man, most probable, is vat you say, he does not compr'end, but you, signor, I may spek wif you, I call you my fren," said Maestro thickly. "Mees haf not ze grande voice; she is not great artist; zare are few of zem; she is pretty mees, an if zare was monaire, I will be frank wiz you, my fren, my brodaire, I would go into vat you call a spec, a speculate with mees. Why should I not haf monaire as well as ze milliner, ze merchant; why not ze lessons instead of ze dresses, ze diamonds? It vil do her no harm to think she cantatrice. Diavolo, one must live?"

I sat there in burning indignation; I believe I could have strangled the little wretch. I heard them talk of other things and finally go away. Then, Mr. Scott came back. He stood in the doorway looking at the glasses, then he broke into a laugh. That was beyond human endurance; with my arms full of stolen roses, scattering them as I went, I rushed into the room and confronted him.

"Upon my word," he gasped.

"I heard everything," I cried. "You always make me out a silly thing, and win my friends away. You always come out right, in your self-righteous way, to humiliate me. I won't be good any more—never, never—I will be a very demon."

He laughed and looked at me. "You are beginning well," he said, "yet you came in more like a goddess of the morn, scattering flowers as you went; but your hair is all cobwebs, your face actually positively dirty, Letty. You are doing well in the demon line. In the career there are no frivolities of gown and ribbons, I suppose. Really, I am a brute to tease you. Come here, and let me play father confessor. Why did you not tell me?"

He drew me to the sofa, and held my hand tight to keep me there.

"I suppose you think it is manly to break people's bones," I muttered.

"No, I do not," he answered, "and you know that," but he did not release my hand. "Was it not better to learn the truth, even as you heard it, Letty, than to go on being self-deceived?"

"I would have succeeded," I said swiftly, "and oh, it gave me something to live for. In time I thought I could lift the millstone of gratitude that has hung round my neck all my days and pay you back. I could support Aunt Marg and grandfather when he was too old to work. I would be a great and good woman, and you would not dare to look down on me. I would be more than your equal, for I would have won my fame and money, and you were born to wealth and had good looks, and just fell into all you wanted because you were a man."

"I am glad that you admit I am good looking," he said, smiling.

I stamped my foot. "I hate you! I hate you!" I cried, "and if I told you all I knew, you would not dare smile in that self-righteous way. You would not look me in the face. I am tired of hearing you held up to be so good, so wonderful. When I tell you what I know, and every word is true, you will see why I hate you, and why to me, with all your airs and sermons, you are no better than a criminal, Mr. John Scott!"

The moment those wicked words were out of my mouth I would have given all the world to recall them. "Oh, forgive me," I sobbed, when I saw his face; "in my grief and anger I did not know what I was saying. I do not mean it; on my knees I ask you to forgive me." I sank down on the floor, at his side, hiding my face. "If I could be struck dead I would be glad."

"I wonder," he said, gently looking down on me and stroking my hair, "if death would ever blot out that scene from your memory, my poor little girl. I have wondered always at the odd things you said, the way you shuddered when I touched you." He took his hand away from my head. "On this trip to the North I went to New Orleans, and there—God help us both!—I learnt your sad secret."

He took a tiny packet from his breast-pocket, as I looked at him with wide, wondering eyes. Then, with a sad look into my face, he laid in my lap my own handkerchief, that I had left in the Hotel Gilbert.

My own handkerchief that I had left at the Hotel Gilbert.

(To be continued next week)

To prevent unnecessary labour, and consequent disappointment, to any readers of this paper, who in the past have forwarded original stories for insertion, we would take this opportunity of saying that our arrangements for the provision of matter for "Short Stories" are complete for some time to come.

Digitized by Google

THE MAD MOTHER.

THE insane have for me a peculiar attraction. They dwell in a mysterious realm of fantastical dreams, in that impenetrable cloud of madness, where everything they have seen on earth, everything they have loved, everything they have done, comes to them again in imaginary existence untrammelled by all the laws that govern events and rule the human mind.

For them, the impossible no longer exists, the improbable disappears, magic is real, and the supernatural familiar. The previous barriers of common-sense logic and reason break, fall and crumble beneath their freed imaginations, escaping, with fabulous leaps which nothing can arrest, to the limitless land of fancy. They make no efforts to control events, overcome resistances or obstacles; for at their whim they can be princes, emperors or gods, can possess all the riches of the world, all the good things of life, enjoy all pleasures, be always strong and comely, eternally young and ever cherished. They can only be happy here below; for, for them, Reality is dead.

I love to bend over their vagrant reason, as one bends over an abyss in whose depths foams an unknown torrent, come from one knows not where, and bound one knows not whither.

Still the strangest fancies of madmen are in sane and familiar ideas, strange only because no longer enchained by reason.

The capricious source fills us with astonishment merely because we have not seen it spout forth. Nevertheless, the insane always interest me, and I constantly seek them out, irresistibly attracted by that commonplace mystery, madness.

So, one day, while visiting one of their asylums, the doctor who was escorting me said:

"Wait. I want to show you an unusually interesting case," and he opened the door of a cell where a woman, about forty years of age, still beautiful, was seated in an arm-chair, and gazed persistently at her features in a hand-glass.

As soon as she perceived us, she rose, ran to the opposite side of the room, picked up a veil, and, after carefully covering her face, responded to our greeting by a slight movement of her head.

"Well," said the doctor, "how are you this morning?"

She sighed deeply. "Oh, ill—very ill, sir; there are more marks every day."

He replied decisively:

"No, I assure you that there are not. Indeed, you are mistaken."

She leaned towards him to whisper:

"No, I am sure. I counted ten more pit-holes this morning—three on the right cheek, four on the left, and three, too, on my forehead. It is frightful, frightful! I shall no longer dare to see anyone, not even my son—no, not even him! Nothing can be done, I am disfigured for life," and sobbing bitterly she dropped heavily into her chair.

The doctor seated himself near her, and said in a low, consoling voice:

"Come, show them to me. I know they are not serious. With but a slight cauterisation I can efface them all."

She shook her head in denial, but did not speak. He then tried to raise her veil, but she seized it so strongly with both hands that her nails pierced it.

The doctor once more strove to coax and re-assure her:

"Come, you know that I always get them away, those ugly marks—that no one can see them in the least after I have attended to them; but if you will not show them to me, of course I cannot cure you."

She murmured:

"Well, you I do not mind; but I do not know the gentleman who is with you."

"He is also a doctor, who will care for you still better than I."

Then she allowed her face to be uncovered, suffused with blushes from emotion and the shame of being seen. She lowered her eyes, turned her head from side to side to avoid our gaze, and stammered:

"Oh, how I suffer at showing myself like this! Horrible, is it not? Horrible!"

I contemplated her with the utmost astonishment, for not the slightest mark, spot, or scar was visible on her countenance.

She turned to me, her eyes still lowered, and said:

"It was while taking care of my son that I caught this frightful disease, sir. I saved him, but I am disfigured. I gave him my beauty, poor child! Well, I did my duty, and my conscience is at rest. If I suffer, only God knows it."

The doctor had taken from his pocket a small camel's-hair brush.

"Sit still," said he, "and let me take out those spots."

She turned her right cheek, and he began touching it here and there as lightly as though placing small dots of colour. He then treated the left cheek in the same manner, next the chin and forehead, and exclaimed:

"Look, they are all gone, all gone!"

She took up the mirror, contemplated herself fixedly for some moments, with the keenest anxiety, striving, if possible, to discover something; then said with a sigh:

"No, they no longer show much. I thank you infinitely."

The doctor had risen. He bowed to her, showed me out, and following after said, as soon as the door was closed:

"I will tell you that unfortunate woman's cruel history. Her name is Hermet. She was exceedingly beautiful, very coquettish, sincerely beloved and entirely happy. She was one of those women who have nothing in the world but their beauty and the desire to sustain and cherish it to console them. The constant care of her complexion, her hands, her teeth, and each visible charm occupied every hour and all her attention.

"She became a widow with an only son. The child was brought up as are all children of greatly admired society women; nevertheless, she loved him.

"He grew tall and she—old. Did she see the fatal crisis approaching? I cannot tell. Did she, like so many others, look each morning for hours at the skin, once so delicate, transparent, and fresh, now beginning to wrinkle a trifle under the eyes, to change beneath a thousand lines, still imperceptible, but which would grow deeper day by day, and month by month?

"Did she also see increase, slowly but surely, the long forehead lines, endure the torture, the abominable torture, of the small handglass, that one cannot decide to lay down, and yet throws angrily aside to seize upon again and view nearer, still nearer, the calm, odious ravages of approaching old age?

"Did she lock herself into her bedroom ten or twenty times a day, leaving, for no reason, the drawing-room and the conversation of friends, to gaze once more on the work of destruction, to view with despair the slow progress of the ill that no one else seems yet to see, but that she herself sees so clearly? She knows where the ravages are greatest, the bites of time the deepest. And the glass, the little handglass in its graven silver frame, tells her abominable things, for it seems to speak, to smile, to mock at bodily suffering and atrocious mental torment, which she must undergo until the day of her death, which will be that of her deliverance.

"Did she weep, distracted, upon her knees, and pray, pray, pray that one who thus kills human beings, and gives them youth to make age more unbearable, and lends them beauty but to take it quickly back again: did she pray and supplicate Him to do for her what He has never yet done for any—to leave her until death her freshness, grace, and charm? Then, comprehending that she implored in vain the inflexible Unknown who hastens the years, did she beat her brow and wring her hands in an agony of silent despair?

"Doubtless she endured all those tortures, for this is what happened.

"One day—she was then thirty-five years of age—her son, aged fifteen, fell ill.

"He was confined to his bed before anyone could determine the cause of his suffering or its exact nature. A priest, his tutor, watched constantly beside him, while Madame Hermet came morning and evening to see him.

Digitized by Google

"She would come in the morning in her dressing-gown, smiling and perfumed, and ask, even before she passed the door:

"'Well, Georges, are you not better?'

"And the big boy, with his face swollen and red from fever, would reply:

"'Yes, mother dear, a little better.'

"She would remain a few moments in his room, look at the vials of medicine with an expression of disgust, then exclaim suddenly: 'Oh, I've forgotten something very important,' and run quickly out.

"At night she would appear in a low-cut bodice, in still more of a hurry, for she was always late, and would have but just time to ask:

"'Well, what did the doctor say?'

"The tutor replied:

"'He has not yet decided, madame.'

"At length, one night, the tutor answered: 'Madame, your son has the small-pox.'

"She uttered a cry of terror and fled.

"When her maid entered her bedroom on the morrow, she smelled a strong odour of burned sugar, and found her mistress in bed, trembling with anguish, and with cheeks pale from want of sleep. Madame Hermet asked, as soon as her blinds were drawn:

"How is Georges?"

"'Oh, not well at all to-day, madame.'

"She rose at noon, ate only an egg and drank a cup of tea, as though she had been ill, then went out and learned of a chemist how to guard against contagion from small-pox.

"She returned at dinner-time loaded down with vials, and went immediately to her room, where she saturated herself and her clothing with disinfectants.

"The tutor awaited her in the dining-room. As soon as she met him, she exclaimed in tones of deepest emotion, 'Well?'

"'Oh, no better. The doctor is very anxious.'

"She began to fret, and could eat nothing whatever.

"On the morrow at daybreak she sent to inquire, and, receiving news no more favourable, passed the entire day in her room, where smoked innumerable small braziers that gave forth pungent odours.

"Her servant also stated that she could be heard moaning all night long.

"A week passed thus, during which she did nothing save take the air an hour or two in the afternoon. She asked for news every hour, and wept bitterly each time it was worse.

"On the eleventh day, in the morning, the tutor, having had himself announced, entered her apartment, his face pale and grave, and, refusing to seat himself, said:

"'Madame, your son is much worse, and asks to see you.'

"She fell on her knees and cried:

"'Oh, my God, my God! I shall never dare! Help me, oh, my God!'

"'The doctor has little hope, madame, and Georges is waiting for you!'

"Then he left her.

"Two hours later, as the young man grew weaker and again called for his mother, the tutor went once more to her room, and found her yet upon her knees, still weeping and repeating:

"'I cannot! I cannot! I am too afraid. I cannot!'

"He strove to persuade, to fortify, and urge her; but succeeded only in bringing on an attack of nervous paroxysms of long duration.

"The doctor, having returned towards night, was informed of her cowardice, and declared that he would bring her, willing or not.

"But after having exhausted all arguments, as he took hold of her to carry her to her son, she clung to the door with such obstinate grasp that it was impossible to move her.

"Then, when they had abandoned the struggle, she prostrated herself at the physician's feet, calling herself a wretch, and begging for pardon.

"'But, oh, he will not die!' she screamed. 'Tell me he will not die! Tell him I love him, worship him!'

"The youth was in the agony of death, and, feeling that he had but a few last moments, he implored them to persuade his mother to come and bid him adieu. With the presentiment which the dying often have, he seemed to know and comprehend all that had taken place, and said:

"'If she fears to enter, beg her just to come by the balcony to my window, that I may at least see her, and bid her good-bye in a look, since I must not kiss her.'

"The doctor and the tutor returned once more to that woman.

"'You incur not the slightest risk,' they declared, 'for there will be a window pane between you and him.'

"She consented, covered her head, took up a bottle of smelling-salts, and made three steps upon the balcony, then, suddenly, hiding her face in her hands, she moaned:

"'No, no, I dare not see him—never—I am too ashamed, too afraid! No, I cannot!'

"They tried to drag her, but she clutched the rails in desperation, and groaned so piteously that she attracted the attention of passers-by in the street below.

"And the dying boy still waited, his eyes turned toward that window, for a last look at the sweet face of his dearly-beloved mother.

"He waited long, and night came. Then he turned his face to the wall, and spoke no more.

"When day broke he was dead.

"On the morrow, she was insane."

Digitized by Google

THE NEW BURGLAR TRAP AND ITS VICTIM.

In building my house in the suburbs of London I had an eye to comfort, convenience, economy of space and—burglars. I built my burglar trap at the same time that I built the villa. A covered verandah ran along the west side of the house, the roof only twenty inches below the second-storey windows. There are two bedrooms on that side, but a burglar would have imagined that there were three. The third window did not light a bedroom, however, but was the entrance to my trap.

I could not reasonably expect a burglar to climb up the pillar at the north end of the verandah and creep past the first window to the second. The convenience of a burglar must be consulted in planning and building. I had a stout trellis work made and fastened to the centre pillar exactly under the middle window.

I told my wife that it was for a climbing rose, but I deceived her. It was placed there for the sole and single purpose of assisting a burglar to get into the house. A burglar had but to cross a vacant building plot next door, where trees and bushes gave him shelter, drop over a fence and creep a distance of ten feet, and there he was. In planning the house I said to the builder:

"I have seen a dozen burglars in court or prison, but I had no hand in their capture. My strong desire is to capture one myself. I want to take him in the very act. My house must, therefore, contain a burglar trap as well as a drawing-room."

The middle window lighted a room twelve feet long by eight wide, which was provided with chests and drawers as a linen room. On each side was a bed-room, and at the far end a door opened into the hall. The burglar alarm connected with all other windows but this. All other sashes had a patent burglar proof catch, but these had one which a child might open from the outside.

Inside the window, and sliding up and down the casings, as a drawer pulls out, was an iron shutter, which worked by means of a spring. By pressing a knob in my bed-room at the front of the house I could drop this shutter. The walls on either side were of brick, and the inside of the door was covered with heavy sheet iron. It was a floor paved with wooden bricks, and exactly under the window, just where a burglar must put his foot, was a square of flooring so arranged that a pressure of five pounds on it rang an alarm at the head of my bed.

From one of the adjoining rooms was a peephole, and the burglar trap was lighted by electricity, which was turned on and off from the hall. There was one thing more. A gas pipe was run into the room from the hall, and the end left open. The flow of gas could be regulated by a stopcock outside the room.

As I had been to considerable pains and expense in fitting this trap for a burglar, I hoped for an early visit, but for some reason or other the profession seemed to have lost its push and ambition. Weeks and months went by, but no burglar came. Other houses were visited and ransacked, and my nearest neighbour was even shot at by a midnight visitor; but, alas! I was entirely ignored. In this emergency I resorted to stratagem. No, it was not stratagem, but base deception. A reporter called on me to get the particulars of an accident in my neighbourhood and I told him a falsehood about a burglar effecting an entrance to my house. I spoke about my silver plate and jewellery and of the large sum of money I usually kept in the house, and gave him to understand that I was a nervous, timid man, and had no weapons to defend my treasures. The reporter worked up a very readable and seductive article, and, to ease my conscience, I sent him a £5 note in such a manner that he could not possibly trace its source.

Yes, I must say that if I had been in the burglar profession, that article would have filled me with enthusiasm. I hadn't read it half through when I felt convinced that I should receive an early visit. No burglar worthy of the name would go off fishing and leave such an opening as that to go to seed.

Two days later, as I took the train for my three-mile ride home, it so happened that there were but four other passengers in our compartment. Three of them I knew; the fourth was a stranger, and I was bound to give him more than a passing glance. To be frank, he annoyed me. He not only had small feet, but the heel of his right boot was badly over-trodden.

You may think it was queer that I was vexed about the young man's boot-heel, but such was the case. Nothing makes a man look so slouchy as runover heels. They spoil his walk, produce blisters and corns, and keep his temper unnecessarily sharp.

I thought of the young man several times during the evening, and he was in my mind when I went outdoors after breakfast to stroll about and smoke my cigar. I had not to look long before I discovered that he had also been thinking of me. In the fresh earth of a newly-made flower bed were the prints of his heels. I could have identified that heel in China. During the evening he had looked the ground over, passing twice round the house. If not a burglar, then he was a burglar's scout. I couldn't say what he had thought of things, but I rather expected he would take the trouble to push his investigations a little further before he attempted to enter the house.

Therefore, before leaving for the City, I said to the cook:

"Some time to-day a young man will be here to ask about the burglar alarm. Tell him that it is all right except on the linen-room window, and that we don't care about."

When I came home at night I asked if he had been there. He had. He came with some tools tied up in a piece of carpet, and the cook even went out and pointed to the unguarded window. Then I knew that he would visit us that night. As near as I could guess, he would come by the eleven o'clock train, and in that case there was only half an hour before he made his début.

I may tell you without conceit that exactly thirty-one minutes after eleven o'clock my burglar trap alarm sounded. Five seconds later I had pressed the knob which let the shutter fall. I had timed my caller to within a minute. My wife was aroused and wanted to know what was going on. While dressing myself I explained matters, but not to her satisfaction. When I left the room, she was enveloped in the bed-clothes and on the verge of hysterics.

I turned the electric light on in the trap and carefully opened the peep-hole.

There stood my young man in the middle of the room, and he was winking and blinking with surprise. In his hand he held a pistol, but it was of no more use than a stick. While I gazed at him he went to the window and examined the shutter and then stepped over and inspected the door. He was as secure as if in a prison cell.

"Well," said I at length, "you did not disappoint me."

He started; then, catching sight of my face, he said, "You expected me, then?"

"I did. What do you think of the arrangement of things?"

"Seems to be a regular trap."

"Just so. Had it put up on purpose to catch a burglar. Let me ask you if you have read that newspaper article the other day?"

"That's just what brought me here. I thought it was a place which only wanted walking into. It was all a put-up job, eh?"

"Advertising always pays," I answered evasively. "I presume you have a pal outside? I am not thoroughly up in the burglary business, but as I understand it they generally go in pairs, and one is left outside on the watch."

"You needn't worry yourself about the man outside!" growled the captive. "Come, now, let me out of this!"

"Why, my dear sir, the man who would capture a burglar and turn him loose within ten minutes would be an idiot. Put down your revolver, and I'll come in and clap the handcuffs on you."

"You show your head in this room, and I'll fill you with lead. Open that door or we'll wipe out the whole family!"

"Will you quietly submit?"

"Never. If you've got me, I've also got you! If I can't get out, you can't get in!"

Digitized by Google

"But you forget about the gas. I can fill the room, and asphyxiate you in ten minutes. That's part of the trap, you know."

For answer he raised his pistol, and fired three shots at the peep-hole, but, as it was a wrought-iron plate, pierced with small holes, his bullets were wasted. I turned on the gas, and within a minute he began to cough and move about. As the flow continued, he went over to the window to find a breathing hole, but there was none.

"Will you knock under?" I asked at the peep-hole.

"No!" he shouted, as he lay down on the floor, with his mouth to the crevice under the door.

I descended to the pantry for a bottle of cayenne pepper, and when I had sprinkled a lot of the stuff just outside the door, the burglar had to retire. He was a plucky fellow, and it took twelve minutes to bowl him over. I heard him strangling, and gasping, and moaning, and, after opening the hall window, I threw open the door to the trap.

The increase in my bill that month proved that I gave him 850 feet of gas. He was lying like one dead when I pulled him out in the hall, clapped on the handcuffs, and called to my wife and the cook to help resuscitate him.

We got water and camphor and brandy, and we bathed his head and chafed his hands, and poured stuff down his throat, but it was forty minutes before he came to. While the cook tartly informed me that she was not paid to assist in reviving asphyxiated burglars, my wife was still more ungracious.

She said the idea of trying to restore a dead burglar to life, and thereby give him opportunity to burglar again, just showed what an idiot I was. I had been downstairs after more brandy, and the burglar's eyelids were fluttering, when my wife, who had been bathing his chest, looked up and said:

"Well, you ought to have a medal for your smartness! Your burglar is a woman!"

Stupid that I was not to connect the small hands and feet and other points with a woman, but I hadn't done it. She came to and sat up and stared and blinked at us, and it was a long ten minutes before she realised the situation.

"Isn't this rather out of the line of your sex?" I finally queried, and received no answer.

Well, a woman is a woman, no matter what her offence, and when daylight came I turned the "burglaress" loose. More than that, we gave her a breakfast and her tram fare. I even followed her out to the gate and returned her pistol. Stupid thing for me to do, no doubt, but, you see, I had a burglar trap all baited and ready and could probably catch another without cost or trouble. Everybody lets the first rat go in honour of the new trap, you know.

A BACKWOODS TERROR.

If you are a stranger, and travelling the roads over the mountains and through the woods of northern Pennsylvania, you will find yourself wandering frequently from the way you want to go, and it will be safe for you to ask for information and direction at every backwoods cabin or farmhouse you may come to.

One day I stopped at a rather rickety-looking cabin or house in a small clearing along the headwaters of the Sinnamahoping to get a better understanding of my bearings. A raw-boned, sinewy six-footer, in overalls and shirt, with long, bristly, reddish hair straggling from under an old felt hat, sat on a chopping block at the road-side.

"How do I go to Kelly's camp?" I asked the formidable looking mountaineer.

"You kin go by Wolf Holler, or you can go through Painter Woods, or you kin go by the way o' Fogerty's Mill, whichever way you want to," replied the man in a voice that rasped and rattled.

"Which is the nearest?" I asked.

"Han't much difference," replied the man. "Ever been in Wolf Holler?"

Having left England only six weeks before I admitted unblushingly that I never had.

"Are you much on b'ar?"

No I wasn't; not particularly.

"Mebbe you hadn't better go by way o' Wolf Holler, then," said the six-footer, with an ominous shake of his head. "I s'pose Wolf Holler is the terriblest place for b'ar there is in the hull Sinnymahopin' spread.

"They call it Wolf Holler because it was a ch'ce place for wolfs wunst, but they'm all gone, 'n' I ben tryin' to hev 'em change the name to B'ar Hole.

"I don't reckon they will, but they orter. It hain't pooty nigh safe for a feller th't hain't much on b'ar to go through the Holler, for he's more'n likely to get stopped by a b'ar or two and mebbe hurt.

"I go that way to Kelly's pooty often, just for a change. Whenever I feel limp 'n' don't feel just in the humour to tackle the Painter Woods or Fogerty's Mill, I just take a jaunt through the Holler. It sorter rests a chap, arter he's been to the woods or to Fogerty's to give the Holler a whack. I got away with three—lemme see, a week ago to-day. Yes, it was just a week ago to-day."

"Three what?" I asked.

"B'ar," replied the man nonchalantly.

"Are they as thick as that?" I asked.

"Thick! Thunder an' Mars! they'm jist swarmin'! The fellers over to the camp sends for me on an av'rage o' wunst a month to jog down to the Holler 'n' weed out a parcel o' bruins, 'cause they got too many to be comf'table. Puts me in mind. I jist got word, a little while ago—not more than half-an-hour 'fore you kim along—that the Holler's jammed with b'ar again, 'n' asting me to go down 'n' kinder harvest some of 'em, just to give the teamsters a little confidence ag'in. 'Spose I'll hef to do it t'morrow or next day. I think the Holler's about two mile the nighest way to the camp from here, cap'n."

"Couldn't you make it handy to do your errand at the Hollow to-day, and see me through all right?" I asked.

"Couldn't do it nohow, cap'n," said the man. "My ol' woman's been coaxin' o' me all mornin' to go back on the hill yonder an' knock over a b'ar that's been hangin' roun' for a couple o' days, 'n' a wild cat that stole a couple o' her geese last night th't she 'spectin' to sell to git a new bunnit with. But I says no. To-day's my tired day, 'n' I kill no b'ar nor wild cats for nobody. I don't keer if they carry off all the pigs 'n' geese there is on the clarin', new bunnits or no new bunnits! The old woman's in yonder bellerin' like a calf now, cause her geese is gone. I'd like to accommodate you, cap'n, but I'm tired to-day, 'n' don't calkalate to do nothin' for nobody."

I thought to myself that here must be a cheerful and amiable consort for a woman of even some degree of sensibility, as his wife evidently was. Then I said:

"How about the Panther Woods route?"

"You said you wasn't much on b'ar," replied the man; "mebbe you're conside'ble on wild cats?"

"No more on wild cats than I am on bears."

"Wull," said the bushwhacker, but with a doubting shake of the head, "you mowt git through ol' Painter without any of 'em tacklin' of you, but if you do there'll hef to be a record made of it, for I never knowed anybody to go through yit without havin' to argy with from one to seven wild cats. A good many smarty folks has tried it, 'n' never got the best of the argyment, nuther. There was Jeb Croker, who was one of those chapsth at was allus braggin' that he could lick his weight in wild cats. Wull, Jeb he made a bet he'd go through Painter Woods 'n' come out on t'other side without a scratch nor a tear in his clothes.

Digitized by Google

"Jeb hain't never come out yet 'n' that was ten years ago. It mowt be that he is dodgin' 'n' scroochin 'n' twist'n' around in the woods yit, to keep out o' the way o' the wild cats, so ez to win his bet, but I hev my doubts about it.

"I never went through ol' Painter yit without hevin' to lay out less'n four wild cats, and I s'pose I've had most a baan full o' shirts 'n' overhauls torn to wuthlessness in argyin' with the pesky critters. Most folk goin' to the camp from here'd ruther any time take the Wolf Holler road or the way by Fogerty's Mill than to spend their time goin' through ol' Painter. I hear my ol' woman bellerin' yit over them squawkin' geese. If she don't shut up pooty soon I'll go in and settle her!"

"Well, what kind of a gauntlet does a fellow have to run if he goes by the way of Fogerty's Mill?" I asked this specimen of backwoods conjugal amiability.

"Be you much on the fight?" he asked me.

"Man fight?"

"You call it man fight, but it's more like tiger fight!"

I said I was not anything at all on that kind of fight.

"Then I'll be sorry for you if you go by Fogerty's," said the man. "Didn't you never hear o' Ike Buncher, Sam Slewton, Twister Groot, 'n' Logchain Bill Gibbs?"

"Never."

"Thunder 'n' Mars!" exclaimed the strapping bushwhacker. "Say, cap'n, if I hadn't made up my mind not to raise a finger to do nothin' for nobody to-day, I'd just like to hev you by way of Fogerty's 'n' me go 'long. It'd be fun a hossback fer me.

"B'ar hain't pleasant to tackle if you hain't much on 'em, 'n' wild cats is sassy to argy with, but nuther on 'em hain't above ground yit when you talk o' Logchain Bill Gibbs, Twister Groot, 'n' them fellers.

"If you go the way o' Fogerty's the chances is that the Twister or Logchain Bill or some o' the rest o' them 'll be waitin' for you afore you git there.

"It don't make no difference which one on 'em it is, the first thing you know you'll be turnin' somersets out o' your waggon, 'n' mebbe you'll be hangin' on a tree or doubled up in a fence corner, feelin' as if a cycloon had just passed that way 'n' met you.

"'Fore you could git up and look around you twice, they'd hev your horse an' waggon down to the tavern an' the hull thing divided up an' sold. If none of the boys met you 'fore you got to Fogerty's they'd stop you when you did git there, 'n' you'd hef to git out 'n fight.

"If you was alive arter the fight, they'd let you go on your way afoot if you was able, 'n' if you wasn't able they'd lick you agin because you wasn't.

"Twister Groot gits his name 'cause he twisted a four-inch ches'nut saplin' in two wunst as it stood in the woods, 'n' ever since Bill Gibbs pulled the log chain links out straight ez an axe helve, they've called him Logchain Bill.

"Nothin' ever goes by the way o' Fogerty's that don't git licked from the word 'go,' but there haint none on 'em that fools with me much any more. If you go by the way o' Fogerty's 'n' hev time to notice before they slam belix out' you, you'll see that Logchain Bill hain't got but one eye, 'n' that Twister Groot's nose is split like a tree split by lightning, 'n' that Sam Slewton's lower jaw is three inches out o' plum, 'n' that Ike Buncher hain't got but one ear.

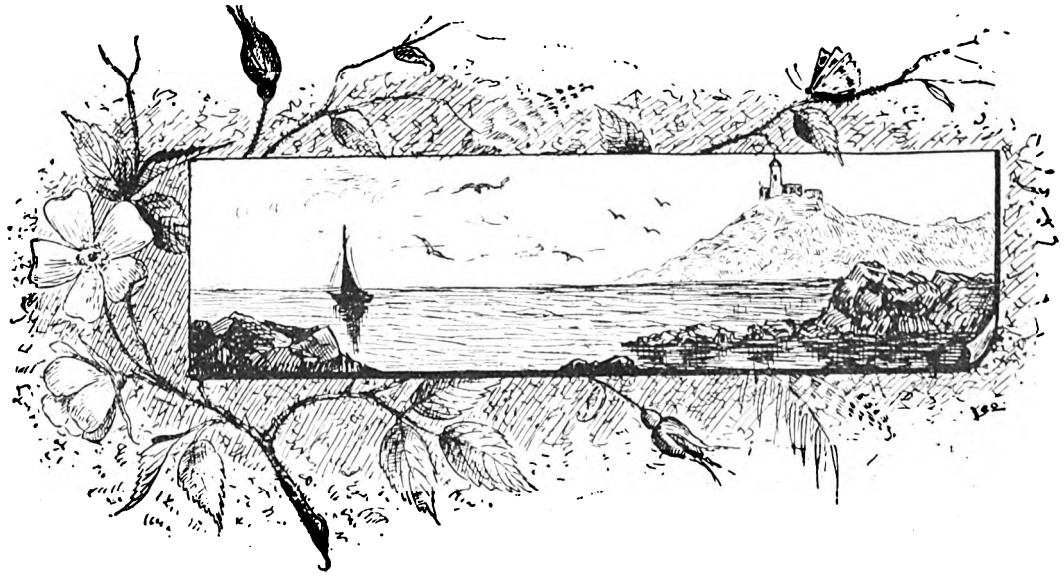
"Them's all little beauty marks that I've give 'em. Cap'n, I've fit the whole passel of 'em half-way from Fogerty's here 'n' back ag'in, 'n' whenever I feel like having some fun with spice in it, I saunter over to Fogerty's 'n' make Logchain Bill or some of 'em stand up 'n' take their medicine.

"Why, wunst—but there's that pesky ol' woman o' mine bellerin' harder'n ever over them geese o' her'n," said the backwoods terror, getting to his feet with surprising alacrity, "an' I'm going in an' settle her right now!"

Just then a little woman, with a hatchet face, looking out from beneath a calico sun-bonnet, appeared at the door. There was no trace of "bellerin'" on her face, but it was full of go. The six-foot bushwhacker looked a trifle sheepish.

"Here, Jack Shapely, you wuthless varmint!" the woman cried. "You mog in here an' peel them taters! An' then you mind the young 'un, for I'm goin' over to the camp with that last trappin' o' coon skins o' yourn!"

The backwoods terror marched into the house as meekly as a lamb, and I drove on, to find Kelly's camp only half a mile distant straight ahead over a very good track.



Digitized by Google

A MODEL STORY.

It was a critic in the Saturday Times who first drew attention to it. He said:—

"We have nothing but the warmest praise to offer Mr. Edward Stevenson, R.A., on his picture in this year's Academy. It is work such as this which affords the most emphatic denial to the ridiculous sneer of many modern critics that Art has gone to the dogs since the Middle Ages. There is, however, one hint—it is nothing more than a hint—which it seems to us the rising young artist might profit by. Through all his pictures a certain type of feminine beauty predominates unblushingly. Every man of course has a right to his ideal, but Mr. Stevenson, it appears to us, uses his ideal in a way which must jar upon many who would otherwise share our admiration for his works. Saint or sinner, ballet girl or duchess, one and all bear an unmistakable family likeness. The effect to the close observer is disastrous, and although we can hardly call it a blemish, yet it is to be deplored quite as much as mannerisms with an actor. The remedy is simple. We would advise Mr. Stevenson to avail himself of the services of a greater number of models; there must be many good-looking girls who would be only too glad of the opportunity of posing before such an eminent Academician."

Pretty Miss Mildred Cornish read the paragraph through three times. Then she deliberately cut it out with a pair of scissors and put it in her purse.

"A certain type of feminine beauty predominates through all his work, does it?" she said to herself. "I must confess that I had not noticed it myself, but a critic ought to know, and I'm very much obliged for the hint.

"As to the girls who would be only too pleased to pose before him, I have not the least doubt about it. I have not the least doubt that he would be only too pleased to let them—if he were not afraid of me. I expect the critic didn't know that Edward Stevenson was engaged, when he made that remark. I have never heard of such a thing in my life!

"He solemnly declared to me, when I promised to be his wife, that he had never had a model across the threshold of his studio, and that he never would.

"If I thought! Hullo, that's Edward's step—Tuesday? Oh, yes, he's going to take me round to see Jules Murray's studio. I won't mention anything about this to him until afterwards, and then, well——"

When, a moment later, Mr. Stevenson was announced, there was a certain look on the face of pretty Miss Mildred Cornish which would doubtless have caused him some uneasiness had he not been too much taken up with his own thoughts to notice it.

. . . . . .

Jules Murray's studio was one of the prettiest in London. The mantel-piece and a few occasional tables were adorned with beautiful hot-house flowers, the walls were hung with pictures by all the celebrated painters of the day, a rich Persian carpet covered the floor, and heavy curtains of a similar shade hung from brass poles over the windows and door.

Then she deliberately cut it out.

An air of luxury and wealth pervaded the room, in which the faint odour of two capital cigars mingled with the perfume of the flowers and the smell of several canvases on which the paint was still wet.

"There, that's everything, I think," said Jules with a self-satisfied smile. "There's just one little thing I'm doing here, but it's only a study."

He led the way across the room to an easel which stood near the window, and pointed with evident pride to the figure of a graceful girl standing by the side of what would some day be a silent pool.

"It looks rather funny without any head," he said apologetically, "but I have not come across the face yet which quite comes up to my ideal."

"I hope you are going to give the young lady some more clothes," said Miss Cornish, regarding the picture with stern disapproval.

"I hope you are going to give the young lady some more clothes."

Jules Murray glanced at her and laughed good-naturedly.

"They did not wear any superfluous clothing in those days," he said. "Of course, if you——"

"Do you know," interrupted Stevenson, who had been gazing intently at the picture, and had not heard a word of their conversation, "I should never have believed that Madge could have posed so gracefully as that, I——"

Miss Cornish felt her heart give a great thump against her side. Madge! So that was the girl's name!

"I can't imagine how you knew who it was," she said with superb innocence.

"Why, it's exactly like her," Stevenson blurted out. "I could have picked her out among a thousand." Then he stopped suddenly and turned red to the roots of his hair. Until that moment he had not even noticed that there was no head on those fair shoulders, every curve of which he knew so well.

"How do you know it's like her?" persisted Miss Cornish. She smiled, but even the smile could not disguise the intense bitterness of her tone.

"How do I know?" repeated Stevenson slowly. He was trying to gain time. Jules Murray turned away and stuffed a handkerchief into his mouth. "Why—er—because you know I have seen such a number of pictures for which Madge sat as a model. What the dickens are you laughing at, Jules, you ass?"

"Oh, nothing," screamed Jules, who was laughing till the tears ran down his cheeks. Then he noticed the look in Miss Cornish's eyes, and he sobered at once. He saw at a glance how the land lay.

"I beg your pardon," he said, coming to the rescue with considerable presence of mind, "I was only amused at old Stevenson setting up as a connoisseur. If there is one thing more than another about which he knows absolutely nothing, it is lady models. You never sat before a model in your life, did you, Stevenson?"

"You know that as well as I do," said Stevenson shortly. He could see that his friend was on the point of bursting out laughing again, and he could have throttled him with the utmost pleasure.

Miss Cornish looked from one to the other in evident perplexity.

Digitized by Google

A moment before she had not the smallest doubt that her lover had deceived her, but Jules' words did more than anything else could have done towards allaying her suspicions.

She held out her hand to her host in her pretty way and thanked him for showing them his pictures.

Then she turned towards the door and Stevenson followed her sheepishly.

Miss Cornish did not refer again to Jules Murray's study of a girl. Only in her heart she vowed she would find out Madge and see whether her face was like the face whose beauty could not be hidden from the sharp eyes of the critic on the staff of the Saturday Times.

. . . . . .

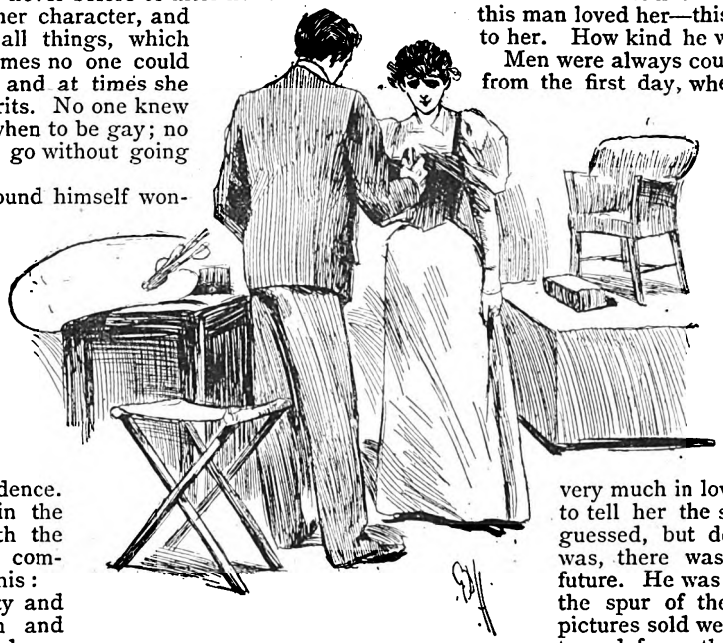
Madge was certainly an excellent model. Stevenson often confessed to himself that he could not get on without her. Whenever there was no work to do, when weeks and weeks passed by without seeing her, he found the days grew unbearably long.

She was delightfully pretty. Stevenson had always had a special weakness for a pretty girl. She would pose with a patience which even Job might have envied. Her figure was perfect; her colouring was perfect, and, above all, she was always punctual to a minute—never before or after her time.

There were two sides to her character, and it was perhaps this, above all things, which men admired in her. At times no one could be more queenly or lady-like, and at times she was in the wildest of wild spirits. No one knew better when to be quiet and when to be gay; no one knew better how far to go without going too far.

Now and then Stevenson found himself wondering whether he did not care for her more than for the cold-blooded beauty he had asked to be his wife. They were totally different, of course. There was no question which had the best style of the two. There was no question which his mother would have chosen for him, or any of his relations for the matter of that, if he had taken them into his confidence. But after all, no one else in the world had much to do with the matter. When it came to comparisons the difference was this:

Mildred Cornish was pretty and haughty, rather standoffish and rich. Madge—he did not know her other name, if she had one—was pretty and jolly, hail-fellow-well-met, and decidedly poor.



He gave it to Madge the next afternoon.

Madge did not know that he was engaged, and he did not intend that she should until he had quite made up his mind. He would wait for a time and see. And so he began by paying her compliments and ended by falling in love.

Then one day he thought he would like to give her a present, just as a mark of his gratitude. Like most other artists he had very bad taste when it came to matters of everyday life. For the life of him he could not make up his mind what to get.

Mildred he knew had the best taste in the world, but he hardly liked to consult her of all people. It really was a difficult point for a man to decide.

Then he went to a jeweller's.

"This was the bracelet the young lady admired so much last time she was here," the man said. Stevenson remembered directly he saw it. It was a diamond serpent which Mildred had asked him to buy as well as she could without putting it in so many words. He had ignored the hint, for even in those days the novelty of his engagement had begun to wear off, and £200 was a considerable sum to spend on a girl.

However it was just the thing for Madge, and he bought it. It was a mean thing to do, but, after all, Mildred would never know.

He gave it to Madge the next afternoon after her sitting. The poor girl was half wild with delight. It was the only piece of jewelry she had ever had in her life except the brooch of priceless value to her which she always wore. It was the only relic she had of her mother—the mother she had never known.

Tears of gratitude sprang to her eyes and sobs choked the words of utterance which surged to her lips.

"I am awfully glad you like it," said Stevenson stupidly. He took half a step forward, as if he must kiss away those tears, and then turned to his easel again with a sigh. He would be loyal to Mildred, whatever happened, until his mind was made up once and for all. Besides, there were several creditors, whose names entered his mind just at that moment.

Madge thanked him again and again. She hardly knew what to say, but her smiles, veiled though they were in tears, were more eloquent than any words. Then she turned towards the little dressing-room and began taking off her long flowing draperies, and putting on her articles of every-day apparel.

She felt the hot tears still trickling down her cheeks. So this man loved her—this man who was all the world to her. How kind he was!

Men were always courteous to her; but Stevenson from the first day, when she had timidly knocked at the studio door, had treated her to all the respect of a sister. No one before had ever ventured to give her a present. She would not have accepted it from anyone else, but from the man whom she loved—yes, who loved her, if she could read aright the sweet language of the eye—how could she refuse a present from him?

As for Stevenson, he stood before his canvas his eyes fixed on the door through which Madge had disappeared. He was certainly very much in love with this girl. He longed to tell her the secret which she had already guessed, but desperately in love though he was, there was still some thought for the future. He was not a man to do anything on the spur of the moment. Perhaps, if his pictures sold well at the Academy—his eyes turned from the door to the brooch which he held in his hand. She had taken it off to show him, and he had forgotten to give it back.

He looked at it for a moment, and then he laid it down reverently on the top of the little red leather case which contained his present.

At that moment he heard a step on the stairs, and the rustle of a lady's skirt.

"Surely, Thomas can't be such an idiot as to show anyone up here like this," he thought to himself, but before he had time to utter a note of warning to Madge, Mildred Cornish stood at his side.

He threw down his brushes and palette, and laughingly held out his hands, which were covered with paint.

"This is an unexpected pleasure," he said. He confessed afterwards that if he had only had a revolver in hand at that moment he would have committed suicide or murder on the spot.

"I hope I am not disturbing you"—this with a suspicious look round the room. "Thomas wanted to show me up in solemn state, but I ran past him, and here I am."

"Yes, here you are," repeated Stevenson gloomily. He felt he must say something, but his tongue was tied, and Madge was listening on the other side of the partition, and the partition was thin. "I'm afraid I haven't got anything new to show you," he said. "You must come again another day when some of my pictures have come back from Paris."

Digitized by Google

"Yes," said Miss Cornish, with another suspicious look round, "I particularly want to compare some of your pictures together."

At that moment Stevenson distinctly heard the rustle of a skirt in the next room. His face turned an ashen grey, and he dared not look at Mildred. Somehow or other he must find some excuse for getting her out of the room. But how?

Miss Cornish was standing in front of his picture. "Is this Madge too?" she asked, turning to him, and pointing with the end of her parasol at the figure of a beautiful girl leaning against the pillar of an ancient temple.

The blood leapt to Stevenson's face and he bent over a box of colours.

"No," he said, hardly above a whisper; "it's much too pretty for her."

Someone dropped a boot in the other room, and he started as if he had been shot. He fancied he heard something like a sob. He looked at Mildred, but apparently she had not heard. In another minute Madge would be dressed and then——

"I thought this girl Madge was very pretty. Is she?"

"It's a matter of taste entirely."

"Do you think she is pretty?"

"Yes—in her way you know."

"You know her then?"

Stevenson caught his under lip savagely in his teeth.

"I have seen her if that's what you mean."

"Have you ever painted her?"

"Mildred!"

"What?"

"You know what I have promised you—you know——"

"Know what?"

"You know that for your sake I have imperilled my prospects by denying myself the advantages of drawing from life."

His voice was so low that it was almost inaudible.

Mildred took her purse from her pocket and drew out a crumpled paragraph.

"Do you see what the critic in the Saturday Times says?"

Stevenson took the little scrap of paper, glanced through it quickly, and then handed it back to her with a little shrug.

"Yes, I have seen that," he said. "What about it?"

"Oh, nothing. But it's rather strange that there should always be a certain type of feminine beauty predominating through all your pictures."

"Strange," he repeated, as if he only half understood her meaning. Then he seized her hands in his and looked down into her beautiful eyes with a depth of passion which might have been prompted either by love or by hate.

"Strange," he said again. "Mildred, what do you mean? Strange! Strange! that you should be my one ideal. Strange! that you should be the only woman whose beauty lingers in my mind. Strange! that I should be able to paint no other face but yours. Oh, Mildred, how little do you understand——"

She shrunk back half frightened at his vehemence.

"Is it my beauty which predominates in all these pictures," she asked, her eyes wide open in astonishment and the hot tears springing to her eyes. "Oh, Edward, how can you forgive me——"

He took her in his arms and soothed her. If she had hysterics all would be up. He must get her out of the room.

He covered her face with kisses, and then gently removed her arms which were entwined round his neck.

A sudden sound on the other side of the partition made them both start.

"Who is that?" Mildred cried, frightened at the thought of someone coming in and discovering her in tears.

Stevenson hesitated for a minute.

His collar was choking him and he put his hand up and crumpled it.

"It's—it's the man who is going to be my model for Adam in the Garden of Eden," he said with a sudden inspiration. "Perhaps, dear, you had better go. He might be embarrassed if he found I had visitors. Unfortunately I—I forgot to supply him even with the proverbial fig leaf."

The girl held out her hand with sudden haste, and was evidently about to beat a precipitate retreat.

Stevenson drew a long breath of relief.

If only she would go, all might be well. As Madge had not appeared, it was just within the bounds of possibility that she had heard nothing.

At that moment, by some unlucky chance, his eyes fell on the tell-tale brooch and the little morocco case. Instinctively he snatched them up and tried to hide them in his hand.

The two went out of the room together.

The girl saw the movement and mistook his purpose.

"Oh, Edward, is that for me? This is heaping coals of fire on my head."

She held out her hands. He hesitated for one fatal moment, and then gave them to her.

"I thought you would like it," he said.

She opened the case and her eyes feasted on the glistening diamonds she had longed for. She hardly looked at the brooch. It was a plain little golden arrow with a centre of pearls.

"I don't know whether you would care for the brooch," Stevenson said. He was half-frightened at his own voice. "It is an old family heirloom."

She hardly raised her eyes from the bracelet.

"What a funny little thing," she said. "Of course I shall like it."

"Chuck it away if you don't. Perhaps it is hardly worthy of you." Stevenson realised that he could easily replace the bracelet—this little brooch never.

There was a sob behind him. He turned round and found himself face to face with Madge.

"Hullo, Madge, you here?" he said with a rattle in his throat. "May I introduce you to my future wife, Miss Cornish?"

Miss Cornish held out her hand. Her face was white as death. She seemed for the moment unable to decide how to act. At length she bent towards Madge, and whispered in soft but firm words, which were uttered only by a supreme effort on her part.

"Come, Madge."

The girl stared at her for a moment with a wild look in her eyes.

Then she threw her arms impulsively round the other's neck and the two went out of the room together and left the artist standing there.

. . . . .

When a notice of Miss Mildred Cornish's marriage appeared in the papers some twelve months later, the bridegroom's name was not Stevenson, and as for Madge she is not married yet, and I think never will be.

Digitized by Google

THE FOUR PINS.

THE Count Bielski, a nobleman of Poland, was a very ambitious man. His public utterances had displeased the government. He was arrested, condemned to imprisonment for life, and confined in a dungeon many feet underground.

He had no light, and never could tell when it was day or night. He had no one to speak to, for no one was allowed to see him except the keeper of the prison, and he was not permitted to speak to the prisoner. He had no work of any sort to perform.

Days, weeks, months passed on, and he was still in his dungeon. He was never brought to trial, and the unfortunate man was most miserable. He thought he would lose his senses, for his reason began to give way.

Feeling all over his blouse one day he found four pins, and he actually wept for joy.

Yet what could they be to him?

He took them from his blouse and threw them on the floor of his dungeon, and then he went down on his hands and knees and felt all over the floor until he found them.

This he continued to do day after day, week after week, month after month, until the months rolled into years. But they were no longer weary years.

He would defeat the purpose of his jailors, who fondly hoped to make him insane.

He would live now until he became an aged man, cheered by the companionship of his four pins. And then, when he had become too old to move about his narrow dungeon, he would be content to lie down with his four silent friends and die.

In his dreams these pins would often assume familiar shapes. Their heads would take the likeness of his friends and his relations.

They would talk and laugh with him. How happy these dream moments were to the condemned!

There was his dear old mother's face. How she beamed upon him!

And there was his beloved wife and his two rosy-cheeked children—they kissed their chubby hands to their father!

His heart seemed bursting with a new strange joy. He was lost for a time to the sorrow of his condition. He was living a new life in the new world these four common pins had opened before him.

One night he had a fearful dream. He dreamed he had lost his pins. Oh, horror of horrors!

The perspiration broke out in great drops upon his face, arms, and breast.

Thus he found himself, when, with a hoarse cry, he awoke.

He realised quickly that it was only a dream. His beloved companions were found in their accustomed place. What a sense of relief now filled his heart as he again betook himself to slumber!

Ten years had passed, and the prisoner and his pins were inseparable. His keeper, who never yet had spoken to him, was now regarded with a new interest. He feared that this man—hated as one of his oppressors—had discovered his occupation, and that he would endeavour to deprive him of this solace.

Carefully now he guarded his precious pins so that no one should see them, those pins more precious to him in his sorrow than all the wealth of the world could be.

One day he lost all his pins. He had scattered them, he thought, as before, but now they eluded his grasp. He carefully felt over every inch of the floor of his dungeon. Again and again he repeated his search until he grew weary of the task, but not one pin could he find.

As he lay angry and despairing on the stone floor, he was aroused by the noise of the keeper removing the chains and bolts from the door.

Presently he entered, bearing with him the prisoner's scant supply of bread and water. By the dim light of the torch which he carried the prisoner fancied he could discern a mocking smile upon his face.

He had stolen his pins.

He was now rejoicing at his discomfiture. He must have discovered them while the prisoner slept.

Hate now filled the soul of the condemned.

His occupation had been stolen from him, but a new thought at once engaged his mind, diffusing through him a kind of mad joy.

He would devise a means of torture to kill his keeper. He knew that this man—the satellite of an offensive government—despised him.

He would be revenged.

For a long time he gloated over his contemplated plan. How long he knew not.

Then suddenly a light shone before him through the bars of his cell.

It came from the torch borne by the keeper, who had returned. Placing his torch in a crevice in the wall, he walked to the opposite corner of the dungeon from that in which the prisoner crouched, and turning his back toward him began to fasten a chain to the wall.

Ha! he was then to be chained to the wall; his blood boiled at this new indignity.

He wished to attack the keeper at once, but he had no weapon.

His eyes fell upon his hands. They were long and sinewy. He had once been a strong man, but long confinement and lack of nourishment had weakened him.

The keeper was undoubtedly a strong man. All this while he remained with his back to the prisoner.

It was plain he regarded him with contempt and did not fear an attack. He even hummed a fragment of an insulting song as he stood in his strength and consciousness of freedom near the door.

Cautiously, slowly—like a cat approaching a mouse—the condemned moves upon his victim.

Rage lends him strength.

With one bound he is on the keeper's shoulders. His long, bony hands meet like a vice upon his throat.

Then a terrible struggle begins—these two, keeper and prisoner, in that prison cell.

The keeper tries to shake him off. He is a strong man, but he feels he has met his match.

Then the keeper beats him fiercely upon the head and face with a bolt of iron. The blood flows down his face, but he does not relax his hold.

They roll upon the ground—the condemned uppermost. The keeper has managed to secure his dagger. He stabs the prisoner once in the breast.

Then the dagger falls from his hand; his eyes and tongue protrude, his face is a mixture of purple and red—blood trickles from his nostrils. He is dead.

With a maniacal cry of delight, the prisoner staggers to his feet, blood streaming down his breast and head, over his rough prison clothes.

He attempts to reach the door, but his strength fails him completely. He is mortally hurt.

With a scream he falls lifeless across the threshold, striking his head with awful force upon the hard stone floor of the cell.

But what of the pins?

The prisoner had been in the habit, before lying down to sleep, of fastening the four pins in the left cuff of his blouse, as he so often did before.

The fear of detection so operated on his mind that one night, in a fit of somnambulism, he had put the pins side by side in the edge of the garment, and there they were afterwards found and commented upon by the authorities of the prison.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PALACE STEAMERS. PARIS AND BACK FOR A GUINEA. BOULOGNE AND BACK for 10s. 6d.

LA MARGUERITE. FINEST and FASTEST STEAMER in the WORLD. SPEED, 25 MILES AN HOUR.

"Certainly a glass of water at the stem or sternpost would have done the round to Boulogne and Back, and not much be spilt of it."—FAIRPLAY, June 29th, 1894.

BOULOGNE and BACK DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted), by LA MARGUERITE.

PARIS and BACK, Saturday to Monday for 21s., other days 26s. return, By LA MARGUERITE.

MARGATE, DEAL, and BACK, DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted).

SIX HOURS ASHORE AT MARGATE for 5s. 6d. by LA MARGUERITE.

Passengers can Return by the ROYAL SOVEREIGN at their option.

Cook's Hotel Coupon Tickets may be obtained for all places.

TIMES OF SAILINGS (Weather and other circumstances permitting).

Leaving	Week days.	Sundays.
FENCHURCH STREET (by Special Train to Tilbury Pier) ..	8.38 ..	8.55
TILBURY (Gravesend)	9.30 ..	10. 0
	Noon.	p.m.
Margate .....About	12. 0 ..	12.30
Arriving.	p.m.
Boulogne ..... ,,	2.30 ..	3. 0
Returning.	p.m.	p.m.
Boulogne ..... ,,	3.30 ..	3.30
Margate ..... ,,	6 0 ..	6. 0
TILBURY (Special Train awaits Steamer) ..... ,,	8.45 ..	8.45

Arriving at Fenchurch Street Station (City) 9.35 p.m.

All passengers disembark at Tilbury and travel by train to Fenchurch Street. Connection with Southend will be duly announced.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN, DAILY, at 9.30 a.m. (except Fridays, on which day LA MARGUERITE will run as usual), from Old Swan Pier, London Bridge, calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch-street Station 10.58 a.m. in connection. Tender steamer Greenwich 9.2› Blackwell 9.35 a.m. Passengers can return by LA MARGUERITE.

DEAL and Back, DAILY, by LA MARGUERITE (Tuesdays excepted). Train, Fenchurch-street, week-days, 8.30 a.m. Sundays, 8.55, as above. Passengers change at Margate for the GLEN ROSA to Deal. Offices, 33, King William Street, London Bridge, E.C.

VICTORIA STEAMERS. (Weather and other circumstances permitting.) CLACTON, HARWICH, and Back, IPSWICH, FELIXSTOWE, by KOH-I-NOOR DAILY (Fridays excepted), from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch-street 10.15 a.m. in connection. Tender Greenwich, 9.25 a.m.; Blackwall, 9.35 a.m.

YARMOUTH and LOWESTOFT, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.10 a.m., by KOH-I-NOOR to HARWICH, thence by Palace Steamer VICTORIA.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND from Old Swan Pier, at 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m. DAILY (except Friday), calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich.

HAMPTON COURT, by CARDINAL WOLSEY, DAILY, at 10.0 a.m., from Old Swan Pier.

KEW GARDENS, BATTERSEA, and GREENWICH PARKS, frequently.
TOWER BRIDGE can be seen best by steamers from Old Swan Pier, every half hour.
Through bookings to all District Railway Stations.
Offices, Victoria House, Laurence Pountney Lane, E.C.

Price 7s. 6d. for any Size up to 40 inches.

POST FREE U.K.

"MINNOW" LIFE BELT

Trade Mark. FOR

LADIES, GENTLEMEN, and CHILDREN.

The Belt will support three men with their clothes on, can be inflated in a few seconds, and is so constructed that in the event of accidents the wearer is turned in a floating position, with the face well out of the water. It weighs a few ounces only, can be conveniently carried in the pocket, is made of the strongest material, nothing to get out of order, will bear a pressure of 2 to 300 lbs. and withstand any climate. Parents can with perfect confidence allow their children to bathe without fear of danger. Used by yachting and canoeing clubs, fishermen, and bathers all over the world. Worn as an ordinary belt. State size of waist. Cash to accompany all orders. Cheques and P.O.'s to be crossed "Bank of Liverpool."

The following, one of the many Testimonials received, speaks for itself:—

New Brighton Sailing Club, June 13, 1894.

Dear Sir,—It may interest you to know that we had practical illustration of the efficacy of your "Minnow" Life Belts last evening. We were struck by a heavy squall and upset whilst racing, but having, in accordance with our club rules, life belts on, in this case of your make, we suffered nothing but a little inconvenience, such as naturally arises from getting wet, and this even was partial, as your belts floated us so high, that, we were practically dry from a little above the waist up.

Yours truly, J. F. JELLICO, "Dever," N.B.S.C.

ADDRESS ORDERS TO

W. R. HARGREAVES, Waterloo, near Liverpool.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. S. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON S.W.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,

92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR REMOVED permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

NOSE Ugly shape altered and redness cured, permanently. Stamped envelope for full particulars, LEES RAY, Specialist, Waverlree, Liverpool. Treatment thorough. Uniquely testimonialised by Clients and by Press.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s. 6d.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.
LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.
LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S

M.B. FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth. For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

30 YEARS SUCCESS AMONG THE DEAF.

The Rev. E. J. SILVERTON, Specialist, of Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, will be happy to send his book on the Ear, "How to Cure without the Use of Instruments, or Operation." Price 6d.

Sufferers from Deafness, Noises, or Discharges in the Ears should obtain this work, or consult E. J. S. by letter or personally. Hours, Monday and Tuesday, 11 to 4 other days 11 to 12 only. Wonderful cases:—A person cured after 40 years' deafness, and one of the age of 90. A gentleman after 17 years' deafness cured. A remarkable case of a lady at Grimsby substantiated by a Clergyman, Addresses on application. All communications as above.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

Patronised by Royalty.

SILK UMBRELLAS

THE "PARKER" UMBRELLA REGISTERED.

Direct from the Manufacturer, 2/6 each.

Ladies' or Gents' Plain or Twill Silk. Parker's Hollow Ribbed Frames, Carved and Mounted Sticks.

Sent Parcel Post Free, 2/9 Postal Order (or 36 Stamps).

Re-covering neatly done, Plain or Twill Silk, Ladies' or Gents', 2/6 each, returned next post. List and Testimonials Free.

J. B. PARKER, Umbrella Works, Broom Close, SHEFFIELD.

If you have ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND, 1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured. Valuable Book on the Skin free, from THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

MELVILLE'S

NEW UPRIGHT

GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE,

61, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM :—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland :—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 292.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 4, 1894. [Price One Penny.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

Beetham's

World-Famed

Corn & Bunion Plaster

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns and bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy.

(It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists, CHELTENHAM.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd., 61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S Strengthening SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from

THE INFANTINA COMPANY, London, S.W.

PREVENTS COLDS AND CHILLS

BOVRIL

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST STOCK FOR SOUP.

Digitized by Google

A HAIR PIN

WITHOUT POINTS
HAS GOOD POINTS !!!
SEE THE POINT ?

Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES. 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied DIRECT FROM THE MANUFACTURER TO THE WEARER by means of the Parcel Post, at LESS THAN HALF ORDINARY PRICES.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from THE JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE (Regd.), A FABRIC OF GREAT DURABILITY AND WORLD-WIDE FAME, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

30 YEARS SUCCESS AMONG THE DEAF.

The Rev. E. J. SILVERTON, Specialist, of Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, will be happy to send his book on the Ear, "How to Cure without the Use of Instruments, or Operation." Price 6d.

Sufferers from Deafness, Noises, or Discharges in the Ears should obtain this work, or consult E. J. S. by letter or personally. Hours, Monday and Tuesday, 11 to 4 other days 11 to 12 only. Wonderful cases:—A person cured after 40 years' deafness, and one of the age of 90. A gentleman after 17 years' deafness cured. A remarkable case of a lady at Grimsby substantiated by a Clergyman. Addresses on application. All communications as above.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

Patronised by Royalty.

SILK UMBRELLAS

Direct from the Manufacturer, 2/6 each.

Ladies' or Gents' Plain or Twill Silk. Parker's Hollow-Ribbed Frames, Carved and Mounted Sticks.

"PARKER" UMBRELLA

THE

REGISTERED

Sent Parcel Post Free, 2/9 Postal Order (or 36 Stamps).

Re-covering neatly done, Plain or Twill Silk, Ladies' or Gents', 2/6 each, returned next post. List and Testimonials Free.

J. B. PARKER, Umbrella Works, Broom Close, SHEFFIELD.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s.6d.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.

LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.

LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,

83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and

OBSTINATE CASES,

NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,

GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. S. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON S.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S M.B. FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth. For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' CO.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

MELVILLE'S NEW UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, Charing Cross Road, London.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 292.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING AUGUST 4, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A BRIGANDS' BALL.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—You remember, do you not, the Countess Eteinnette de Repey—the young one, of course, not the old one—my black-eyed demon? When I say "my," it is a form of speech, for she is not mine. You, he, I, we all know her. We have all sighed for her; but none of you has had the happiness that I have had, of being in the dead of night with her in her own carriage. It is true that her maid was there also; but, nevertheless, it was a great happiness. And yet I would willingly have deprived myself of it.

We were at her country house at Kerchvar. It was already very late in the evening when she suddenly remembered that there was a ball on the following night at the Casino of Arad, and that she positively promised to be there. She ordered her carriage, and as I was her only guest, she begged me to accompany her.

"My dear Baron, will you come with me?"

What could I answer?

"My dear Countess, the night is very dark, we shall be upset, we shall break some limb, and how can we dance after that? We have the three Kœras to pass, the bridge over one of them is not firm, and there is every chance of our being drowned. The forest near Szalouta is a nest of brigands. How can I defend you all alone? And then, what is the necessity of going this evening? We can start to-morrow morning after we have had our tea; your superb dapple-greys will put us down at Arad in the afternoon, and we shall have plenty of time to think about your toilet."

That is word for word what I said to her; but I spoke in vain. The more I tried to dissuade her the more firmly she held out. She did not want to drive post-haste; she wished to rest after the journey; she did not care to jump from her carriage, worn out and heated, into the ball-room. Then, too, she thought that there was nothing more beautiful than the stars, the frogs, and heaven knows what else. Her whim must be gratified, though the world should come to an end.

I could choose; I might either accompany her or remain in the château alone. I went with her, and as a compensation she granted me the favour of sitting opposite her in the carriage. The journey was a charming one. The Countess loaded me with favours. First of all she placed a muff box on my knees, to which she soon added her muff; then she burdened me with some other packages, and finally went off to sleep. It was in vain that I spoke; she did not answer. Nevertheless, she condescended to ask me a series of questions about her work-box, her satchel, her basket, and made inquiries as to whether I was not seated on her hat-box. Upon being reassured, she went off to sleep again. Her maid moaned about her headache. I, in my turn, made believe to sleep.

Suddenly a more violent jolt than any of the others woke us all up. The carriage seemed to have half upset. The Countess, who was still drowsy, asked what had happened. The footman got down from the box and came to the carriage-door.

"Excellency, we have lost our way."

"Well, what does it matter? Is that a reason for stopping? If there is a good road before us, we shall arrive in the end."

"Yes, but——"

"What do you mean by 'yes, but'? The road must surely lead somewhere."

"That is true; yet I fear it does not lead to a good place."

"You are crazy! Is there such a thing as a bad place in the world? Where are we?"

"In the Szalouta Forest."

"The forest is not interminable. You can get out of it in two hours, whether you go lengthways or breadthways."

"But the coachman fears——"

"The coachman, in his contract, did not reserve the right to fear."

"He fears an accident to your Excellency."

"That is not his affair."

"Or for the horses."

"That is no concern of his, either."

"The forest is infested with brigands, or poor boys, as they are called in Hungary."

"The coachman is a goose. Is he not a poor boy also?"

"He means the poor boys who steal horses."

I thought it proper to take part in the conversation.

"My dear Countess, there is no reason for jesting. You see, it was hardly worth while to start in order to sleep in the depths of the forest. You may have your horses stolen, or your life taken. If I, at least, only had my revolver!"

"To have that stolen, too?"

And thereupon the little demon opened the carriage door, and, before I could prevent her, alighted.

"What a magnificent night. How delicious the forest smells. How the fire-flies sparkle! Just look, Baron!"

"Look! Why you can't see three steps before you!"

"Yes, yes, you can. Don't you see a light down there among the trees?"

I turned cold! We had fallen into a den of thieves! From the top of his box the coachman answered, in a voice stifled with fear:

"My dear Baron, will you come with me?"

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

Clinging in despair to my arm.

"Excellency, it is the czarda which keeps its guests." (Proverbial expression for saying: a tavern from which no one ever escapes.)

"If it keeps its guests, it is just what we need. Let us go there."

I was in despair.

"Countess," said I, "in the name of heaven, what do you mean to do? This is a rendezvous for robbers, where we shall all have our throats cut; a den, the landlord of which lives in constant communication with all the bandits of the country, and where they assassinate persons every night!"

The wicked creature only laughed at me. She told me that we read of such things, but they did not really exist. She added that she would go to another inn if we could find one for her, but as there was only that one she had no choice. And she ordered the coachman to follow with the carriage, declaring that she would walk on ahead and serve as our guide.

All objections and supplications were useless. We were obliged to follow her toward the inn with all our luggage, for she threatened, if we were frightened, to go alone. Truly, she was afraid of nothing.

As we came near the house our ears were suddenly struck by strains of merry music, which reached us through half open windows.

Heavens! the inn was indeed full of brigands.

"Well," said the countess, gaily, "we were going to a ball, and here we find one. We cannot escape from fate."

While she was speaking she darted toward the door. For a moment I was impelled to turn on my heel, to leave her there in the lurch and to make good my own escape. But that would not have been proper. Besides, I could never have rid myself of her maid, who was clinging in despair to my arm. The poor woman was half dead with fright, and followed her mistress with trembling steps. Through the open window we heard the noise of the dance and the frantic shouts of the men as they rushed about the room. But the Countess was not alarmed; she opened the door boldly and walked in.

The room, long and wide, was whitewashed. In the first moment of emotion I thought there must be at least fifty men in it, dancing and rushing around. Later, on counting them, I saw that there were nine, including the inn-keeper and three tsiganes who composed the orchestra. But the five others were quite enough. They were all tall, strong fellows. Their pipes, which were stuck through the ribbon of their hats, almost touched the main beam in the ceiling. Their shoulders were formidable. Their five rifles were placed against the wall in a corner.

We were in a pretty wasps' nest!

When the wretches saw us, they were so surprised at our audacity that they ceased dancing. The Countess said to them, with her conquering smile:

"Excuse us, my good friends, if we disturb your amusement. We have lost our way, and as we cannot continue our journey to-night, we have come here to seek refuge."

One fellow, straight as the letter I, and finely formed, broke away from the group, twisted his moustaches, took off his hat with a swaggering gesture, brought his heels together, bowed to the Countess, and told her that her appearance did not disturb him; that, on the contrary, it made him very happy; that he was master of the premises for the moment, and that his name was Joszi Feketé (a famous Hungarian brigand). He then asked the Countess who she was.

Before I could pull her by the sleeve, to caution her to conceal her name, she had already answered:

"I am the Countess Repey. I live at Kerchvar, near here.

"Oh! I have the honour of knowing you. I was acquainted with the old Count, also. He fired his double-barrelled gun at me one day, and missed me."

A charming acquaintance!

The Countess sat down on a bench, and the bandit placed himself beside her. As for me, no one asked me to sit down.

"And where are you going this way, in the middle of the night?"

I made a sign to her not to tell.

"To the ball at the Arad Casino."

Farewell our jewels!

"Then it is very fortunate that you have lost your way. Your excellencies have no need to continue your journey. It so happens that we are just giving a ball, and I hope you will accept an invitation. Our tsiganes are good musicians: it is the troop of Szalouta. They play splendid czardas. Hey, gipsy, play us an air from the 'Beautiful Woman,' and do not let your eyes wander from your violin."

The rascal did not even ask permission. As soon as the musicians had struck up the czardas, he threw his dolman over his shoulder, took the countess by the wrist and drew her into the middle of the room. Another bandit threw himself on Cesarine, who was frightened to death and half-fainting. Ah! she had no need to seek dancers, for she passed from hand to hand so quickly that her foot hardly ever touched the ground.

The Countess showed what she knew. She danced with as much ardour and as much fire as if she were on the waxed floor of the Arad Casino. I had never seen her more fascinating and beautiful. Up to that time the Hungarian dance had never seemed to me, at the best, anything but strange. No one before this brigand had ever made me understand what it was.

He began by dancing round his partner with a lofty mien, affecting to be very proud of her, looking at her from head to foot, over his shoulder, mingling his cries with the music. When he was weary of this diversion, he guided her to the middle of the room, and it became the lady's turn to dance round her partner. She faced him, whirling around discreetly, with a modest reserve like that of a butterfly hovering about every flower without resting on any. I can say without exaggeration that her feet did not seem to touch the ground.

The fellow, with a coquettish gesture, bent toward the Countess as if he meant to kiss her, but he stopped, stamping his foot. The enchantress threw her head back proudly, flew off the tips of her toes, and pirouetted to the very end of the room; but the two dancers never took their eyes off each other. Finally, the brigand turned away impatiently, manifesting his anger by dancing furiously before the tsiganes; then, suddenly wheeling round, he seized his partner and made her fly round him like a whirlwind.

Catching for her with his pocket knife the most appetising morsels.

In the midst of the intoxication of this dance I was uneasy about one thing, and that was lest the wild fellow in his fervour should make some unseemly demonstration toward the Countess. As you may well believe, the temptation was strong.

Digitized by Google

She was entirely in his power, and for a man on whose head a price had long been set, one crime more or less was of small account. At the first impropriety I was resolved to seize one of the guns in the corner and blow out his brains. On my honour, I was firmly resolved to do it.

Happily there was no need of going so far. The dance ended peacefully with the three traditional turns, and the chief of the brigands led his partner to her seat after having kissed her hand very respectfully. He then stepped up to me, and slapping me very insolently on the shoulder, said:

"And you, my little old chap, don't you dance?"

Just think of his calling me his little old chap!

"Thanks, I do not know how to dance."

"All right," said he, and returned to the Countess.

"You must excuse us, Excellency. We were not prepared to receive such illustrious guests. Pray accept heartily of what we can offer you. It is little, but it is good."

He alluded to the supper.

The banquet was exceptional. I can well describe it as such. The brigands placed a large dish full of stewed veal upon the long table. There was no sign of a plate. They ate with their fingers, holding in one hand a piece of bread, and fishing out with the other a slice of meat from the tureen on the point of a knife.

The Countess ate as though she had been fasting for three days. The brigand chief devoted himself to catching for her with his pocket-knife the most appetising morsels, all of which were floating about in a gravy of red pepper, and placing them on her bread. She declared that the dish was savoury.

The bandit presumed to remark that I did not eat.

"Eat, little old chap; this dish will fatten you. It is stolen goods!"

Just as I had expected.

"I thank you," I replied, "I could not eat; it is too peppery for me."

"All right," said he, and once more left me alone.

There was no use of even thinking of a glass; the wine was served in wooden cans. According to the customs of the peasantry, Joszi Feketé drank first, and, after having wiped his mouth on the loose sleeve of his shirt, presented the can to the Countess. She drank. Oh, my friends, what an extraordinary woman!

The vagabond then turned toward me and offered me a drink.

"Drink, little old chap" (always the same epithet), "or really you will fall asleep."

"Thank you, I cannot drink. I am following a homœopathic treatment."

"Oh, oh!" cried he, laughing. "I, too, am following that treatment, and, as wine made me ill yesterday, I am curing myself with wine to-day."

I was perfectly convinced that once drunk they would fall on us. The five emptied a cask among them, and yet, when they rose from the table, not one of them staggered.

While the others were giving supper to the musicians, their chief came to me again.

"My little old chap, you do not eat, you do not drink, you do not dance. How do you amuse yourself? Are you fond of cards?" And at the same time he drew a pack from his pocket.

"Ah!" thought I, "Now he wants to know how much money I have with me."

"I don't understand any game of cards," I replied.

"I will teach you one in a moment. It is very easy. See! I place one card here, another there; you cover one, I the other, and the first of us who draws a court-card wins."

He went on explaining to me from point to point a kind of lansquenet, as if I had not lost two estates at that game! I was obliged, however, to relearn it from him. What could I do? Sit down and play with him. I had in my pocket a certain amount of copper coin, which I decided to risk, and which I spread out on the table.

"What's that? You do not intend to play with coppers here?"

And he took from his pocket a handful of Austrian zweizigers and ducats. I also had some zweizigers in my pocket. I placed one of them, tremblingly, on a card. It was a court card, and I won. The thief paid. For nothing in the world would I have dared to pocket that money, so I left it on the table. I won twice, thrice, and each time I left my winnings on the table. The fourth, fifth, sixth time it was still I whom Fortune favoured. I began to feel excessively warm. My position was dreadful: playing cards with a brigand and winning his money steadily. The seventh time I won again. I had a whole string of sweizigers spread out before me. The cold perspiration ran down my brow. Why had I not the same luck at Pozoni during the sitting of the Diet? I continued to leave my winnings upon the table, while I silently murmured: "Heaven grant that I may lose this money!"

Vain prayer; for the eighth time I won again. This time I certainly thought I was marked for death. The wretch said to me, laughingly: "You are probably one of the Countess's unhappy lovers, for you win outrageously, my little old chap."

He dared to laugh at me! At the ninth turn I was trembling in every limb. I won again. The robber struck a fierce blow on the table, and still laughing, said:

"Listen, little old chap; if you go on at this rate, I shall lose a province in an hour."

He gathered up what remained of his money on the table, and rose. I offered to return him the sum that I had won, but he eyed me from head to foot with the haughtiness of a hidalgo.

"For what do you take me? Put up that money, or I will pitch you out of doors with your zweizigers."

Then I took the whole lot and threw it to the tsiganes.

It was only when it was too late that I understood that I had just committed a foolish act; for I had myself declared my own wealth.

The tsiganes surrounded me, begging me to let them play the tune I liked the best. I got rid of them by sending them to the Countess. The madcap soon made her choice. With her siren's voice she began the popular air:

"My home is in the desert
In winter and in summer."

She sang so well, and with such irresistible charm that I fancied myself in my box at the Pesth Casino, and set to work to applaud her. The brigand applauded also, and was kind enough, in his turn, to regale us with a tune. He drew out a flute and played some rustic melody. What it was I do not remember.

"It is your time, my little old chap. Sing us something."

This demand embarrassed me. How could I sing when I was in a state of mortal anguish?

"I do not know how to sing," I replied.

Generally the Countess laughed at me if I happened unconsciously to hum a few bars from some opera, in my frightful peacock voice. But this time, speaking to me in French, she begged me to sing, if I did not wish, by my refusal, to expose us all to some insult.

This request was all that was wanting to deprive me of the remainder of my confidence. What could I do? With trembling heart and choking voice I began to sing laboriously. For a moment the Countess listened to me with great composure, but in attacking the verse—

"With thee alone I can be happy,"

I made an effort to raise my voice, when it broke so ludicrously that she burst out laughing. The whole band followed suit; so much so that at the end I did as the others, although I had not the slightest wish to imitate them.

The dance began again. The Countess was indefatigable. She whirled about until daylight. When the sun smote the window-panes she thanked the brigand for the pleasure he had given her, and begged him to have her carriage prepared, so that she might continue her journey.

Now, surely, our last hour had come!

Joszi Feketé went out, woke up the coachman and the footman, had the horses harnessed, and came back to tell us that everything was ready. Then I felt sure that he intended to assassinate us on the road.

I got back into the carriage with more fear than I had got out of it. The most suspicious thing to me was that I had not been asked for my pocket-book.

Digitized by Google

The bandit chief mounted his horse and accompanied us as far as the high road, keeping always by the carriage door. On arriving there he showed us our way, took off his hat, wished us much pleasure, and disappeared.

I did not feel safe until we had reached Zernid. Then only I reproached the Countess and told her that, if my presence had not restrained the rascals, this adventure might have had the most frightful ending for her.

She listened to my observations patiently, and by way of reply asked

"Apropos, dear Baron, are you not sleepy?"

"No," I answered curtly.

"Then sing me the end of that tune that you could not finish last night."

"In that case I am sleepy."

All along the road I made myself happy by dreaming of the favours that the Countess would have to lavish on me to buy my silence about this escapade. However, we had scarcely arrived at Arad and she had not yet crossed the passage-way from the hotel door to her room before she had already related the whole story to three persons. When we entered the ballroom, everyone knew of it.

He was such a good dancer.

That did not prevent her from being the queen of the ball, as she had counted on being, or else why should she have come, seeing that she did not dance once? To those who invited her she replied that she was tired. I should think so! She had danced eighteen czardas from midnight to morning. I, who had not moved, could scarcely keep on my legs.

I rushed to the gaming-rooms, saying to myself: "Now that Fortune has come to you, press her to your heart." At one table they were playing lansquenet.

"Away with you!" I cried. "I have a wonderful run of luck to-day at this game!' Yes, I was in for a thousand florins. Fortune only pursues me when she sees that she terrifies me.

Six months later, I took up a newspaper one day and read in it that the famous brigand Joszi Feketé, condemned to death by a court-martial, had been executed.

I carried this interesting paper to the Countess and showed her the news.

"Ah!" she said, resting the paper in her lap, when she had finished reading the account, "he was such a good dancer!"

A STORY ON A TABLE CLOTH.

It was rather dark in the hall-way when Julian Jones went upstairs to his new quarters on the fourth floor.

Someone else was on the stairs. He discerned a woman's form in the niche near the second floor, and the glimmering of a hand holding back skirts for him to pass. There was a faint breath of exquisite perfume about her.

"Excuse me," he said. Just then the light flared out in the lower hall. He made out a soft, oval face and a dainty figure as he passed. Julian was a big fellow, with features of strength rather than of beauty, but for all that he was a "sensitive," whose impressions of people were as sure as a dog's instinct about his master. The young woman's "atmosphere" was agreeable. It followed him to his room.

He lighted the gas and looked round. It was a goodish den for a literary worker. The carpet of pale greens and olives was almost new. The windows had lace curtains, and a fair out-look.

He sat down and tilted back his chair. A curious plot for a story had come into his mind. It seemed to start out of that chance encounter on the stairs, yet he scarcely realised it then, so subtle is the action of the brain.

His heart began to beat quickly. He had done a good deal of patient work in the past, with indifferent success; but such impromptu mental activity was new. He took it as a good omen. He had a strain of what we call superstition in his nature. A strange dream had impressed him with the belief that with his change of quarters something was to happen—for the better.

The bright, unique ideas came pouring into his mind like a flood. They clamoured for expression. He found a pencil in his pocket, and looked round for paper. He had not a scrap. His trunks would not come till the morning. If he stirred from the room to hunt up a stationer, the aroma of the story would be sure to escape. He thought desperately of his cuffs, his shirt-front, and execrated the motley wall paper. Had it been plain it should have done duty as a tablet.

He sprang from his chair. The covering of the square table in the corner was of white oil-cloth—imitation "marble." He sat down and marked it off in spaces. The pencil glided over it smoothly.

He wrote quickly and without effort. He knew he had never done anything like this before. Some one seemed to be dictating at his elbow. He had heard and read of such cases. Now he was the subject.

He wrote column after column, till the cloth was covered. He leaned back and surveyed it. He knew the thing was unique and exquisitely wrought out. It was a love story, with that dainty creature on the dim stairway flitting through it. Julian's eyes grew misty. He looked at his watch. The three hours he had been writing seemed but five minutes.

It was early yet, not eleven o'clock. He locked the door, and went out into the street. He had a vague idea of getting paper from some hotel clerk. He could not feel easy until his story was in manuscript.

He turned into the street. The thunder of the traffic was in his ears. A cab was dashing recklessly along. The subtle fascination of the story was yet upon him. In the midst of it he was conscious of a sudden shock, a pain crossing the sweetness, making horrible discord, then all became blank.

He was pulled from under the feet of the horse. The blood flowed from a wound made by the hoof.

No address could be found on him and he was carried to a hospital. He had been severely but not fatally injured.

Brain fever set in, but an excellent constitution was in his favour. In his seasons of delirium the marble table-cloth haunted him. Sometimes it hung over him like an awning, with the letters like a thousand eyes staring at him. Then they changed into Chinese hieroglyphics, and the young woman on the stairs was wrinkling her lovely brow in vain endeavours to decipher them. Again the cloth was waving like a banner from the roof of the Daily Fizzler.

Digitized by Google

Through careful nursing he came out of the tangle at length, and began to recall just what had happened. His story, which was to have inaugurated a new era, what had become of it? Four weeks he had been lying there, they told him.

In that time the room would be let to a new tenant, and his story scrubbed off the cloth by some wooden-headed chambermaid. He fretted and fumed over it. His omen of good luck had been demolished by a sledge hammer.

"Don't you want to look over these papers?" queried the pretty, cheerful nurse, placing a pile before him. "You need to catch up with the times that have rolled on while you lay here."

Julian tossed them over half savagely, and came presently upon something that made his heart thump. His story was looking him in the face from the columns of the Exaggerator. It was entitled, "Into His Kingdom." The letters seemed to wink and blink at him knowingly.

He read it through. There had been scarcely any alteration. Somebody had got ahead of the chambermaid and copied it, selling it as his or her own production. He should never be able to prove its authorship. He groaned in spirit.

Presently he came upon a copy of the Daily Fizzler, three weeks old. There he found the story, headed by a sensational paragraph, which was evidently its first appearance, the other paper being a copy.

Julian was half amused, half annoyed over the conjectures about the author. The paragraph set forth the production found on the oil-cloth as the last effort of an unfortunate son of genius. Driven to extremity, without a penny even to buy paper, he had fixed his last ideas upon the only white surface he could command, and then he had gone out into the night and committed suicide. Could he have staved off despair twenty-four hours longer the ice would have been broken.

Julian breathed more freely. The copyist, then, had not palmed off the production as his or her own. He could yet claim it without dispute.

As soon as he was on his feet, he called on the editor of the Daily Fizzler, who knew him by sight, and had prophesied success for him some day.

"It seems I have been figuring in the Fizzler lately as an impecunious suicide," said Julian bluntly.

The editor laid down his pen.

"Explain," he said.

Julian told the story.

"Like another man, you awake to find yourself famous," said the editor, offering him his hand. "That story has been copied all over the country. It is a gem of its kind."

"I'm not so sure that I shall ever do so well again," said Julian.

"What is done once can be done again. You will now command a hearing."

"How did you get hold of it?"

"It was sent in by —— by ——" consulting a memorandum—"by Miss Cora Wheeler, 142, —— Street."

"Why, I wrote the story in that house!"

"She sent a note stating the facts, and Bolton—you know him—touched them up a trifle. None of us suspected you. The landlady believed your name was Jones, but, on second thoughts, she confessed it might be Smith."

"I only had a word with her when I engaged the room."

"I may as well pay you to-day," said the editor as he made out a cheque.

A glance showed Julian it was drawn for £20. He was in luck after all, it seemed.

Then he drove in a cab to Charing Cross Road and rang the bell at 142, —— Street. How much had happened since he first went up those steps, less than six weeks ago!

The girl who opened the door looked at him blankly when he asked for Miss Wheeler, and showed him into a small reception room while she took his card.

He was presently asked to step upstairs to the third floor.

The door was half-open, showing a prettily furnished interior. He tapped gently. There was a rustling behind a dark green portiere, and a young woman stepped out from behind it, and greeted him with "Good morning." She was the one he had met on the stairs in the gloom, he could swear.

"You are Miss Cora Wheeler?"

She bowed.

"And I am Julian Jones. I wrote the story on the oilcloth. I am told it found its way into print through you. I have come to thank you."

Miss Wheeler was as breathless as Julian. She motioned him to a chair and sat down. The facts he had presented rapidly grouped themselves at once logically in her mind.

"Then you did not commit suicide," she said with a mirthful glance at his muscular frame, adding, "I never thought you did."

"I suppose I came pretty near 'shuffling off,'" he said, and he repeated his story.

"I expected something of the sort had happened," said Miss Wheeler, "though there were all sorts of conjectures. The landlady called me up to read what you had written. She thought it might denote, denote——"

"Insanity."

"It enchanted me. I write a little myself, you see. I sent it to the Fizzler. It was copied everywhere. You are a genius."

"With the right sort of inspiration," corrected Julian

It looks now as if the pair would go into partnership.

Digitized by Google

A BROKEN IDYLL.

FROM the rocky shore of St. Catherine, in the island of Jersey, one can see perfectly, when it is fine, the coast of France. It is even possible to distinguish the steeples of churches, the forms of houses, and to hear the soft, far-off echo of a chiming bell. From the little Channel island many a young boy and girl has gazed out over the sea to the land of fashion and greatness, and perchance sighed like the young eagle chained to the rock who longs to burst his bonds and soar away.

But none had ever looked thither with a fiercer longing than the boy who sat perched on the stone wall near the lighthouse one still summer night.

He was not alone.

By his side knelt a little girl who held her hat in her hand, and let what air there was play gently with her curls. She could not have been more than ten years of age; but even at that early period of existence the spirit of coquetry was rife in her. It was manifest by the way in which she crept gradually closer to the boy's side, and slid her head upon his shoulder to look up at him with the most appealing of blue eyes.

The lad was sunburnt and somewhat freckled, tall and sturdy, with a keen, dark eye, and close-cut hair. He looked about fifteen.

"To think that over there is the great world—Paris, which is more beautiful than London, and full of picture galleries, magnificent buildings, and great theatres! Here on the island we do not know what it is to live; there are only the cattle and the farm, the picnics and tourists in summer, and the terrible long winter. There is never anything new but the faces of the visitors, and they are often rude and noisy. If my parents think to see me live and die upon the little farm yonder, they are greatly mistaken. No, I must see the world—live in the world!"

There was rebellion in the face and tone of the lad as he spoke the words. His companion laid her cheek caressingly against his rough, brown face.

"Poor Louis!" she whispered. "Where will you go? If you go to Paris I am afraid you will not come back; and grandmother says that it is only rich people who should live in Paris."

The lad's cheek flushed.

"Rich people!" he repeated bitterly. "Listen, Marie; one may not always be poor. There are things which bring money—for instance, if one can paint pictures, write books, or play in big theatres, one is no longer unknown and poor."

The child looked suddenly at him with eyes full of a dawning intelligence, and slowly nodded.

"Yes, you are very clever," she said. "No one at the College in St. Heliers declaimed more beautifully. Oh, how proud I was when they applauded you at the prize-giving! But I would rather you did not go away, because grandmother is so old and cross, and no one is good to me but you."

"Poor child," he murmured, stroking her curls. "But you must be brave and good. Listen, Marie: it is for your own sake, as much as my own, that I must go away. You will not forget me, dearest, and I shall come back to find you a beautiful woman. Then it will not be the little white farmhouse with the green shutters that I shall take you home to, but a fine house in a great city which I shall have won for you."

"I had rather it were the farmhouse if you did not have to go away," she sobbed clinging to him. "For I am so lonely, and grandmother is so hard to please."

Then he talked to her gently, telling her all the dreams of a hopeful and ambitious youth; and as she listened the vision of wealth and greatness took hold of her—she being an imaginative child—and the life of the island seemed poor and mean in comparison.

They were both of French parents, but had been bred on the island. The girl was an orphan, and lived alone with her grandmother, a terrible old shrew, rapidly going blind. The lad's parents took pity on her, and had her often at the farm, but she cared little for them, they being rough, simple folk. She only loved with the ardour of her childish nature the tall, headstrong lad, who was the despair of both father and mother.

. . . . . .

It was just another such night ten years later. The gate of the little farmhouse at St. Catherine's was swung open, and a young man, pale and travel-stained, came slowly up the path to the porch where monsieur and madame awaited him. In another moment madame's arms were round his neck, and she was crying on his shoulder.

"Poor boy!" she ejaculated, "so you have come home after all?"

The young man cast a searching glance round, then clutched madame almost fiercely by the arm.

"Where is she?" he demanded sternly. "I do not see her!"

Madame's fat, red face paled, and she looked confused.

"Ah! how shall I tell him?" she murmured, wringing her hands.

"Speak—if you love me, speak!" her son reiterated passionately. "It is not possible that she is dead?"

He uttered the last words in a low, hushed tone, as if it were a thought almost too terrible to be spoken aloud, and clutched at the porch with a momentary overpowering faintness.

"Do not think of her, my son," madame replied vehemently. "After all our goodness in taking her in after the grandmother's death, too, it is infamous! The little wretch! She has left us!"

"When? Where? Have no steps been taken to find her?"

There was a sharp ring of pain in the words which smote madame's ear.

"It is useless," she said, laying her hand gently on her son's arm. "She did not go alone. There has been a tourist sketching about here all the summer. We have found that they took passage together on Sunday night from St. Heliers to Southampton. The whole affair had evidently been prearranged."

Her son clutched wildly at the porch for support, and passed his hand over his eyes.

"Why do you mock me?" he cried. "Tell me it is all a jest—but it is a cruel one. Ah, mother mine, surely you would not deceive me? Tell me that I have been dreaming! But I am not dreaming now—oh, no, not now. Do not keep her from me; it is such a long time since I saw her. And I—I love her so! Do not torture me. I cannot bear it."

"Would I deceive my dear son?" murmured madame, sobbing, and seeking to draw him within doors.

In the parlour he sank into a chair and seemed dead to all around him.

Once only he roused himself. His eye fell on a sprig of purple heather which lay in a tiny coral basket on the mantleshelf.

It was her's. He remembered it well—remembered the day when he had bought and given it to her, the Sabbath evening when that very sprig of heather had been gathered and put there.

He lifted his hand suddenly and dashed them to the ground. His mother glanced round nervously at the crash, and saw him treading the heather under foot. One word escaped his lips:

"Broken!" he muttered, as if in answer to an interrogation.

And in his pocket lay a letter, which now he scarcely remembered in the pain of the moment, and of which he had as yet breathed no word. But it was the reward of nearly ten years' hard fight with an adverse world, that had very nearly beaten him once or twice, and now seemed disposed to smile upon him after blighting his happiness for ever. It was an engagement at the Théâtre Francais, at a salary which, though not munificent, would have made both monsieur and madame open their eyes.

But the dream of youth had ended—the fond illusion with which he had buoyed himself to fight and win; it could only return as an agony of remembrance.

. . . . .

Digitized by Google

Another ten years later, and a summer evening at St. Catherine's. A man walked swiftly towards the lighthouse, with bent head, as if full of thought. He was barely thirty-five, yet might have passed for over forty, so hardly had time and labour dealt with him. There was also about his face a stern cynicism, which made the great world who had chosen to make him what he was fear as well as praise him.

Suddenly he started. On the wall overlooking the sea sat a woman, so richly dressed and striking in appearance that one might well wonder what had brought her there.

She turned her head, and their eyes met. A hot flush swept over his face, and he bit his lip hard, as if to control some emotion. She, on the contrary, remained quite pale and perfectly composed.

"How do you do?" she said, extending her hand. "I see the recognition is mutual. I thought you were too great a personage to have time or inclination to visit St. Catherine's now."

He did not offer to take her hand; indeed, it seemed as if he had not seen it.

"And you—what brought you here?"

The query was somewhat stern.

"I? Oh, I am staying at St. Heliers," she answered carelessly—"with my husband," she added, with just a shade of triumph in her tone. "I am married now; and I had a fancy to see the old place once again, so I got him to put me down here, and he is going to call for me in about an hour's time. I do not know how long I have been here, or where he has driven to. But he can't be much longer."

"Are you happy?"

There was a rude abruptness in the words that startled her.

She turned away and laughed.

"As happy as most women. I have plenty of money, and a husband who lets me do pretty much as I please. I am quite a fashionable beauty, and the men rave about me. You may be interested to hear that, in the event of my husband's losing any more money on the Stock Exchange, I am seriously thinking of going on the stage. A good many people have advised me to do it. What do you think?"

He did not know whether she was jesting or not.

"Art has always been too dear and sacred a subject with me to be even thought or spoken of lightly," he answered coldly. "It is my life, my soul, the mistress of my existence who has never played me false," he added a little bitterly. "With the stage beauty I have nothing to do."

He was turning away, when she stopped him with an appealing gesture.

"Listen, Louis," she said; "do not condemn me utterly. If you had never wanted to be great, you would have grown up on the farm yonder, and I should have married you. We should have been happy after the fashion of simple people. It may not be in me to love much, but I loved you—I have never loved anyone else."

He looked at her swiftly.

"Yes, you ran away!"

There was a scornful incredulity in the words.

"Listen," she said imperiously. "Yes, I ran away because life was intolerable to me at St. Catherine's. I was young and"—she hesitated—"beautiful, I suppose—at least the stranger told me so; and I, like yourself, was ambitious. After all you had said to me, I could not live the little life of the farm. And you might never become great or rich, or come back to me, I thought, and so I took the Fates into my own hands and went. We cannot see the future."

"Have you never regretted it?"

"In a way, yes; but we must accept the inevitable. I have married a fashionable artist and a rich gentleman; he adores me, and I"—she shrugged her shoulders—"I tolerate him. If I had children I might have loved them, but I have none. I am quite alone, and there is only the memory of the past to remind me that I ever had a heart."

The unconscious pathos of her words touched him. He pitied her, the woman who was without his great consoler, Art. It is not given to all to enter its inner chamber and taste the rapture of that mystic union. Art is a chary lover, admitting only the true and tried. Many woo and long, in truth; few enjoy.

"Before we met," he said slowly, looking at her with a strange longing, thinking for a moment that the blue eyes of the child-sweetheart gazed into his once more, "I had often hard and bitter thoughts of you. Perhaps I hardly comprehend how fatal a tempter is beauty, or how cruel poverty to an ambitious girl. It was too much that I expected of you, for women are not like men, who work and move in the world; their province is to sit at home and wait. Some women might have done so—a duller, plainer woman, who loved more and thought less, probably would; you could not. But you have done a cruel thing—you have destroyed my faith in woman, you have broken my heart.

"As I have loved and thought of you, it is not possible for me to love and think of any other woman while I live. All the love that there is in me to give has passed away. When Destiny shut the gates of that home I might have had, it opened to me the temple of Fame in recompense, and, for the voices of the children who might have called me father, substituted the shouts of the multitude.

"My wife is a goddess whom I worship reverently and sincerely; but at times"—he shivered as he spoke; perhaps it was the breath of the sea which at that moment blew chill upon him—"the clasp of her arms is somewhat cold, and instead of the incense of her temple, one longs for the warm touch of living lips and the soft arms of animate flesh. It is but a weakness of mortals. But I see someone coming—doubtless it is your husband. Good-bye. Do not quite forget one who has so loved you. The bitterness, the regret are useless now. I have but one wish for you, that Heaven may grant you happiness, if it be possible."

She held out both hands to him.

He raised his hat and turned away.

"Think that I am your little sweetheart once again!" she cried, the tears of genuine feeling shining in her blue eyes; forget what I am and you are now, and all that has come between us. Kiss me once as you used to kiss me long ago; call me chérie and bien-aimée, and let me remember our last meeting till I die!"

It seemed as if she had suddenly cast from her the artificiality which her life had made habitual to her, and was again for a brief moment the little clinging child.

At that moment the sound of a far-off bell from the French coast fell on their ears. It was the knell of their early dream which, like the soft mist lying and spreading over the sea, had gradually faded to return no more.

For a moment he hesitated. Then his face softened, and he took her in his arms and held her to him, calling her fondly all the old pet names she had been used to hear from his lips.

But he kissed her not as the lover had done, but rather as one would kiss a dead child that had been greatly loved in life.

As he turned his steps landwards, he met at a turning of the wall the stranger he had seen approaching from afar, and looked at him curiously. Instinct told him this was Marie's husband.

The stranger returned the gaze carelessly, and threw away a half-finished cigar. He was a big man, somewhat florid in complexion, with curling hair and sleepy blue eyes, and looked as if he were well satisfied with himself and the world in general. He also looked as if he fared sumptuously every day and it did not always agree with him. But withal he is a good husband as husbands go, Louis said to himself, watching him give his arm to his wife and place a shawl round her shoulders.

"A bit chilly, isn't it?" he was saying. "I can't think what possessed you to come here. You had much better have gone on with me."

"I had a fancy to come," Marie answered somewhat wearily. "It is a beautiful place after all. You used to think so once," she added, looking at him a little wistfully.

Her husband laughed.

"We all think something beautiful once or twice in our lives," he said lightly, "and discover that it is but commonplace after all. No, my dear; it was not St. Catherine's I admired, which is a slow place; not even so picturesque as other parts of the island. It was the belle of St. Catherine's, and it is many years since she put St. Catherine behind her Indeed, I thought you had almost forgotten the place, until you expressed a wish to spend a week or two at St. Heliers this summer. By-the-bye, what has become of that old farmer and his wife with whom you used to live? Are they still alive, I wonder? Surly old fellow; and madame's tongue was rather sharp at times—eh, my dear?"

Digitized by Google

He laid his hand caressingly on his wife's shoulder for a moment. She shivered and imperceptibly drew away.

"Do not speak of them; they were stupid people," she said almost irritably. "I do not wish to see either of them again."

"Nor any of the people belonging to your old life?" he queried carelessly. "It could not have been a very happy life, and you seemed glad enough to leave it. When we have altered our circumstances for the better, we do not care about remembering that we have not always been as we are now. No, there could have been nothing to regret in leaving St. Catherine's."

She cast a momentary glance backwards at the sea, and longed with all the intensity of which she was capable that it were possible for her to be a child once more, and live her life again. Yet she was a woman that her world envied, and she knew it. Suddenly, she remembered that Louis had wished her happiness, and smiled a little bitterly.

As he passed through the wicket-gate and entered the farmhouse, Louis saw monsieur and madame rise to meet him. They were old now, and time and labour had bowed their once upright forms and whitened their hair. And though no word was uttered, he knew that it was the daily sorrow of the old man's life that his son would not succeed to the farm after him.

"My son," said madame, as he took the chair into which, strangely enough, he had fallen on that memorable night ten years ago, "is it not time that you thought of taking a wife? Consider, you are now a great man, and can choose among whom you will. We are old, your father and I, and there is none to come after us but you. We would wish to see our grandchildren before we die."

"Do not speak to me of marriage," her son replied wearily; "never speak to me of that again, if you love me, my mother; it is impossible."

Then he shaded his eyes with his hand, and, looking through the casement window into the garden, saw a picture of what might have been. It was himself, brown, sturdy, and marked with the labour of the soil, returning from his daily toil, and Marie, beautiful as he had seen her that evening by the sea, stood at the gate to meet him, clad in the simple dress of the peasant farmer's wife. And as he approached, brown, sturdy children rushed to greet him. He felt the clinging of their chubby arms round his neck, their soft cheeks pressed against his.

A strange choking rose in his throat. He turned his head hastily away, and his eye fell upon that vacant space on the mantel-shelf left empty by the basket and heather he had dashed from it ten years ago. It came to him that even as that was empty, so must the place of wife and children remain for him all his life.

. . . . . .

"Hullo, Marie, where are you? I must have fallen asleep; and see, it is quite dark. We must hasten home, or grandmother will scold you. I have dreamt such strange things."

The lad stretched himself and rubbed his eyes as he spoke. The little girl looked up at him wonderingly.

"You have slept a long time," she said, in rather a frightened voice. "I tried to wake you once or twice, but I could not. And every now and then you gave such a start, and cried out as if you had been hurt, but I could not hear what you said. Did you have a very bad dream, Louis? Tell me all about it."

"No, not a bad dream," he answered thoughtfully; "on the contrary, a very good one. But I cannot tell you now, little one; some day when you do not ask me I will tell you."

She looked disappointed.

"But"—he threw his arm round her as he spoke, and looked steadily into her eyes—"I shall not go away and leave you alone with grandmother, my dear; you need never be afraid of that any more. And our home shall be the farmhouse yonder, as you wished."

"And you will not go to Paris, after all?"

"No, dear; perhaps grandmother is right, and only rich people should go there. I will be content where Heaven has placed me."

"But the dream, Louis—the dream?"

He did not tell her that dream till years after, when she was his wife and the mother of his children—when she had almost forgotten that summer evening.

But he never forgot.

Digitized by Google

THE SWIMMING-MASTER.

AT Milan, not long ago, lived two families, who shall be known in these pages as T. and C. They entertained the same feeling toward each other that the Capulets and Montagues did for one another, some centuries back. Now, as then, there was a daughter of the house of C., and, on the other side, a fine youth to carry down the name of T. Of course, these young people followed in the steps of their prototypes, and loved each other with a truly Romeo-and-Juliet ardour.

The family feud did not in any way affect the young lady and her swain, unless, indeed, to augment their fervour. They loved each other. How often at the Biffi concerts an interchange of glances had conveyed this information from one to the other; and at the races too, where they frequently met, they had managed to tell each other that henceforth they lived for one another only. It is as difficult to conceal love as it is a cough; hence, almost before they realised it, their secret was known to all their acquaintances, and, incidently, to their parents. It seemed for a time as if the world must come to an end. Then Monsieur C., of the cathedral, a friend to both of these illustrious families, tried to throw oil on the troubled waters. He did not succeed.

In vain the young pair threw themselves, in orthodox fashion, at the feet of their parents, to implore the not unusual pardon, and obtain at the same time the consent to their marriage, which, as they were both minors, the law compelled them to obtain. The old people were inexorable, absolutely unyielding. Meanwhile, June, with all its summer warmth, arrived. No better excuse was needed now for the ascendants to separate, so to speak, the descendants. The lover apparently submitted to his fate with resignation, for he got his traps together, and started over the St. Gothard for Switzerland, as he was ordered to do. The fair one, in her turn, followed her mamma, now very much on the alert, to the seaside.

All Milan was excited at this tame ending of the affair, and exclaimed in chorus: "Well, well! and only a little while ago they were so wrapped up in each other that it seemed as if they could not exist apart, and now, just see with what indifference they have accepted the situation! Serious love is, indeed, out of fashion, something to read about, maybe; but not to live up to, in this day—oh, no!"

The next scene found mother and daughter by the sea, at a fashionable resort, where, needless to add, they were the most brilliant stars in its bright firmament. The heroine of this little tale already seemed to have passed from the joy of love to that of the sea; a not unnatural transition, perhaps, for is there not a relationship between the two, since the mother of Love is the daughter of the Sea?

The soft roses of beauty returned to her fresh young cheeks, and she appeared no longer to even remember her absent lover. Indeed, she had apparently quite changed her purpose, and, instead of the school of matrimony, had undoubtedly dedicated herself to that of swimming. The lovely Milanese seemed now only bent on rivalling the graces of the ancient naiads.

The clever mother, meanwhile, looked on approvingly, thinking: "These gymnastics will drive all the nonsense out of her head, and, anyway, I should much prefer to see Ida a good swimmer than the daughter-in-law of that disagreeable old Count T., who has neither my ambition nor my quarterings."

Consequently, the marchioness put the young lady under the special care of the old swimming teacher, the white-bearded Andrea. But, curiously enough, Ida did not learn to swim, notwithstanding her frequent exercise in this art. As long as she kept near the shore she got on very well, but once out a little way she would sink, and the chances are that, if old Andrea had not stayed close by all the time, she would have made acquaintance with the bottom of the Mediterranean at the beginning of the season.

One day the marchioness sat near the shore, under a leafy acacia. The young marchioness, altogether adorable in her abbreviated bathing-costume, was swimming about with unusual audacity, and Papa Andrea, his white beard floating on the surface, held her up with one arm. A wave half-lifted her from the water—a second turned her completely round—a third passed over her—a fourth buried her from sight. Beside herself with terror, the mother gave a scream which brought half the bathing colony to her side in an instant, while she cried out: "My daughter is drowning! My life, all that I possess, to any one who will save her! Help, help!"

Before she had finished speaking, Andrea had dived under the water; the old man seemed in an instant to have recovered his strength. With their hearts in their mouths, those on shore stood perfectly still; not a sound was heard, save the distracting sobs of this modern Niobe, and the infinite echo of the sonorous ocean. Four hundred eyes were fixed in one direction, at the point where first the young girl, and then the swimming-master, had disappeared into a watery abyss.

Another moment of suspense, and then the submerged pair rose to the surface again. They were clasped in an almost frantic embrace. Evidently they were breasting the waves with the superhuman strength of two people brought back from the very gates of death. Andrea held the white-faced girl tightly about the waist, while with his free arm he struck out for shore.

A shout of joy greeted them, turning suddenly into one of indescribable surprise, however, as they came nearer land. When they were a few rods only from the beach, the surprise there became mute astonishment. Andrea, the old man, had undergone a wonderful metamorphosis. The waves of the blue Mediterranean had sprinkled his face with the sweet waters of eternal youth. In fact, one wave had carried away his white beard, and a second his wig; his hair was now black and curly. This old man, unexpectedly grown young, was holding the pretty young marchioness closely, almost desperately, to his heart—a clasp, in short, which bespoke the lover rather than the life-preserver.

They reached the shore. The summer colony understood at a glance, then, how and why old Andrea had become young Count T., and a salvo of applause echoed in every heart, even by the staunchest upholders of implacable escutcheons, greeted him.

Two hours later—the young marchioness having meanwhile completely recovered from the shock—a conversation between the Marchioness C. and young Count T. was drawing to a close something after this fashion:

"I do not wish to judge your conduct," the marchioness was saying, "but you must accept its consequences, Count. I tell you, therefore, that no man in the world, save her husband, shall have the right to boast that he embraced my daughter in the presence of two hundred people—no, not even if it were to save her from certain death. Hence the rest is understood, and notwithstanding that your coat of arms is very inferior to mine in its number of quarterings, my daughter can accept no other suitor than yourself, provided always that you are in a position to marry her."

"Dear marchioness, I have at length attained my majority. I am of age, and at liberty therefore to marry without my parents' consent. It is not even necessary for me to consult anyone in the matter. I am sure of my mother's property, anyway; for that was left to me unconditionally, and it is enough for us."

At this stage of the proceedings I deem further details useless. Suffice it to say that the swimming school was broken up, and the betrothed returned to Milan, where, before the end of July, the banns were published.

So I close, with best wishes to the swimming-master and his bride.

To prevent unnecessary labour, and consequent disappointment, to any readers of this paper, who in the past have forwarded original stories for insertion, we would take this opportunity of saying that our arrangements for the provision of matter for "Short Stories" are complete for some time to come.

Digitized by Google

His Troublesome Charge.

DAR KEWOOD was the grandest old country seat—its owner, Philip Darke, called it farm—in the whole world.

It stretched out as far as the eye could reach, in verdant meadows, and gentle productive hills, picturesque valleys, and heavily-timbered levels.

Through the most secluded part of the timber a deep trout stream meandered aimlessly between banks fringed with ferns and flowers for a couple of miles, then lost its identity in the restless, cliff-girt ocean beyond.

The well-appointed stables, all neatly painted red and white, and containing some of the best horseflesh in the country, even Phil Darke's enemies admitted, were well separated from the dwellings by orchards of peach and pear, apple and cherry, and plenteous patches of fruit-bushes.

For the dwellings themselves—they were all commodiously built, painted cool, clear white, even cooler looking by contrast with the green shutters; they were well surrounded by balconies and verandahs upon which all the windows opened, after the southern style.

Standing in one of these open door-windows now—one lying between the softly-carpeted and richly appointed drawing-room and the low verandah surrounding it—stood a stylish woman of thirty or so, with a beautiful but rather selfish-looking dark face.

She wore a magnificent negligé of creamy silk and lace; many diamonds and rubies flashed upon her white hands, but there was a look of intolerance in her haughty eyes.

Those eyes were following an unconscious pair carelessly wending their way homewards across the spring-kissed fields—only a girl and a dog. The former tall and slight, the latter a great, handsome shaggy collie.

They were on very good terms with each other, for occasionally the girl would bend down, and the dog would bound up, then there would be a clear, ringing laugh, a thrill of whistles, and a series of joyous barks.

Mrs. Devereaux frowned impatiently while they drew nearer and became merrier in their gambols.

She was wondering if this girl might not interfere with the financial future of her own children—a boy of twelve and a girl of eight—whose voices came buoyantly up from the stables, where their Shetland ponies were installed.

Mrs. Devereaux was the widowed sister of Philip Darke. Early in life she had married a wealthy broker, and ever since her life had been spent in a whirl of social fashions and worldly ambitions, until now the fortune her husband had left was well nigh exhausted.

Had it not been for their wealthy and lavishly generous bachelor uncle, she would have felt very much concerned over her children's future.

Even as it was, she did sometimes. What if he should ever marry? He was not beyond the possibility of it, surely, at forty-four? Still, she hadn't much fear of that.

Phil had always been such an odd fellow, and one love affair early in life had ended disastrously; then he swore he would never have another, and he never had thus far, although it was not the fault of his female acquaintances.

What, though, if he should leave his fortune, or most of it, or Darkewood, to this wild young thing whose guardian he had been ever since she was a tiny mite of three or four?

For all his lazy philosophy, he had a warm, generous heart. He might have grown to love this girl through association; after all, she was the daughter of his hapless early love—the orphaned child of the woman for whose sake he had turned from all other women in disdain.

From her death-bed she had sent her child to Philip Darke, charging him to care for her as if she had been his own.

The selfishness of her charge had always been a theme for scorn on Mrs. Devereaux's part; but Philip had accepted it—whether with pleasure or pain, no one ever knew. For all his indifferent exterior, he was a man of iron will, and no one should ever again see him moved like a girl.

He sauntered lazily into the cool, tree-shaded drawing-room, even while the frown still rested upon his handsome worldly sister's brow

She did not hear him on the deep pile of the carpet until he reached her side and threw one arm round her waist.

Then she gave vent to a little shocked exclamation, not at this act, but at the act of the girl she was keenly watching.

"Gracious! She has vaulted the fence almost without an effort."

Philip smiled under his big brown moustache, and a lazy amusement crept into his dark eyes.

"Nest? Oh, she's an athlete," he responded, watching the slight dark figure, coming whistling up the lane. "She can send her mare, Duchess of Leinster, over any fence or ditch that I can take with Prince Madblood, I assure you. Not only that, but she's the captain of a ladies' boat club and the tennis club."

Mrs. Devereaux looked at him in dumb horror a moment. Then:

"And you look on smiling at all this—nay, talk as if you admired her for it!" she exclaimed at last. "You have brought her up like a great over-grown tom-boy, instead of a lady-like, intelligent girl, fitted for some use in the world. She ought to be going to school instead of jumping ditches with horses and leaping fences with dogs like a stable-boy."

A quick dark flush mounted to Philip's broad, high brow.

"But she does go to school," he said, resentfully, "in the village—a very good school; but there isn't any now—it's holiday time."

Mrs. Devereaux shrugged her shoulders.

"A village school—bah! She should be going away to some finishing school, some academy, where she could learn to behave herself decently and earn her livelihood. She has no fortune, I believe—her mother simply left her a name. You should certainly educate her to earn her own living, to be independent of your charity in her womanhood at least, Philip.

Digitized by Google

She is almost a woman—seventeen. Why, I was married t that age!"

The amusement in his eyes had fled, giving place to a thoughtful, troubled look.

Was he wronging Ernestine Villard by letting her receive an education and be happy in her own way?

Would she blame him, wish to be independent of him, in her womanhood?

It shocked and pained him to think that womanhood was so near at hand, that other girls married often at her present age.

He had enjoyed the tomboyism and daring and frank carelessness of her girlhood quite as much as she had—he had been her tutor in many an athletic feat.

And he had found her such a gay, glad, apt pupil, such an ever-interesting companion.

He had taught her many things that would have shocked his haughty sister, more even than her expert riding and fence leaping—among them to shoot on the wing with a pretty little rifle he had given her, or a revolver, and to play cards many an evening—just for fun—and skilfully enough to many a time relieve him of pocket-money.

Yes, he saw it now; this was wrong, all wrong.

Ernestine would soon be a woman, and, though he never meant that she should earn her own living, on any account, she would have to go out into the world and mingle with other women.

If she felt lost and out of place among them; if she could not equal them in refinement, knowledge, accomplishments, would she not blame her guardian, and justly?

The thought haunted him all day and unpleasantly.

When Nest asked him to join her in a ride to the beach, he answered her shortly, so shortly that she looked at him in amazement.

Had she displeased him? How? Well, she couldn't go riding now; and tears of pain and resentment blinded her eyes while she hunted up fishing-tackle, took the eager collie into the secluded May woods, where dwelt the timid trout under shadow of tangled undergrowth.

Mrs. Devereaux had been at Darkewood but two days when she became so terribly bored with loneliness, that she spoke to Philip about asking some people down from town.

"Oh, Phil! Phil! do you want to get rid of me?"

He carelessly assured her that she was welcome to ask whoever she wanted whenever she wanted them; but there was no one for whose coming he especially cared; he had been a hermit so long, etc.

So she asked a number of society people—people supposed to be wealthy, cultured, and all that was desirable; yet Philip Darke had never been so bored in all his life.

How languid and inane all the women were, painted, fashionable dolls, who were shocked at the hoidenism of Nest, because it required physical daring. Their daring was all moral, they flirted scandalously, married and single, and the men——

Bah! there was nothing manly about them. They were mere followers of the pretty butterflies of fashion; all, except one.

Gerald Graham was not a man to be despised by man or woman; there was something so frank, so noble, and manly about him that he was instead one to be admired even by his enemies, a handsome young fellow of thirty, with lots of brains, lots of daring, physical and moral, and plenty of money.

After a week at Darkewood, during which Mrs. Devereaux dressed and smiled ravishingly for his benefit, while he attentively studied her bête noire, the young hoiden, and while Philip went moodily about his farm feeling lost and onely, Gerald Graham became Nest's shadow.

A gay cavalier in all her rides, a companion in her walks, he boated with her, fished with her, talked with her until he fell madly in love with the unconsciously beautiful young tomboy, who interested him as no society woman had ever done or ever could.

Jealousy made Mrs. Devereaux very bitter of tongue. She never lost a chance to taunt Nest with her dependence, or scoff at her daring, and put misconstruction upon her most generous and disinterested act.

Nest was by nature quick of temper, hot, and passionate of blood. She controlled herself as long as she could—as long as self-respect and respect for Phil, dear old Phil, who had somehow grown so moody and out of place under his sister's taunts—would let her.

She sought her guardian, and found him in the library one day.

His head was bowed on his hands, and when he lifted his face, the eyes were haggard with painful thought.

Gerald Graham had just left him, and what had he said to bring that look upon the face she had learned to look upon as the noblest, and best, and kindest on earth?

She had come to speak of her own troubles—to tell him she must go away to earn her own living, that she could bear this dependence on him, with which she was so often taunted by his sister, no longer; but she forgot them in the sight of his.

"Oh, Guardy Phil, what is it?" she cried, going on her knees before him, her voice and face tremulous with pity. "Are you ill?"

"No, little one," he answered, with a slow, weary smile, "not physically; mentally, I don't know. The thought of parting with my bon camarade is hardly productive of pleasure. Ernestine"—the smile vanished, his voice became sterner—"perhaps you know, but he said you didn't! Gerald Graham has just asked my consent to woo you—as his wife, child. What shall I say to him?"

Her face flushed, then blanched, and flushed again.

"Tell him?" she repeated; then bitterly, "Tell him that I thank him for the honour he would confer upon me, but——Oh, Phil! Phil!"—and she shrunk shivering to the floor and burst into a storm of sobs, her face pressed to her palms—"do you want to get rid of me? You are cruel too."

A moment he looked at her in silence, then a slow, almost fearful light crept into his eyes.

He touched the bowed head with a reverence and devotion he had never given to any cultured or queenly dame of fashion.

"Nest," he said softly, gently drawing her to his breast, "I've been learning my own heart while surrounded by all these people for the last five or six weeks. I've seen you falling in love with young Graham"—she started, but he went on—"and in my mind I've forced myself to see my life as it must be without you, sweet. You know the dead old trunk of a tree on the edge of the woods? I know my life would be like that without the beautiful verdure of your dear presence round it."

"But I don't love Gerald Graham, except as a friend, a good noble man, and a good rider, a good shot," she protested.

And the haggard eyes broke into light of wonder and incredulity.

Then—well, suffice it to say that less than a month later his troublesome charge became Philip Darke's beloved wife, his bon camarade for life.

It was a hard hit for Graham, but he had never been encouraged by Nest, who had unconsciously lost her heart to her guardian long before.

The Duchess of Leinster still keeps pace with Prince Madblood, and the ditches are as deep, and the fences as steep as ever, and Ernestine's husband more her lover than he was of yore; and the bright-eyed, impulsive, dashing, and lovable little lady of Darkewood does not regret it.

Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

CHAPTER XIII.

ABOUT the tiny thing, and yellow from being long laid away, a faint odour of violets lingered; in one corner was the embroidered "L"—my own work.

"Will you not tell me just how it all happened?" he asked tenderly. "Let me help you as I did before. Oh, Letty, do I not deserve your confidence?"

"Oh, I cannot, I cannot!" I moaned.

"I am cruel to ask it," he said quickly; "you are so pale and troubled now. Get up from the floor, you poor child, and let me take you home. I ordered the horses a half-hour ago."

"I hate to tell you all," I said steadily, "because it makes me out a sly and spying thing; but my silly pride about that dies at this moment. I won't get off the floor, for a mean person like me ought to grovel. I want to tell somebody, for, truly, I know more than I can bear. I think, sometimes, I shall go crazy. I cannot sleep any more. If I find out other secrets of dead people I shall ask to be shut up in an asylum, for fear I shall take to killing, too. If I could give someone my ghosts I should be happy; and, you know, when you tell a thing that haunts you it often goes away. But why should I give you my horrors?"

"Because I have lived so long among them that they don't worry me," he said drearily.

"If I thought you would never mention it to me, and treat me as a good girl, not a prying, ungrateful demon, if only for a little while—a month, perhaps—I could bear to tell all."

"A month is a short time," he smiled; "I can promise that."

Then I told him all, even why I went there. Once or twice he moved uneasily and sighed, but he did not say a word.

"Please do not crouch on the floor any more," he said, when I had finished; "if there is anyone to do that, I should."

I got up on my feet and took his hand. "Never think any more, Mr. Scott, I shudder when you are near me," I said, and, before I knew what I was doing, I put his hand to my lips. He turned hastily and went to the window. I saw that his face was ghastly pale, his eyes misty with tears. We had talked so long it was quite dark outside, and the fragrance of the flowers, damp and sweet, swept across our faces.

"Sometime," he said slowly, "Margaret shall tell you all that story, after the probation."

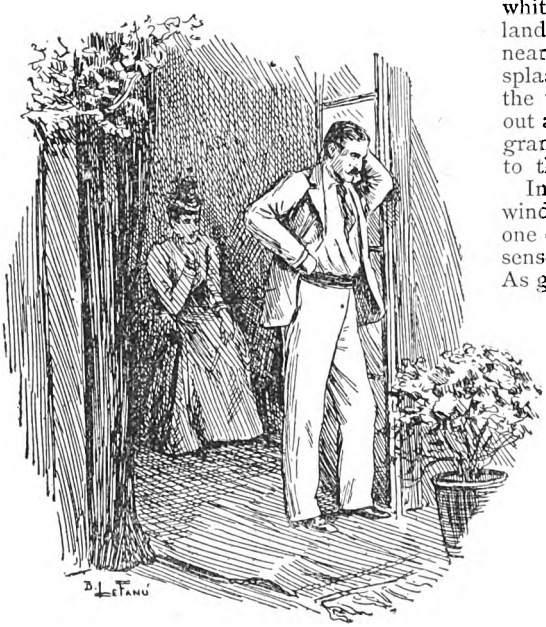
I was glad that I had not said a word of Yara or those letters, only of the hotel and what I saw there.

"I hate it all," I said miserably.

"Do any of us think of it without agony?" he cried bitterly, then he suddenly checked himself. "Go brush your pretty curls, Letty, and have dinner with me. It is too late for yours at home. Let me try for that month of probation to make you see a John Scott other than the ruffian you think. You are hurt and sad over this affair with the Italian. You will be lonely without your lessons. Let me see if I cannot make your life brighter. My love for your sister Katherine makes you dear to me."

"If you speak of her I shall never like you," I cried. "Indeed, I cannot bear it."

"I will never speak of her, then, to you," he said, looking at me searchingly; "and yet, about that—her—you are not like yourself. I never can read you, Letty."



He turned hastily and went to the window.

Strange as it may seem, his friendship, after that, took all my troubles, even my ghosts, away. I think it was because I had never had such a friend before. He came every day to take Aunt Marg and me driving or to sail in his yacht. He brought me books, and taught me to love the authors he cared for most. He praised my singing, and I found myself satisfied with my listeners as never before.

Without reading a line, I hid those two hateful letters and soon forgot I had them. I noticed I grew particular about my gowns and dissatisfied with my looks. I avoided Justina, and heard with delight that Dean Gregory had gone away, and Yara had limped across the beach a week after my new friendship began. I was not very strong that month, and that may be the reason I was so easy to lead and so grateful for kindness and courtesy.

One night in that month, July, there came a terrible storm; the wind roared across the Gulf; the sea raged in fury, thundering along the sand, and the flying spray stretched out great white arms to the shivering homes on the land, those houses on stilts, forlornly set near the beach. Often the water splashed against my window, and I heard the waves beneath the house rush in and out and break against the porch, and all grandfather's rose-bushes were covered to their tops in water, and many died.

In the morning, sullen and grey, the wind still howled and the sea roared, and one could not hear another sound! Every sense was stunned by nature's warfare. As grandfather and I were trying to bring order out of the chaos of his rose-bushes, John rode by and stopped to tell me that he was going fifteen miles along the beach to see after some of his property which he thought the storm might have injured.

How handsome he looked, on his big black horse! My mind went back to Justina's story. He had held me, a tiny baby, close to his heart and rode with me long weary miles. Did I cry and wail as babies do in such misery as mine? I must have done so, but I knew he was not impatient or cross. I fancied the tender pity in his beautiful eyes as he bent over me—the helpless sigh from his lips. At any rate, he had held me to his heart then, if he never would again.

"Letty, you have been staring straight at me for five minutes," he said uncomfortably, "and you have not said a word." I turned rosy red and began playing with the tassels on a very pretty blue gown I had made myself and put on, knowing that he would ride down some time during the day.

"I was thinking," I stammered. "Is it not dangerous to ride on the beach now?"

"You, a little sea-loving maid, a mariner's grandchild, to ask! You had better go finish your sleep, and quit dreaming in daylight. Did you know that I came down and tried to reason with that obstinate barnacle, your grandfather, who, as usual, flung his thirty years' experience here in my face?"

"You were worried about the sea, too," I said triumphantly, and watched him ride away. All that day I felt queer and uncanny. The wind still raged and the sea grew more threatening. I thought of the ships far out, and the sailors. I fancied the green, curling surf, peopled with poor drowned men, and how in far, sandy tide-inlets, they would lie unburied, lost to all who loved them. What an army they are too, followed with more miserable shadows of wrecked homes and hearts than all who went to wars, watched out of sight and recorded in a country's annals.

Digitized by Google

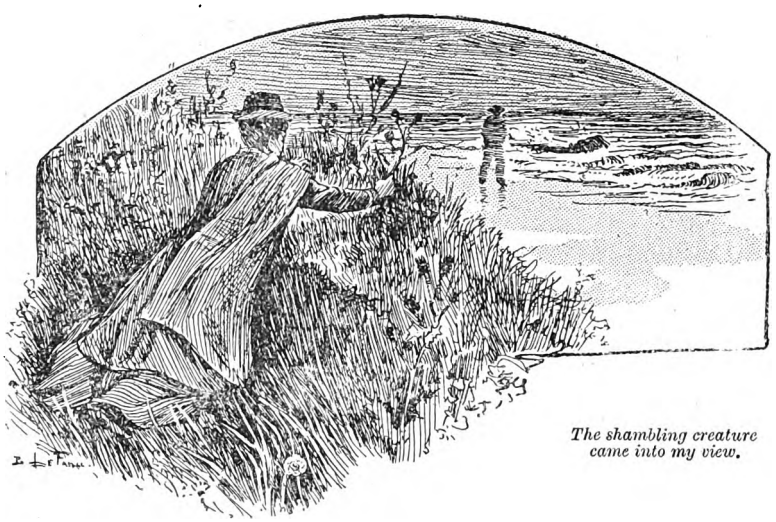
At last, forgetting all but my strange presentiments, I set out for Justina's cottage to get her to read the cards. There is no truth in it, I thought, as I went along, "but it is a comfort to know the red ones turn up and mean good fortunes. If spades should run, I don't think I could stand it."

When I reached her cottage, I found it locked: every window and the two doors. Even when she goes away she never fastens her door. Dear me, there is nothing in her house to tempt even a fellow-Mexican! I fancied I heard a faint cry when I tried the front door a second time, but the storm made such a noise, I might have been mistaken.

But as I stood there the queer feeling came back, and an unconquerable impulse to go into that house. I am not a coward—anyone can see that—so I went round to the back and forced a window. Do you know, I felt that Justina needed me, and yet they say she has no unusual powers, and is only a fraud!



The shambling creature came into my view.

The house was black and still, the curtains down; no one in the kitchen; in the front room I stumbled over something on the floor that sent me off my feet, shuddering with fear and horror. Trembling, and avoiding that thing, I went to the matchbox. I lit a candle. There, beside the table, sat Justina, bound hand and foot, and gagged—a horrible sight, with her black, swollen face and starting eyes. I set her free, cutting the tight cords that had scarred her flesh; then I dashed water in her face.

"Yara," she gasped, "he is gone to kill the man, Chica love."

To kill the man I loved! A great sob rose in my throat. "Justina," I cried, "listen—keep your senses. Be calm. Tell me, when did he start? Yara, when did he come?"

"This afternoon, he sit here and drink. I guess his dark thoughts. I watch him, and creep out—creep ever so softly to my Chica. I knew he meant to kill; but he caught me, dragged me here, left me this way. Oh, I have called my baby for hours; she came, my Chica! Oh, I lied about the trance! I did not do that. It was a fraud. The Colonel told him to tell you all about your sister. He hates the man you love. He wanted you to stab his heart. I am a wicked woman. You will have no masses said for Justina. Oh, say you will, Chica! let me die in peace—in peace." She raised herself from her seat, and clung convulsively to my knees.

Justina, bound hand and foot, and gagged.

"I will," I said, freeing myself, and then I went toward the door. "If that good man is killed, Justina, my heart will break. What can I do?"

"Yara went along the beach. He is lame," she gasped; "you are so quick, run along, get ahead, and warn Mr. Scott. Oh, Chica, have masses said for my soul, my wicked soul!"

I drew my cloak about me and started across the sand; then up to the street, where I ran like a mad woman. The fog, wet and grey, stung my face, as the wind hurled it along laden with sand, and the spray, as it dashed over the street, wet me and clung to me with dripping clots of foam. I saw faces at the windows as I passed; they must have wondered what it was, a spectre or a woman.

At last, a speck in the grey distance, I saw a limping figure, and I knew I was in time. Then, when I was far ahead, I turned down to the beach, for night was coming on and I might miss John in the darkness. I crouched behind a low sand-hill, where I might watch either way, and, as I waited the shambling creature came into my view, pushing steadily on to seek his prey. I thought he saw me, and, mad with fear, I ran back among the hills. I crept forward after that, starting at every water-rotted log. I thought every moment I might fall over him, lying hid and waiting.

Just where a deep creek crept in across the sand to the shore I saw a black object, and it moved. That was he, waiting there; he dared not run the risk of death in that deep inlet with its rushing tide, nor to wet the revolver he carried for his work. I went back a little way; the water ran so far into the land I dared not go to the end to cross. I must be near the assassin to do any good. I stepped into the water, with a little shiver of dread. I dared not think what a terrible current there was rushing back to the beach after each big wave, nor what frightful sea-monster might have been hurled in by a breaker, nor of that watching, hideous thing so near.

When the water reached my waist it lifted me off my feet, clinging to my wet garments like an octopus, giant-armed, reaching for its prey. I struggled ahead, but the force drew me to the wild sea where, at the mouth of the creek, great breakers fought a terrible battle with the out-going waves

To this maelstrom I floated helpless.

"I will reach land," I panted; "the sea shall not drown me. They say that never a Lombard lies there. They always died ashore, and they were all seafaring folks too. I, the last of the line, I will not drown."

Then as my strength failed, and I was near giving up the cruel struggle, a big wave seized me, whirled me about, and tossed me, light as thistle, down upon the sand. Staggering under my water-weighed garments, I ran ahead into the darkness, in the path I knew he must come. Hark, above the storm I heard the thud of a

Digitized by Google

"Letty!" he cried, and forced the horse up beside me.

horse's hoofs on the hard sand. He would ride me down, and go on unheeding.

"John," I cried, and the wind took up my cry, and carried it far from me with mocking delight. A great, dripping, panting thing came upon me, then swerved, as I stood there helpless.

"John," I called, "will you not hear? There must be some mercy in heaven!"

"Letty!" he cried, and forced the horse up beside me. "Letty! here! and I—I thought a dead woman called me."

"When I have risked my life to save you," I sobbed, "you thrust her memory between us."

He leaped from his horse and caught me in his arms. "Risked your life to save me, my darling, my best beloved!" and it did not seem his voice at all with all that fire in it. "My darling!" I heard him say that, and to a living woman, not a dead one. He flung off my dripping cape and wrapped his coat about me, while I told him in a few gasping words of that dreadful creature waiting there.

"It would have been kinder to let me die," he said; "shame on me for that speech. Oh, I am grateful to you, but," with his old laugh, "what shall I do with you? Poor little shivering thing. You will get your death. I don't know a house near here."

"Take me home, John, back across the land, not near that—that awful thing."

"But how? Dare you ride behind me? Don can carry two. He is wise and gentle, though he looks so fierce. Don, will you carry the brave little maid who saved your master's worthless life?"

He mounted the great plunging creature, then reached down his hands to me, the rein across his arm. How easily he lifted me clear from the ground, and calmed the frightened horse. I clung to him as the sea swept up against us and the wind roared in our faces. I could hold him there in the darkness and feel that I loved him. I wished I might never see the morrow, only to die that night, and never wake to know he did not care for me.

At last we turned again to the beach, and there, ahead, shone the light from our little cottage, a yellow gleam in the night; never so dear, so welcome to me before, for I felt my senses leaving me, and I wanted him to think me brave and strong. I felt that he lifted me down, and held me to his heart.

"I think I can walk," I faltered.

"I carried you years before, when you were a tiny baby. That gives me the right now, little heroine."

And then I did not know any more.

CHAPTER XIV.

I REMEMBER someone laid me on my bed, and Aunt Marg and Liz wept over me; then a delicious feeling of warmth and comfort came upon me; yet I seemed frozen to my heart; afterwards a sharp pain like the stab from a knife came in my breast, and I cried out in agony. Soon I could not think rationally, the room was whirling round, and I could see nothing distinctly. Once I recognised Aunt Marg, and asked her if someone had gone to Justina's, and she answered that John had.

"He never forgets to do a kindess," I cried. Then I forgot again, and seemed out on the sea-swept beach, facing the storm. It was very dark, and out of the shadows great queer things came and gibed at me, and long arms stretched themselves out to drag me into some horror I could not fathom. Many times Antonio came creeping by the bed, his wild eyes glittering, a long keen knife in his hand. Then Captain Dana, misty and pale, appeared and poured a white powder into wine. I screamed, "Do the dead come back to do murder, to be revenged on the living?"

Sometimes I was running along the sand, trying to overtake the shambling figure, but he was always just ahead. I could see him, but never gain on him; he would turn and leer at me, and wave his hand mockingly. Often I went to that lonely hut, and there sat Justina, with staring eyes and purple face, and she would curse me and say, "Chica, this is your work. You sent Yara here, and he has killed me."

Oh, those frightful dreams of the sea, when I struggled in the water, and great sea monsters came and dragged me down; wound slimy clutching arms about me and held me fast. They said afterwards I struggled terribly then, and only John could hold me.

One day, however, the weight seemed lifted off my chest, and my head was clear, but I was too weak to lift my hand.

"Is she better?" said John's voice; and Aunt Marg, who must have been sitting by me, rose and answered there was hope. He came to me, lifted my hand in his warm palm, and held it.

"John," said Aunt Marg—and how far away her voice sounded!—"I think that you love our little Violet."

"Margaret," he cried brokenly, "don't talk to me of love. If she were dearer to me than my life I would never tell her so. It would be a crime to link her fate with mine after my past. No good could come of such a union. My best love was given to Katherine—is hers yet; I would not cheat this child with a mockery of affection. Some day she will meet someone near her age, and be happy with him. She is my sister, and I will be her brother my life long."

Oh, how I struggled! At last my heavy lids opened, and the words came. "Only a little while, John; if you do not love me, I shall die."

I said I would not live, but I did. I came back to health by slow steps—long days of weakness, then a greed for food, and a fierce distaste for my bed and the narrow confines of my room. How beautiful those autumn days were to me! for I had been shut up nearly two months. When I could go downstairs, how good they all were! John sent flowers daily, and my room was a garden.

I could lie on a sofa and look on the blue sea, the flying clouds, the tiny white sails in the distance, and be glad of just living. After all, the sunlight and free air are better than cold unknown death, our land dearer than the unexplored country. I was very penitent with Justina, but she, good soul, never remembered my unkindness. She would come and kiss my hand and cry over me.

"The angels did not get Chica," she would say; "old Justina's prayers were heard by the blessed saints!" She seemed as if she had entered into a compact with the blessed saints to outwit the angels and to rejoice in it. I was too weak to try to tease her. I only said, "I thought the angels were not particularly anxious to have me I have not been a shining light on earth."

Aunt Marg was very sweet and good during the days of my convalescence. She even tried to gather the gossip of the neighbourhood that she might entertain me. She made me the prettiest blue wrapper, and used to brush my hair, cut short now, and curling in little rings all over my head, and tell me I was better looking than ever.

Digitized by Google

"As if I cared," I said, mournfully one day, when she was sitting beside me; and indeed I hardly ever looked in the glass now. "You never mentioned that Mexican, Aunt Marg, in your news; where is he?"

"He was drowned, dear. He must have waited by the creek until very late, and not knowing the beach, wandered too close to the sea. They found him on the sand when the waves went down; no one identified him, and he was buried among the unknown dead."

"I am glad he died thus," I said; "I am so weary of other—other deaths," I finished evasively; then I thought of her goodness, and how my speech must have hurt her. "Aunt Marg," I cried, penitently, "if you had ever showed you cared so much for me, how I should have loved you! But you always held me at arm's length."

"I have been afraid," she stammered, "of my own unworthiness of innocent love, and of attaching myself to one who might hurt me cruelly. My life has made me bitter, Letty."

I looked at her sweet face framed in its snowy hair. "You could not be bitter if you tried, Aunt Marg; tell me, was I very crazy when I was ill."

"You talked most of the time very wildly."

"Of what?"

"Sea-monsters, wicked men, your Mexican protegé, and other things," she answered.

"Did I scream and fight them?"

"Sometimes."

"Who held me?"

"John."

"Me! In my nightgown!" I said wickedly. "No wonder you blush!" But I did not, I had not the grace to. "I should think that his dear Katherine's memory would have made taking care of me very trying to him."

"Katherine was your sister, dear."

"Only half, I'm glad to say," I answered, thumping my pillow. "Now, Liz said I told everything when I was out of my head, and as I don't know all of that story, and John said you should tell me, you ought to, straight away; and before you begin, I assure you I know a great deal about Katherine, and I am very sorry she was any relation of mine."

"I have sometimes thought," said Aunt Marg, folding her thin white hands and looking out on the sea, "that the possession of such beauty as Katherine had makes a woman heartless. She is so surrounded by flattery all her life, she fails to gain any of the finer attributes of womanly goodness forced on plainer women or born in them.

"It was so with your father, Paul Lombard. He could win hearts so easily, he cared little for them afterward. When he came to San Antonio, where I lived with my invalid father and my sister Mary, I hated him. It's odd to say that to you, dear, but I must tell my story in my own way. Yet he won my father, he was so handsome, so reckless and merry, and my sister grew to love him; and though I strove with all my might to prevent it, they were married at my father's death-bed. Mary was so used to me—she always leaned on a stronger will—I had not the heart to leave her, and I went to Galveston with her and her husband. I will say of Paul that he forgave the past and was always kind to me.

"Katherine was about fifteen then, but marvellously matured in mind and body. Girls of southern blood become women so early. She was very wild and headstrong, and quarrelled with your grandfather all the time. I loved her in a short time, she was so brilliant and merry, and I was a quiet, sober sort of a girl. I never had any childhood. She was engaged to Dean Gregory then, and I used to carry notes for them, and wait on Katherine like a slave. Dean had to be secret in his courtship, for his mother did not like Katherine, and would never hear of her marrying her son. Her husband was mining in Mexico most of the time, and we thought Dean went there to be with him; afterward I knew differently.

"They always thought Doctor Scott would leave Dean some of his property; but just before the Doctor died there was a story about Dean and a quadroon girl, and the doctor, being a northern man, looked on such things with horror, so Dean was left out of the will. Dean always blamed John, but John never even knew about it. When Katherine found Dean would have no money she grew cold to him, though I think she cared a great deal for him; and one day she married John Scott, and I did not even know a thing about it, when she and I were such friends. He was madly in love with her.

"When rumours of the war came, John made up his mind to go to Mexico. Texas was in a fever, every man against his neighbour, and John had promised his father on his death-bed never to fight against the north. Mrs. Scott was a Southerner, and that tied John's hands from going into the Federal Army. He could not fight against his own kin, he was so young. In the midst of such imposing forces, he did the wisest thing; he left the country.

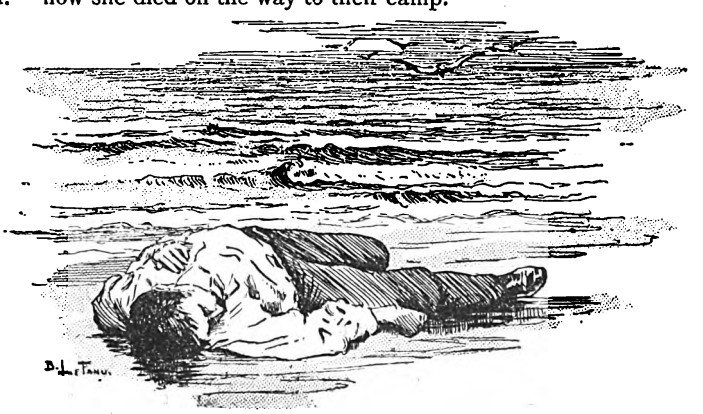
"Doctor Scott owned a great deal of property in Mexico, and John went there. When your father heard of his going, he wanted to join the party, and that led to others going. You know the rest; all that Yara told you was true. Justina confessed everything when you were ill. From what I know now, I am sure Katherine wrote to Dean after her marriage. She still cared for him, and she never loved John. When she made that wicked plan for Dean to take her away, she never dreamed of the terrible results. No woman could be so wicked, so utterly heartless.

"That day the trouble came, we were camped by a little stream bordered by mesquite trees; and as our horses were footsore we made quite a stay. We saw some Mexicans along our route, but no Indians, so we were at ease about danger; afterwards I knew those men belonged to Xarras' band. Even some of our servants were his men, and they all ran away when they were most needed.

"I wonder sometimes why I, of all the others, was saved. It was so curious, too; for all the reason I went to walk that day was because I was angry at the journey, at Katherine's rudeness to me, at my sister Mary's husband for taking her and her young baby on such a fool's errand. I remember I put you to sleep and made Mary comfortable—she was never strong, and the long journey wearied her sadly—and then I went away from the camp to fight my battle alone.

"I was calmer when I turned back; resolved, no matter what hardships came, to be true to Mary and stay by her; when my thoughts were rudely broken by the sound of shots, and then women's cries—such terrible ones! I crept close to the camp, and there, crossing the stream, were eight men on horseback rudely disguised as Indians. I knew them, every-one. I never forget faces, and all those men I had spoken with on our way; two of our servants were among them.

"Your father ran out at the first shot. It was meant to alarm the watcher. Antonio, the man you pitied, killed your father as he ran out of his tent, and, as he fell forward on his face, turned and shot him again in the back. Mary, with you, a three months' old baby, in her arms, ran to her husband, and one man seized her, flung you on the ground, and thrust her into a waggon. Mercifully she had fainted. I know now she died on the way to their camp.



They found him on the sand when the waves went down.

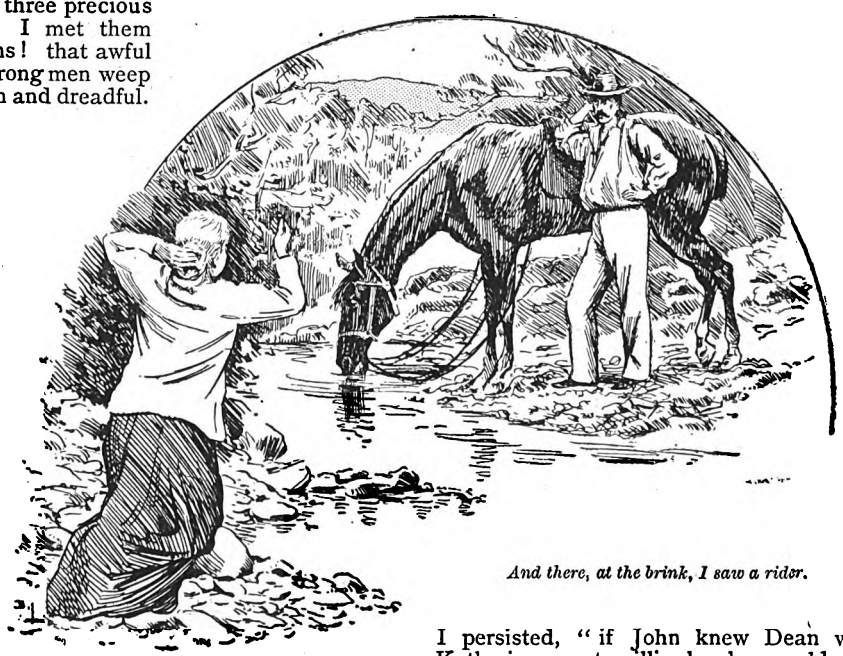
Digitized by Google

"I saw Katherine mount a horse, not one look of pity on her beautiful face; and then she and Xarras rode ahead, while the rest of the women, bound and gagged, were loaded into a waggon to which four of our horses were harnessed, and then they all crossed the river, disappearing at a gallop. When I think of that scene—the brutality of those men to helpless women, the horrors afterward—I could almost wish I might give them the poisoned cup myself.

"You may have judged Captain Dana harshly, but his wife and daughter were there, and he never saw them again. I have been blamed for not coming forward; called a coward; accused of collusion with Katherine; of every cruel thing, by those men in their agony. They know now, when my life has been one long martyrdom, that I was innocent of wrong. I dared not move, and then I thought of you, helpless and so dear to me. If a wild animal came, and there were many of them in that country, what a horrible fate would come to you! It might be hours before the men came back. I could save you, and I did.

"When the Mexicans had disappeared across the plain in a cloud of dust, I crept from my hiding place, seized you, and with the strength of desperation ran in the direction our men had gone.

"It was three hours, three precious hours to them, before I met them returning. Oh, heavens! that awful scene! I never saw strong men weep before, nor look so stern and dreadful. As I finished my story, one young man, not married a month, bared his arm and cut a great cross in the quivering flesh; holding up his dripping knife, he made all those men swear a fearful oath of extermination, and it was carried out. He never lived for his vengeance, but died in a madhouse, after a year of hopeless search; but one man hunted every assassin down, one man's courage and patience never failed.



And there, at the brink, I saw a rider.

"They rode on at a gallop, the dogs after them, and I toiled back to the camp with you. All that terrible night you wept and wailed, and I could do nothing for you. I was alone in that dreary place, where only a dead man lay face downward as he fell; for there was none to care for the dead, when the living were in such need. Alone in that desert land, the trees rustled like ghostly assassins, the very moonlight shadows drove me mad, with fear of creeping men returning to make their work more sure, to kill the witness of it all.

"In the grey dawn, the dogs, limping and weary, came back. and your father's Gordon setter lay down by him, and once in a while would rise and howl, a dreary dreadful cry that quivered along the empty distance, bringing ghastly echoes back to mock us. I knew my brain was giving way. I could not think. I only cried: 'Margaret, the child will die if you do not keep calm, if you have not reason.'

"I went to the river, bathed my face, and flung handfuls of water over my burning forehead. And there, at the brink, I saw a rider, and I had no strength to fly, even if he were an enemy. Oh, heavens! I did not know him at first. That awful mad-eyed, haggard face; the bloodless lips; the terrible look! His tired steed drank greedily at the stream, and then the rider's dazed eyes saw me.

"'John, I am not a ghost,' I cried; 'why do you look at me so, as if you saw some horror? I am Margaret.'

"Then he answered with a groan of agony, 'Margaret, your hair is as white as snow.'"

"Aunt Marg," I sobbed, "tell me no more. Tell me no more. Oh, my miserable life! My treachery to you! I cannot, cannot bear it. I, too, could kill. There was justice in those murders. And think of my treatment to you, my coldness, and my want of gratitude! Oh, can you ever forget and forgive?"

"My dear, I love you; I always did, even when I feared you might be like her, and then I dared not care for you." She took my head upon her breast, tenderly smoothing my burning face. "It has been too much for you, my dear, but this is the end. Ah, that I could have told you years before, but I had to keep my oath of silence. John came back to take me to San Antonio, and on the way we met Justina, and through her you lived.

"For a year I was crazy, in an asylum, dear, and you can understand what a scene that was, to turn a strong-headed, clear-brained woman as I was into a maniac. When I recovered I learned that the search had been unsuccessful, though John had spent thousands and hired an army of men in the pursuit. Then, when they reproached him, as men will at such times, for taking them to such a spot, he swore to devote his life to that pursuit and bring every Mexican to justice, and he kept his oath.

"Yara told those men at first of Katherine's complicity, but John was never informed. They feared he might cease his ardour or turn his hatred only to one man, and forsake their cause. No Mexican told that Xarras was Dean Gregory, for they were faithful to him and must have loved him. All those poor women found happy release in death, and we have learned their sufferings were short. Two took their own lives. I cannot speak any more, Letty; it is too dreadful."

"But Aunt Marg," I persisted, "if John knew Dean was Xarras, and that Katherine went willingly, he would still keep his oath to murder."

"I fear he would."

I lifted my face and kissed her, a long silent kiss.

Two hours afterwards grandfather came in. I had been thinking all that time how to escape from the tangled path and be out in the sunlight again.

"I want you to go to Dean Gregory, grandfather—he is here—and tell him I must see him."

"It's hard to be led by a third generation," he grumbled, "but 'wisdom from babes,' I s'pose; but I tell ye frankly, Letty, I hate him."

"Not more than I do," I answered; and that very evening Liz, looking cross and worried, came to tell me Dean Gregory was at the door, waiting to see me.

(To be continued next week.)

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Six Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

LADS AND LASSES AT SCHOOL.

WHEN I was a lad at school. How long ago is that? Men whose beards are getting full of the sort of frost that does not thaw in the spring may love to gossip about the past, but they do not love to think of it when alone. Oh, the infinite pathos, penitence and heartbreak of that appealing line in Cardinal Newman's "Lead, Kindly Light,"—"Remember not past years." Like spilled water, memory spreads unpleasantly when let go.

What I want to recall now is whether my school-days were my happiest, healthiest days. The facts show clear through the mists, and the answer is, No. The writer came of a sound stock, and was well cared for, yet his greatest pains and most frequent and dangerous illnesses were when he was a lad at school. I do not affirm this to be the rule with boys, but it was so, without especial reason, with me.

And here is another man who says: "All my life, even as a lad at school, I suffered from illness. I had dizziness, violent headaches, nausea, and saw spots floating before my eyes. Sometimes I vomited a greenish-yellow fatty matter, and again was qualmish and sick without vomiting. While in my teens and up to manhood I had bilious attacks every week, more or less severe. At times I felt fairly well, and then would be taken with cold shivers, and obliged to go to bed. During each attack my appetite left me, and I could touch no food whatever. Often would I come home from my work and sit down to my dinner without taking a mouthful.

"As time went on, although I was muscularly stronger, I felt a great strain on my nervous system, oppression and soreness in the head, and pain and heat behind the eyes. I felt tired and low-spirited, and got but little rest at night."

The writer's next sentence should stand by itself, like a monument. [The printer will please set it in italics.]

"In this way I continued better and worse for over thirty-four years, and what I suffered none can imagine."

Let the reader try to round up that statement in his mind and see how large a fact it is, and what a lesson it teaches.

The witness proceeds: "I underwent every sort of medical treatment and took every medicine that I heard of, but they all left me in a short time as bad as ever.

"In May, 1890, a cousin of mine, Joseph Pyke, of York, West Australia, paid us a visit and mentioned what Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup had done for him when similarly afflicted in Australia. For a time I refused to try it, but being at my wits' end, I got a bottle from Mr. Frank May's store in Friar Street, and began using it. The contents of that single bottle relieved me, and I kept on with the medicine in faith and hope.

"Soon all my ailments vanished, and from that time to this I have been in good health, for which my thanks are due to Mother Seigel. Her remedy it is that has built me up, and made me stronger and more energetic than I have been for many, many years. Had I known of it earlier how much misery I might have avoided. I have worked for Messrs. Huntley and Palmer, Biscuit Manufacturers, Reading, for 39 years, and am still in their employ.—Yours truly, (Signed) Charles Pyke, 16, York Place, Chatham Street, Reading. October 25th, 1892."

What now are we to conclude from Mr. Pyke's experience? You see, of course, the meaning of it; that disease does its most damaging work among the young. The great majority of the human race die in childhood. The fittest, that is, the strongest, survive, just as Darwin says. We fellows with the frosty beards were able to fight through, and beat the diseases, the drugs, and the doctors. The weaklings fell and were buried. Next, parents don't watch the ills of their children with half an eye. Age and maturity are blind and selfish. It is the chicks that need care and protection. If our friend at Reading had met with Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup in boyhood—but, alas! it was not in existence then. It is to be had now, however, and if there are many pained and suffering children, who is to blame? Answer us that.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALACE STEAMERS. PARIS AND BACK FOR A GUINEA.
BOULOGNE AND BACK for 10s. 6d.

LA MARGUERITE. FINEST and FASTEST STEAMER in the WORLD.
SPEED, 25 MILES AN HOUR.

"Certainly a glass of water at the stem or sternpost would have done the round to Boulogne and Back, and not much be spilt of it."—FAIRPLAY, June 29th, 1894.

BOULOGNE and BACK DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted), by LA MARGUERITE.

PARIS and BACK, Saturday to Monday for 21s., other days 26s. return, By LA MARGUERITE.

MARGATE and BACK, DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted).

SIX HOURS ASHORE AT MARGATE for 5s. 6d. by LA MARGUERITE.

Passengers can Return by the ROYAL SOVEREIGN at their option.

Cook's Hotel Coupon Tickets may be obtained for all places.

TIMES OF SAILINGS (Weather and other circumstances permitting).

Leaving	Week days.	Sundays.
FENCHURCH STREET (by Special Train to Tilbury Pier) ..	8.38 ..	8.55
TILBURY (Gravesend) ..	9.30 ..	10. 0
	Noon.	p.m.
Margate .. About	12. 0 ..	12.30
Arriving.	p.m.
Boulogne .. ,,	2.30 ..	3. 0
Returning.	p.m.	p.m.
Boulogne .. ,,	3.30 ..	3.30
Margate .. ,,	6. 0 ..	6. 0
TILBURY (Special Train awaits Steamer) .. ,,	8.45 ..	8.45

Arriving at Fenchurch Street Station (City) 9.35 p.m.

All passengers disembark at Tilbury and travel by train to Fenchurch Street.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN, DAILY, at 9.30 a.m. (except Fridays, on which day LA MARGUERITE will run as usual), from Old Swan Pier, London Bridge, calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch-street Station 10.28 a.m. in connection. Tender steamer Greenwich 9.25, Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Passengers can return by LA MARGUERITE. Offices, 33, King William Street, London Bridge, E.C.

VICTORIA STEAMERS. (Weather and other circumstances permitting.)
CLACTON, HARWICH, and Back, IPSWICH, FELIXSTOWE, by KOH-I-NOOR DAILY (Fridays excepted), from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch-street 10.15 a.m. in connection. Tender Greenwich, 9.25 a.m.; Blackwall, 9.35 a.m.

YARMOUTH and LOWESTOFT, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.10 a.m., by KOH-I-NOOR to HARWICH, thence by Palace Steamer VICTORIA.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND from Old Swan Pier, at 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m. DAILY (except Friday), calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich.

HAMPTON COURT, by CARDINAL WOLSEY, DAILY, at 10.0 a.m., from Old Swan Pier.

KEW GARDENS, BATTERSEA, and GREENWICH PARKS, frequently.

TOWER BRIDGE can be seen best by steamers from Old Swan Pier, every half hour.
Through bookings to all District Railway Stations.
Offices, Victoria House, Laurence Pountney Lane, E.C.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 293.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 11, 1894. [Price One Penny.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS.

4/- EACH — LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. — 4/- EACH.

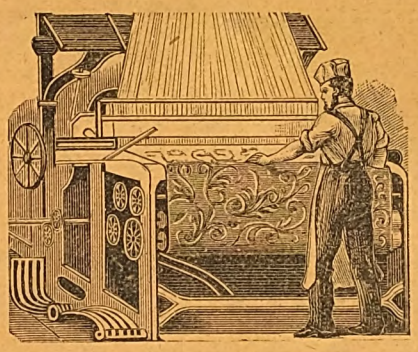
THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 stamps, we will forward direct from our looms to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.



GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says: "unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our Customers:

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.

M. Lock writes:—"I received the Carpets, Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.

Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. Hargreaves.

Established 1872. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY,

31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

PALACE STEAMERS. PARIS AND BACK FOR A GUINEA.
BOULOGNE AND BACK for 10s. 6d.

LA MARGUERITE. FINEST and FASTEST STEAMER in the WORLD.
SPEED, 25 MILES AN HOUR.

BOULOGNE and BACK DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted), by LA MARGUERITE.

PARIS and BACK, Saturday to Monday for 21s., other days 26s. return,
By LA MARGUERITE.

MARGATE and BACK, DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted).

SIX HOURS ASHORE AT MARGATE for 5s. 6d. by LA MARGUERITE.

Passengers can Return by the ROYAL SOVEREIGN at their option.

Cook's Hotel Coupon Tickets may be obtained for all places.

TIMES OF SAILINGS (Weather and other circumstances permitting).

Leaving	Week days.	Sundays.
FENCHURCH STREET (by Special Train to Tilbury Pier) ..	8.38 ..	8.55
TILBURY (Gravesend)	9.30 ..	10. 0
	Noon.	p.m.
Margate .....About	12. 0 ..	12.30
Arriving.	p.m.
Boulogne ..... ,,	2.30 ..	3. 0
Returning.	p.m.	p.m.
Boulogne ..... ,,	3.30 ..	3.30
Margate ..... ,,	6. 0 ..	6. 0
TILBURY (Special Train awaits Steamer) ..... ,,	8.45 ..	8.45

Arriving at Fenchurch Street Station (City) 9.35 p.m.

All passengers disembark at Tilbury and travel by train to Fenchurch Street.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN, DAILY, at 9.30 a.m. (except Fridays, on which day LA MARGUERITE will run as usual), from Old Swan Pier, London Bridge, calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch Street Station 10.28 a.m. in connection. Tender steamer Greenwich 9.25, Blackwall 9.35 a.m.
Margate Passengers can return by LA MARGUERITE.

VICTORIA STEAMERS. (Weather and other circumstances permitting.)
CLACTON, HARWICH, and Back, YARMOUTH, LOWESTOFT, IPSWICH, and FELIXSTOWE, by KOH-I-NOOR DAILY (Fridays excepted), from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch Street 10.15 a.m. in connection. Tender Greenwich 9.25 a.m., Blackwall 9.35 a.m.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND from Old Swan Pier, at 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m. DAILY (except Friday), calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich.

HAMPTON COURT, by CARDINAL WOLSEY, DAILY, at 10.0 a.m., from Old Swan Pier.

KEW GARDENS, BATTERSEA, and GREENWICH PARKS, frequently.

Offices—VICTORIA HOUSE, LAURENCE POUNTNEY LANE, E.C.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 293.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING AUGUST 11, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Zuma

TOWARD the middle of the seventeenth century the animosity of the Peruvian Indians against the Spaniards still existed in all its energy; traditions only too faithful preserved among this oppressed and down-trodden people the frightful remembrance of the cruelty of their conquerors. They were conquered, but not submissive.

At this time a Viceroy, more cruel than any of his predecessors, filled the measure of their hate. His secretary, a hard and avaricious man, hated even more than his master, suddenly died, and it was universally believed that he had been poisoned by the Indians. It was well known that they were acquainted with the most deadly poisons, and more than once they had been convicted of using them, but neither torture nor death could make them confess their guilt.

In the meanwhile the Viceroy was recalled, and in his place the Count de Cinchon was appointed. The Count, gifted with the most amiable qualities, and with every virtue that could conciliate the mind and win the heart, had just married a young and charming wife.

The Countess was anxious to accompany her husband, but, fearing the hate and perfidy of the Indians, he decided to leave her in Spain. The thought of her husband's exposure to such peril, however, determined the Countess to follow him to the New World. She took with her several ladies, who were to compose her Court at Lima. Among them was her dearest friend, Donna Beatrice.

The Indians, delighted to be rid of their Viceroy, were no better disposed toward his successor; he was a Spaniard, and consequently they expected from him only injustice, greed, and tyranny. In vain they were told that the Count de Cinchon was humane and just; they repeated, "He is a Spaniard." This word to them said all that the most energetic hate could express. It was evident that the conquerors had failed to impress upon the natives the sublime moral of religion; they had been induced to practise a few external observations, but in their hearts they cherished all of their old superstitions and their idolatry.

The Spaniards little suspected the secret vengeance which the Indians in their misery, cherished. They had been forced to give up to their oppressors their gold and precious stones, but they still retained their greatest treasures, in the wonderful antidotes against poison which Providence had given them, and above all, in the bark of the quinquinna tree, of the properties of which they alone knew the secret, and which they had engaged by the most solemn oaths, frequently renewed, never to reveal.

Since the early days of slavery, the Indians had preserved a kind of interior government; they appointed chiefs, whose duty it was to assemble their people from time to time in some wild place, inaccessible to Europeans, where each renewed his own vows of secrecy and hate of the Spaniards. The Indians outside the city had far more freedom than those engaged on the public works, or those in the service of the Viceroy's palace; and they never failed to attend the midnight assemblies, which they regarded as their sole resource against tyranny.

Their principal chief (for there were several) was Ximeo, a man naturally noble and generous; but, from continual brooding over the wrongs of his people, his heart had closed to every sweet and tender emotion. Ximeo had one son, named Mirvan, who had inherited his father's nobility of mind, as well as his hatred of the Spaniards; he had married Zuma, the belle of the environs of Lima, and they had one child, a boy two years old.

Another chief, Azan, was second only to Ximeo in his influence over the Indians. Azan was cruel and vindictive; no virtue tempered the fury with which he always seemed animated. These two chiefs had a most illustrious origin, and were descended from the royal race of Incas.

A few days after the arrival of the new Viceroy, Ximeo appointed for the following night a meeting on the hill of the "tree of health," as they designated the quinquinna tree, and when they were all assembled he said, "Friends, a new tyrant is to reign over us, unhappy Children of the Sun, who are forced to envelop ourselves in darkness in order to renew the oaths of a just vengeance. Let us repeat around the 'tree of health' the terrible formula which engages us for ever to conceal our secrets."

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

In a loud, firm tone Ximeo then cried: "We swear never to reveal to the Europeans the divine virtues of this sacred tree, the sole treasure which is left us! Woe to the faithless and perjured Indian who, seduced by fear or weakness, would reveal this secret to the destroyer of his gods, of his sovereigns, and of his country! Woe to the coward who would give this precious possession to the barbarians who have enslaved us, who have enslaved our lands, and who have shed the blood of our fathers, after making them suffer unheard of tortures! Let them keep the gold which they covet, but let us preserve this gift from heaven!

"If a traitor be found among us, let us swear to pursue him, and to destroy him, though he be our father, our brother, our son! Let us swear if he be married, to pursue his wife and children, if they have not already denounced him, and to sacrifice them that his race may become extinct. Friends, do you all renew these oaths which your forefathers made, and which you have pronounced so often?"

"Yes, yes!" shouted the Indians. "We swear to keep these secrets with inviolable fidelity, and to suffer, if necessary, the most frightful torments and death, rather than reveal them."

The Vice-Queen, on her arrival at the gate of Lima, was met by a crowd of young Indian girls, carrying baskets of flowers. Zuma was their leader, and the Countess was so struck with her beauty, her grace, and the lovely expression of her face, that, a few days later, the young Indian was appointed to the service of the palace, and later to that of the Countess's person. This favour seemed most imprudent to Donna Beatrice, whose love for the Vice-Queen made her listen only too willingly to the stories of the perfidy of the Indians. She not only believed all that was told her, but in her anxiety she conceived the greatest aversion to Zuma, which became stronger when it was found impossible to prejudice the Countess against her.

The Vice-Queen daily grew more fond of the object of so much calumny and injustice. Zuma, on her side, had the tenderest affection for the Vice-Queen, but, in order to avoid disagreeable scenes, she kept in her own rooms unless the Countess required her presence.

In the meantime the Viceroy spared nothing in his endeavour to win the confidence of the Indians; but they had seen many viceroys in the beginning of their reigns display the same amiability and justice, so that the real goodness of the Count made no impression. It was looked upon as duplicity, or as weakness caused by the terror which the secretary's sudden death had inspired.

The Countess had been in Lima four months, when her health began to fail. At first it was attributed to the heat of the climate, but her sufferings increased daily, so that the greatest anxiety was felt; then she was suddenly seized with a violent fever. Every known remedy was used without effect. The distress of Donna Beatrice knew no bounds; she questioned the physician who had accompanied them from Spain, and he, feeling his skill baffled, spoke mysteriously, and implied some extraordinary cause. His manner, his reticence, gave Beatrice the horrible idea that her friend was dying of a slow poison. From that moment she knew no repose.

Though she carefully concealed her suspicions from the Countess, and even from the Count, it was impossible to do so from the two ladies-in-waiting, who strengthened them. But who could have committed this awful crime? No other than Zuma; Zuma, who entered the apartments of the Vice-Queen at all hours. But after having been treated with so much kindness and affection by the Countess, how could she commit such an atrocity? Zuma was "hypocritical, vain, ambitious," said the envious. In short, she was an Indian, and familiar with the darkest crimes.

During all these agitations, Zuma thought only of the Vice-Queen, whom she loved with the sincerity of a pure and grateful heart. She was deeply grieved that, although she knew of an infallible cure for the fever which was consuming her mistress, it was impossible to give it to her. Zuma knew only too well the terrible oaths by which the Indians had bound themselves never to reveal the secret. If only her own life had depended upon her speaking, she would not have hesitated for a moment; but this revelation would devote her husband and her child to certain death. Moreover, Ximeo, in order to assure himself of her discretion, had taken her little one as a hostage and placed him in the hands of the cruel Azan.

In the meanwhile the invalid grew worse; the fever, which had somewhat abated for a while, returned with renewed violence, and the physician admitted that he feared the Countess would not be able to resist the disease. Consternation was universal in the palace. The Vice-Queen, fully aware of her condition, showed the greatest courage and piety. She received the Sacrament, bade her friends farewell, and commended to her husband the happiness of the Indians, especially that of her dear Zuma. These duties performed, she calmly awaited death. Zuma, whose health had failed sensibly during the past three months, on witnessing the pathetic scene, was overcome, and that very evening was taken with the same disease of which the Countess was dying—the tierce fever.

Alarmed at her condition, Mirvan, with the consent of the Indians, secretly carried to his wife the precious powder which was to cure her; but only one dose, which he was to renew each day. Zuma received in the morning the first, which she was to take in the evening.

When she was alone, she looked at the powder; her tears flowed, and, raising her eyes to heaven, "Great God," she cried, "it is Thou who inspirest me! I can save her only by sacrificing myself; my part is taken. I will not reveal the secret; besides, they will not suspect such devotion, and they will attribute the recovery of my dear mistress to the medicines of the physician. I shall expose neither Mirvan nor my son, and I shall not have betrayed our oaths. I shall die, but she will live. Of what importance is the life of poor Zuma? How much more precious that of this child of heaven, the generous benefactress of the poor slave! Have I not just now heard her failing voice pray for the cruel Indians who leave her to die? Oh, my dearest mistress! Amid the shadows of death thou hast not forgotten thy faithful Zuma. I have heard thee pronounce her name and bless it. Yes, I swear by the sacred light of the sun, I swear to save thee!"

Zuma then carefully wrapped up the precious quinquinna powder, placed it in her bosom, and considered the means by which she might enter the cabinet where the medicines of the countess were kept. She had no idea of the horrible suspicions formed against her, nor that precautions had been taken to keep her, as well as all the other Indians, from this room. She believed that, since the Vice-Queen's illness, the Spanish ladies reserved to themselves exclusively the service of the interior, through zeal and jealousy, or by one of those customs which they called etiquette. She decided to go into this cabinet in the evening, when she would find only one attendant, who would probably be asleep; in the contrary case, she would say that her anxiety forced her to come to make inquiries of the invalid's state. At the same time, wishing to find out if it would be possible to enter without passing through the apartment of the countess, she descended into a long corridor, which she carefully examined; she saw that a little door opened into this corridor, just as she had imagined, and that the key was in the lock. She made up her mind to enter in the night on this side, and then she returned to her room.

All of Zuma's movements were carefully watched, and Donna Beatrice was told that in the morning Mirvan had visited his wife, leaving her apartment under great excitement—that later, Zuma had descended the stairs, and going through the corridor, had carefully examined the doors, stopping finally at the cabinet; then she had hastily returned to her room. Beatrice instantly divined that Zuma intended to slip into the cabinet in the evening. The women-in-waiting were ordered to watch the moment when the young Indian left her chamber, to leave the cabinet empty and the key in the door. Then Beatrice went to inform the Viceroy. Without adopting her suspicions, he was, nevertheless, very much agitated, and agreed to conceal himself with her to watch further developments.

Digitized by Google

During the evening, Beatrice was told that Zuma was stealthily coming down the staircase in the dim light. The watchers quickly concealed themselves. Presently, they heard the door of the cabinet softly open and Zuma appeared. She was pale and trembling, walking slowly and with great effort. She first listened at the door which opened into the apartment of the Countess. All was quiet. Then Zuma approached the table on which stood a glass containing the medicine of the Countess; into this she emptied the quinquinna powder. Immediately the horrified Viceroy sprang from the cabinet, crying, "Wretch, what have you done? What have you put into that glass?"

At this appearance, and upon hearing this question in such a frightful voice, the terror-stricken Zuma fell, saying, "I am lost!" She had fainted. They carried her to her room. The Count and Donna Beatrice decided that they would conceal the intended crime from the Vice-Queen. "She would ask pardon for this monster," said Count de Cinchon, "and nothing on earth would make me grant it. An example is necessary, and I will make it."

The report was instantly spread through the palace and the city that Zuma was accused of having attempted to poison the Vice-Queen. That same evening she was taken to prison.

Mirvan on hearing the report went to find Azan. "You have my son in your power," said he. "At least promise me that, if we guard the secret faithfully, you will, after our death, give up the child to my father."

"I swear it," replied Azan, "but be assured that the least indiscretion will cost him his life."

"We shall know how to die," said Mirvan.

He then left the fierce Indian, and voluntarily gave himself up as a prisoner. He had at once divined Zuma's intention, but he could justify her only by giving up their child to the rage of the fierce Azan. He resolved, therefore, to die with his unhappy wife.

At daybreak the council assembled to examine and judge the prisoners. The doors of the great hall were opened, and it was announced to the Indians that they were permitted to enter. They came in great numbers with their secret chiefs, Ximeo, Azan, and Thamir. Mirvan and Zuma were led in, both of them loaded with chains. Zuma, on seeing Mirvan, cried out: "Oh, he is not guilty! He had no share in what I did. He was entirely ignorant of my purpose."

Into this she emptied powder.

"Stop, Zuma," interrupted her husband. "Thy death is certain. Canst thou think of preserving my life? I am not accused, but I share thy fate. Zuma, let us die with courage, and our child will live."

Zuma comprehended the true sense of these words and said nothing.

The examination began. Zuma would not deny the act which both Beatrice and the Viceroy had witnessed. She was asked from whom she had received the powder which she put into the draught.

"She received it from me," said Mirvan.

Zuma denied this, affirming anew that her husband was ignorant of her intention.

"And what was your intention?" they demanded.

"It was not to poison the Vice-Queen."

"Why then did you use the powder? Did you believe that you were using a salutary remedy?"

At this question Zuma trembled. Her eyes met those of the savage Azan, whose threatening glance filled her heart with terror. In imagination she saw him murdering her child.

"No, no!" said she with a vacant look. "No, I cannot say that it was a salutary remedy."

"It was poison then? You confess it?"

"I confess nothing."

Then Ximeo came forward and placed himself between the husband and wife, saying: "Let them put me in the chains also; I will die with my children."

"Oh, my father, live for our little one!" exclaimed Mirvan and Zuma together.

But Ximeo persisted.

The judges had received orders not to use torture nor to seek accomplices. They removed Ximeo, and led the unfortunate pair back to prison. The physician of the Countess was examined; he declared that the Vice-Queen's malady had resisted the most powerful remedies, that it was attended by the most extraordinary symptoms, so that he could not avoid having suspicions; that the action of Zuma, leaving no doubt of the atrocity of her design, had confirmed his opinion that this wicked slave had been giving the Countess a slow poison; and that, later, finding herself excluded from the service of the chamber, and fearing that the youth of the Vice-Queen and the care with which she was guarded would triumph over a slow poison, she had endeavoured to consummate her crime by a strong dose. At this evidence the judges shuddered with horror, and at once condemned the prisoners to be burned at the stake that very day at noon.

They were brought back into the hall to hear their sentence. Mirvan showed a heroic firmness. Zuma threw herself at his feet, saying, "I am thy destroyer! That is my only grief. Oh! forgive me!"

"Stop!" he replied. "Accuse only the cruelty of our judges! Console thyself, Zuma. The tyrants who condemn us deliver us from a frightful yoke. In a few hours we shall no longer be their slaves."

These words moved even the hard heart of Azan. "Mirvan!" he cried, "have no fear for thy son; he shall be dearer to me than if he were my own."

It was nine o'clock in the morning; orders were given to prepare the stakes. The Vice-Queen was dying; the physician informed the Viceroy that it was impossible for the Countess to endure a third attack of fever. The Count, in the depths of despair, could not think of mercy.

The Count, unwilling to remain in Lima during the execution, rode out to a country house a few miles from the city, intending to return in the evening.

The unhappy Ximeo in vain revolved in his mind a thousand projects to save Mirvan and Zuma. He wished to consult with his friends, but during the whole morning the Indians were so strictly watched that there was not even a possibility of conversing in secret with Azan or Thamir. Soon a proclamation ordered all the Indians who were in Lima to attend the execution. They were unarmed. The Spanish guard was doubled, and surrounded the pile; besides, two hundred soldiers were to escort the unfortunate victims. There was nothing but submission, and Ximeo, past hope, prayed for courage to throw himself into the burning pile with his children.

While the whole excited city was waiting for this frightful spectacle, the Vice-Queen was weaker and more miserable than ever. The agitation of those around her had been extreme since six o'clock, and she was at last struck by it; she saw clearly that Beatrice was concealing something from her. Beatrice often left the room to gain composure, and during one of these periods of absence the countess insisted upon an explanation, until one of the women-in-waiting gave an account of everything, adding that Zuma and Mirvan, far from denying their guilt, had gloried in it.

Digitized by Google

She fell into the arms of the priest.

The surprise of the Countess was only equalled by the horror with which the frightful recital inspired her. "O, Infinite Mercy!" she cried, "I invoke Thee with more confidence than ever."

She at once ordered an open litter to be prepared. The women wrapped her in a long muslin robe, and, notwithstanding the tears and expostulations of the Spanish ladies and of Beatrice, who had hastened to her, the Countess was laid on the litter and carried by four slaves. A fifth held over her a large parasol. Lying thus, her face covered with a white veil, she gave the order to convey her to the place of execution.

Twelve o'clock sounded. The doors of the prison were opened, and Mirvan and Zuma came out, loaded with chains. Zuma, scarcely able to sustain herself, leaned on the arm of a priest, and was attended by two soldiers. An immense crowd pressed forward to see her. In this multitude she saw Azan holding her little child in his arms. At this sight she uttered a despairing cry, a mother's cry, which resounded in the depths of every heart, and, summoning all her strength, she extricated herself from the priest and the soldiers, and, darting towards Azan, she embraced her son.

"Zuma," said Azan softly, "be strong, courageous. Remember that your death will be a vengeance, and that it makes our secret still more inviolable."

"No vengeance!" replied Zuma bitterly "Oh! if I could only have saved the Vice-Queen!"

She could say no more; the soldiers again surrounded her, and again they took up the line of march.

It was only three hundred paces to the place of execution. A mournful trumpet announced the approach of the victims; the top of the pile, which was formed of resinous wood, was set on fire.

At this sight Zuma trembled with horror; the remembrance of her husband and child gave place to stupor; she thought only of the near destruction; she saw only inevitable death under the most frightful aspect; strength left her, her frozen blood no longer circulated in her veins; her face turned a deadly pallor, and, without losing consciousness, she fell into the arms of the priest, who, notwithstanding her vague protestations, continually exhorted her to repent.

"Zuma," said Mirvan, "our death will not be painful. Look at those whirls of smoke. We shall be stifled in a moment."

"Oh," replied Zuma, in a smothered voice, "I see only fire, only those awful flames!"

However, they were advancing, and each step that brought Zuma nearer to her last moment increased her unconquerable terror. Now they saw distinctly the Indians, sullen and terror-stricken, ranged round the pile, and bearing in sign of mourning great branches of cypress. The guard of Spanish soldiers surrounded the Indians.

Suddenly in the distance cries were heard. A horseman appeared riding at full speed, and shouted, "Stop the execution! the Vice-Queen commands it! She follows me!"

All waited. Zuma, with hands and eyes uplifted, prayed for strength, but her mind, weakened by terror, could feel no hope. At last the litter of the Vice-Queen was seen. Her bearer, urged by her, quickened their steps; they soon reached the unhappy pair. The Spanish guard hastened to range themselves around the Vice-Queen, The Indians approached and formed a half-circle opposite her, then the Countess, raising her veil, revealed a countenance pale and languid, but full of a more than earthly sweetness.

"I have not the happy privilege of granting pardon," said she, "but I am sure of obtaining it from the goodness of the Viceroy. While waiting, I take under my protection these two unfortunate ones. Let their irons be broken. Let them extinguish this frightful pile, which never should have been kindled had I known of it earlier."

At these words all the Indians, throwing down their cypress-branches, made the air ring with cries of "Long live the Vice-Queen!" Ximeo rushed from the crowd, exclaiming, "Yes! she shall live!"

Zuma fell on her knees. "All powerful God! finish Thy work!" she prayed.

The Vice-Queen invited Mirvan and Zuma to attend her.

She returned to the palace, followed by the immense crowd, who enthusiastically blessed her for her mercy and goodness.

To receive from her the life-giving medicine.

Digitized by Google

As soon as they arrived at the palace, the Vice-Queen was laid on her bed, and she ordered Mirvan and Zuma to place themselves on either side. Fatigue and emotion had so exhausted her strength that she believed herself to be dying. She extended one hand to Mirvan and the other to Zuma, who received them kneeling, and bathed them with tears. Beatrice, unable to endure so harrowing a sight, begged that the Indians might be removed and guarded in the next apartment.

"No, no," said the Countess, "I answer for them, and I answer before the Supreme Arbiter who will judge us all! Leave them here. They are going to open the gates of Heaven for me."

"Great God!" said Beatrice. "To see you in the arms of these monsters who have poisoned you!"

"Where could I be better at this moment?" replied the Vice-Queen. "I should feel in the arms of friendship only vain regrets, but these trembling hands which I press in mine, strengthen my courage; the sight alone of the unfortunates fills my heart with a calm sense of security."

"Oh! my benefactress!" said Zuma, "if heaven betray my last hope, they will see if the unhappy Zuma loved you! No, I shall not be able to survive you!"

At these words, Beatrice exclaimed, "Detestable hypocrisy!"

"Do not insult them," interrupted the Countess. "They repent; see their tears flow! Zuma," she added, "you, whose lovely face indicates a heavenly mind, you, whom I have loved so well—could I cherish the slightest resentment against you? I look upon you both as the instruments of my eternal happiness. I pardon you with all my heart! May you be able to turn to religion with the same sincerity. I have sent a courier for my husband, who will, I know, confirm me in my position."

Zuma, almost beside herself, was about to speak, perhaps to reveal a part of the secret which weighed upon her more than when she had only her own life to protect, when an extraordinary uproar was heard in the court of the palace. An instant later, the Countess distinguished the voice of her husband. She ordered the door of her apartment to be opened, crying, "Pardon, pardon for the criminals."

"They are your deliverers," said the Viceroy, as he entered. Everyone was transfixed with astonishment. The Viceroy held in his arms a young child. Zuma uttered a cry of joy. It was her little son. The Count laid the child in her arms and threw himself at her feet. Ximeo followed him, and addressing Mirvan, said, "My son, thou canst speak, by the consent of all our people. The secret is revealed. We have all taken the powder in the presence of the Viceroy, and he has taken some himself before bringing it here."

At these words, Zuma pressed her child to her heart, returning thanks to Heaven. Mirvan embraced his father; the Countess asked a thousand questions. The Viceroy rapidly related all that the Indians had revealed to him.

"Great God!" cried the Vice-Queen, throwing her arms round Zuma, "this angelic creature, who was sacrificing herself for me, they were going to burn alive! When she was doing an action as sublime as touching, they were accusing her of an unparalleled crime!"

"The terrors of this heroic pair for their child's life," added the viceroy, "made them, with invincible firmness, endure shame, ignominy, and the prospect of a frightful death."

"Ah!" said Zuma, "the Vice-Queen did more. She believed us monsters of ingratitude and wickedness, and yet she protected and delivered us!"

"She is to receive, as well as you, the reward of so many virtues: you are to cure her. Here are two doses of the beneficent powder, one for the Vice-Queen and one for Zuma."

While speaking, the Viceroy himself mixed the quinine with water in two cups. Zuma drank the first, and the Countess asked to receive from her the life-giving medicine.

The Vice-Queen, already revived by joy and hope, received with delight the embraces of her husband, of Beatrice, and of the happy Zuma; she lavished the sweetest caresses upon Zuma's child, and promised from that hour to be his second mother.

Beatrice and all the Spanish ladies surrounded Zuma. Beatrice passionately kissed her hand, that beneficent hand which she had accused of committing an awful crime.

In the midst of the enthusiasm the Viceroy led Mirvan and Zuma to a balcony which overlooked the broad street filled with Indians and Spaniards. "Behold," said he, pointing to Mirvan and Zuma, "the victims of gratitude and of the sanctity of oaths! Indians! their sublime virtues, and those of the Vice-Queen alone, could release yourselves from the cruel vow made through vengeance. You have done so. You have become the benefactors of the old world. To make you happy is not only for us hereafter a duty of humanity, but one of gratitude: it shall be fulfilled. Indians, all of you in this memorable assembly—Indians, you are free; such sentiments make you worthy to become the equals of your conquerors. Enjoy this glory. It is virtue that gives you liberty. Love your sovereign; be faithful to him. Lands shall be distributed among you. Make the 'tree of health' flourish there, and in cultivating it remember that it is to you the whole world will owe this gift of the Creator."

Zuma held in her hand a branch of the "tree of health."

This address excited enthusiasm, and the Viceroy, desiring to end the day with the triumph of Zuma, caused her to be magnificently dressed, and placed in a palanquin, with all the court ladies in attendance, and the Vice-Queen's guard of honour to accompany her. A mounted herald preceded the cortége, crying, "Behold Zuma, the wife of the virtuous Mirvan, and the deliverer of the Vice-Queen!"

Zuma, reclining on cushions of cloth-of-gold, with her child beside her, held in her hand a branch of the "tree of health."

In this manner she passed through the principal streets of Lima, amid the acclamations of the people.

When she returned to the palace, after an affecting interview with the Vice-Queen, she was conducted to a beautiful apartment, newly prepared for her and her husband, with attendants to serve them; for from thenceforth they were to be treated as the most intimate, the dearest friends of the Countess.

In the evening, the city was illuminated, and in the gardens tables sumptuously laden were prepared for the Indians.

The fever left the Vice-Queen almost immediately, and at the end of eight days she was rapidly recovering health.

In the very place where the fatal pile had been laid, the Viceroy raised an obelisk of white marble, on which was inscribed in letters of gold:

TO ZUMA,
THE FRIEND AND DELIVERER OF THE VICE-QUEEN, AND THE BENEFACTOR OF THE OLD WORLD.

Digitized by Google

THE ASSASSIN.

A STORY FROM THE FRENCH.

"DOUBTLESS," said the old man, shaking his head, and closing his eyes that tears had dimmed—"doubtless you find it strange that I am sad, dull, with an air of taking an interest in nothing? I who have everything to make a man of my age happy: a comfortable income, a pretty house in the outskirts of the village, and behind the house a beautiful garden where I can cultivate at will roses and other flowers.

"There still remain to me old friends who would ask nothing better than to dine with me once a week, to empty with me at dessert a bottle of the wine of Anjou, and who would be gay and joyous as the refrains of those grand old songs that one sings no more!

"It would be a good and tranquil life, sweet and regular, with delicate menus and mutual interests which we could discuss slowly, lingeringly, in order not to finish with them too quickly.

"But, sir, a life like this is not for me; peace, happiness, the beauties of my grounds, the sight of people smiling about my table, breaks my heart, and it is two years now that I have slept badly and alone in my comfortable bed!"

"Yes, I know; they told me of your sorrow—your wife's death, so long ago."

He drew his hand hurriedly across his wet eyes.

"They told you that," he said; "but they did not tell you all. You know that my wife is dead—true; but not that it was I who killed her."

"Killed her!"

I drew back quickly.

He did not, or possibly feigned not, to see this movement of recoil.

"Alas, yes! Not only that I am a widower, but I am also an assassin. Listen!

"Though old, both of us, we loved each other so dearly, Benedicite and I, you would have laughed to see us. Young people of to-day do not comprehend this prolonged tenderness, which is discouraged neither by deep wrinkles nor whitening hair.

"Having grown old together, we thought not of having aged, the slow coming of our decline escaping us precisely because of our mutual attention, as one sees not the putting forth of a branch from a stem from which one turns not the eyes.

"And this accord of our aging together continued to keep us blind to the ravages of time, she in me and I in her, till the moment when the night itself fell, as one is blinded by long association and habit to the decay of ancient furniture that we love.

"We loved each other, a couple of sexagenarians, with the ardour and simplicity of the sixteen years of other days, our long marriage but seeming to continue the happiness of the betrothal hours.

"As we had always retained from our youth the habit of early rising, one might daily encounter us before seven o'clock wandering through the fields or walking beside the river under the drooping willows, a little apart, but holding each other's hands and with that swinging movement of the arm that has the appearance of rocking a cradle. Benedicite escaping at times to run a little skipping leap that denied her rheumatism, to cull the marguerites that grew by the wayside, and which she had always loved so much. It was thus we were ridiculous, but happy, for I did not perceive all there was of childishness and madness in our superannuated joys.

"Then suddenly Benedicite fell ill. It was serious from the first, declared the doctor, giving a name to the malady that I do not wish to recall. My astonishment equalled my despair. A malady that was serious—that was death! I was so content with life I had never even thought of dying. Moreover, we were too young, Benedicite and I.

"But behold this cruel mischance, that recalled me to the reality, that obliged me to think of pain, sorrow, of a lonely old age, of separations, of the cemetery. What! Such a thing as this could be? Benedicite would die, and I would continue to live!

"I did not wish to believe in the possibility of such a disaster; I would not believe in it, and with smiles, as sincere as tender, encouraged to coming convalescence my dear wife—a little too pale, perhaps, though always so, even as a young girl—stretched in her easy chair by the window, through which the sun she loved streamed and gave so much pleasure to her heart.

"But soon there happened a frightful thing. Benedicite's illness became complicated with sharp, intolerable sufferings. To see her writhing in convulsive agony, to hear her rattling under a hand that strangled her—ah, it was more than I was able to bear!

"The doctor had given her a soothing potion, which, taken by the spoonful, hour by hour, quieted these torments; a dangerous drug, however, a deadly poison, mortal for whoever drank it in larger doses, and specified in his directions to be used with the utmost caution.

"I shook with nervous tremours whenever, implored by Benedicite, I carried to her lips the brimming spoon that she emptied eagerly in her longing for sleep and ease.

"But day after day the malady grew worse.

"'Your wife is lost,' said the doctor, when one evening I followed him to the door to question him without her hearing me; 'she is already sinking.'

"Benedicite lost! Benedicite sinking! The bare thought of my solitude in this world when she had gone made me stagger and clutch the doctor for support. No hope! The doctor left, and I threw myself despairingly upon the sofa in our little sitting-room, trying to gather my thoughts.

"Then, mad with terror, I ran to the telegraph office and wired for a specialist from Paris. When I returned Benedicite was in her last moments.

"Thus was no illusion left me. It was true—it was certain, Benedicite was going to die—to die in two hours—in one hour—before the clock could sound again, and I, tortured, powerless, heart-broken, could only watch her toss and turn and stiffen herself on that bed of pain which groaned and bent beneath her.

Suddenly she raised herself erect and gazed at me with a haggard look.

"'I can bear it no longer!' she cried. 'I can bear it no longer, this suffering I endure. I am dying, you know that; and I wish to die, to die at once! Give it to me, I beseech you, give it to me—I am the same as dead! Give it all to me, I beseech you!'

"And she designated with her shaking fingers, her dim eyes, all her poor tormented body bending eagerly forward—the little bottle that contained the deadly fluid that once had given her ease.

"What would you have done, you, I ask you, had you been in my place? She was racked with torture, she was dying—the doctor had said it. I could bear no longer to see her suffer thus.

"I yielded to her will, and, all trembling, lifted the phial to the eager lips, which glued themselves to it firmly, and drank and drank—till the phial was drained to the dregs. Benedicite fell back upon her pillow, a long shudder ran through her frame, and I held between my own her hands, still warm, but little by little growing colder.

"Two hours later, as I watched beside my dead, I heard a carriage stop at the door.

"'Master,' said the servant, 'the Paris doctor.'

"He entered. He looked at the body, examined it critically, turned and returned, and sounded it here and there. Then he asked me questions concerning the treatment during illness. I told him all I knew and gave him the little emptied phial. He took it, raised it to his nose, smelt it carefully.

"'All of this?' said he—'all of this at a dose?'

"I rose, stumbling to my feet; a frightful thought had flashed into my mind.

"'All. Benedicite exacted it,' murmured I, bending my head.

"'And you yielded. Fool! An operation should have been performed, a simple and easy one. Had you waited I should have saved this woman!'"

Digitized by Google

A MILK-WHITE beach of coral sand, on which were strewn thousands of exquisite shells and strange sponge forms. In front, dancing blue waters of a Southern sea, stretching away into infinite space and ruffled into flashing white caps by the strong breath of the trade wind. As a background to the beach stood a dense grove of cocoanut palms, stateliest and most graceful of trees. The myriad slender tips of their huge leaves rustled in the warm wind like the sharp patter of raindrops in a heavy shower.

Down where the white trunks shot, tall and slender, to the dim arches of the living roof all was in dark, cool shadow, flecked now and then by dancing points of golden sunlight. Mingled with the salt breath of the sea was a faint odour from spathes of corn-coloured blossoms high up among the leaf-crowns.

Beneath these hung clusters of fruit in all stages of development, from the size of a marble to that of a football. On the ground lay scores of the great, brown, ripened cocoanuts, of so little value in that tropic land that no one cared to pick them up. They were protected by rough three-cornered husks so thick as to more than double their actual size.

On one of them, turned on end, sat a boy wearing a broad-brimmed, high-crowned hat of palmetto braid. He was clad in a white cotton shirt and brown linen trousers turned up at the bottom. His feet were bare, and his legs, hands and face were as brown as an Indian's. He presented an ideal picture of youthful strength, and that perfect health only to be acquired through out-of-door sunshine.

His face, generally bright and happy, was clouded as he sat, with elbows on his knees, resting his chin in his hands, and gazing out over the glinting waters. The object on which his eyes were fixed was a small schooner moored a hundred yards from shore.

A boy wearing a broad-brimmed, high-crowned hat.

She was not more than thirty feet over all in length, but was broad of beam and solidly built.

The month was March and the beach was that of one of those low-cut fertile Florida quays that form the southernmost limit of United States territory.

The boy was John Albury, commonly called "Grit" to distinguish him from the many other John Alburys of that region.

The schooner was the Polyanthus, formerly owned by Grit's father, who had been lost at sea the autumn before in a boat belonging to a neighbour.

For many years, while he was a widower, Mr. Albury had only occupied his home on the quay at long intervals, spending most of his time with his boy and girl, Grit and Matey, on board the Polyanthus, wrecking, sponging, fishing, while waiting for his cocoanut grove to come into bearing and, as he finally hoped, yield him an income.

This life proved a very happy one for all three, and it was a sad day for the children when it was ended by the appearance of a step-mother, who, coming from inland on the mainland, had no knowledge of, nor love for, boats on the water. She was not unkind, but she instituted a new order of things, strongly resented by the sailor boy and girl. Mr. Albury was persuaded to clear the land and put in a crop. Grit weeded tomatoes, and hated them; Matey was made to sew and do housework—while both children were taught to read and write.

Now they had very little of the sailing that they so dearly loved, and for which they longed; for Mrs. Albury could see no good in boats. She even advised her husband to sell the dear old Polyanthus, and ship his crops by the regular Quay West trading schooner; but this, to Grit's great satisfaction, he steadily refused to do, though he so far yielded to his wife's prejudices as to spend most of his time on shore while the Poly swung idly at her moorings.

When the father was lost at sea in the dreadful hurricane that nearly swept away their home as well, Mrs. Albury's aversion to boats became so bitter that she declared she would sell the Polyanthus to the first person who would offer £10 for her.

"But, mother! £10 is a ridiculous price for a fine boat like the Poly," urged Grit. "She can make that in a single month."

Digitized by Google

"She never has since I have known anything about her," replied Mrs Albury.

"No, for she hasn't had a chance. You let me take her and I'll show you how much she can make."

"And get drowned like your poor father, and leave only me and Matey to look after the place. No, indeed! You are too valuable to waste that way. I need you ashore, and so do the tomatoes. They'll bring in more money than any boat that was ever built, you see if they don't. I shouldn't be in the least surprised if we make £40 off the crop this year, and twice that sum after we get all the land cleared and planted."

"But boats can make as much as that, mother, and more, too. Why, at a wreck——"

"Nonsense, there aren't any wrecks nowadays, and if there were, what could a boy like you do at one? No; you stick to tomatoes. They're safe and sure, and I'll put temptation out of your way by selling that boat the very first chance I get. You'll thank me for it in the end, see if you don't."

Now the fatal day had nearly arrived. A man in Quay West had sent word that he was coming to look at the Polyanthus, and would probably buy her. He might appear at any moment and that was the reason why Grit Albury sat gazing sadly at the dear boat on that glorious March afternoon, instead of gathering the last of the tomatoes that were expected to realise £40.

As the boy slowly rose to return to his work, there came a sound of flying feet and Matey's voice was heard, calling in joyous tones:

"Grit! Oh, Grit! Mother wants you to catch her some fish, and says I can go with you."

The lad only answered, "All right, sister, come along"; but a sudden resolution, that he did not put into words, flashed into his mind. Two minutes later a single skilful throw of a cast-net into the shoal of sardines, always swarming near the coast, had provided a sufficiency of bait, and a light skiff was dancing merrily over the blue waters.

"Why, Grit! Where are you going?" demanded Matey as the skiff was headed directly for the Polyanthus.

"Put it in writing, and have it witnessed, Cap'n."

"Out to the reef, after fish," was the answer that came back.

"But, Grit——"

"Never mind the 'buts' now, little girl. That's where we're a going, and we're going in the schooner too. Mother said fish, but so far as I heard she didn't say what kind of fish, such as Spanish mackerel, king fish, yellow-tails, or drum. You know that we can't find those off the reef any more'n we can get out to where they are in a skiff. Besides, sister, it's our very last chance for a sail in the old Poly. She's going to be sold, or rather given away, to-morrow, and I don't suppose we'll ever see her again, or own another boat."

Of course this was convincing, for Matey not only dearly loved to sail, but was firm in her belief that whatever Grit said or did was right. Thus an hour later saw the little schooner, after a glorious run across the broad Hawk Channel, anchored just inside the great coral reef that borders the Gulf Stream for more than 200 miles, and on which huge breakers were dashing themselves into showers of glistening spray.

The fishing was superb, and so absorbing that the sun was sinking into its bed of crimson and gold ere either Grit or Matey thought of starting for home. When at length they were ready to go and attempted to get up the anchor all their strength on the windlass failed to move it. It was quite dark before Grit abandoned the attempt to recover their anchor. "Never mind, Matey. It won't hurt us to stay here all night, and as soon as it grows light again I'll dive down there and see what is the matter. "I'm not going to cut the cable and lose that brand new anchor unless I have to."

So they cooked a supper of fish and made themselves so comfortable in the snug little cabin that they rather rejoiced in their adventure than otherwise. So soundly did they sleep that night, that not until he was flung from his locker on to the cabin floor did Grit awaken to the fact that the Poly was pitching madly and that a gale was shrieking through her taut rigging.

Calling to Matey the boy sprang on deck, where he was well-nigh beaten down by the furious squall of wind and rain that just then hurled itself against the schooner.

There was an instant of quivering strain. Then something gave way, and Grit knew what had happened. The tense cable had parted, and they were helplessly drifting at the mercy of the storm. For a moment even Grit's stout heart quailed. He could see nothing save the ghost-like forms of leaping breakers that seemed to crowd about him from all sides. He could not even tell from which direction the squall was blowing. Matey had joined him in the cockpit with as full an understanding of the situation as his own.

No words passed between them, for none could have been heard above the shriek of wind and the roar of waters. They seemed to be driving with frightful speed, and as the brother and sister stood hand in hand, waiting their fate, they expected that each moment would see their craft dashed in pieces on the cruel reef.

Minutes passed and still they swept on. Suddenly Grit uttered a great cry of relief that was almost a sob.

"We've passed the breakers! We're clear of the reef! We're out in the Gulf! We're safe, Matey!" he shouted.

To anyone but a sailor it would have seemed that they were anything but safe, out in the open sea, driving through inky darkness, and with the worst squall of the season howling furiously about them; but Matey was a sailor. She knew, and deep down in her heart arose a fervent prayer of thanksgiving.

The next change of scene was most surprising. Daylight had come, and the sun was rising. Before a gentle breeze, with all sail set, the Polyanthus was approaching a great steamer that had struck on an outlying spur of the reef during the blinding bewilderment of the recent gale.

"I do believe it's a wreck!" Matey had exclaimed rapturously, when her sharp eyes first discovered the stranded ship.

"Oh, if it only should be!" cried Grit, who could hardly believe that so great a good fortune had befallen them. Then with anxious, beating hearts the young sailors had shaken out their reefs, and laid a course toward the lights that marked the dimly-looming hulk.

"Great Scott!" cried the captain of the stranded steamer, as he caught sight of the schooner's sails. "Here's a reef wrecker already. I believe these fellows live at sea, and can smell a wreck a hundred miles!"

Digitized by Google

"Hello, there!" he shouted, a few minutes later, as the schooner drew near. "Take a line, but don't you dare come on board. I'm not in humour to give up my ship to you pirates yet. So stay where you are and I'll come to you."

"Don't you want your cargo lightened, sir, or anchor carried?" inquired Grit anxiously as the captain slid down a rope and stood on the Poly's deck.

"No, I'm not in a hurry to break out my hold, and I want to try something else before hedging," answered the captain. "Who is the captain of this craft?"

"I am, sir."

"You?" cried the other, regarding the lad incredulously. "Well, then, where is the crew?"

"There, sir," replied Grit, pointing to Matey.

"Well, I'm blest!" gasped the captain. "A boy and a girl! Even the babes in arms turn wreckers on this coast. However," he added, "perhaps you'll do as well as an older. Can you dive?"

"Of course I can, sir," answered Grit promptly.

"Are you afraid of sharks?"

"I should think not," was the contemptuous answer.

"Well, my men are, and I can't even swim, much less dive," continued the captain, "but I want a diver to go down and tell me just how my ship lies. I have a plan that I am anxious to try, if things are as I think. If you'll help me carry it out, I'll give you £100 for an hour's work, provided we get this ship off within that time. Is it a bargain?"

"Put it in writing and have it witnessed, Cap'n," replied the cautious Grit, "and I'll sign the paper. It only holds for one hour though. Then, if you're not afloat we'll make a new bargain, and if she's to be lightened, I'm to be wreckmaster and take charge, 'cause mine is the first schooner here. Is that agreed?"

"Yes, that's right," smiled the captain grimly. "I reckon you've taken part in wrecks before?"

"A few," laughed Grit.

By the time the paper was made out and handed to Matey for safe-keeping, Grit was ready to perform his share of the bargain. He dived from the bows of the schooner and was gone nearly a minute. Then he came up for breath, and almost immediately dived again.

Sat nearly distracted.

He repeated this operation four times without saying what he had discovered. Meanwhile the passengers and crew of the steamer crowded her rail, and leaning far over, watched his operations with breathless interest.

Finally the young diver clambered on board and related to the captain that his ship had struck, well forward, on a narrow ledge with deep water on both sides, and that she was afloat, with the exception of a space ten feet long near her bow.

"That is just about what I gathered from soundings," replied the captain. "Now I want you to go down again, taking a lead line with you, and find some good-sized hole or crevice as near the bottom of the ledge as you can get. Leave the lead to mark the spot where you came up."

Grit wondered at this strange order, but did as directed, and after several descents into the clear waters finally discovered a deep fissure nearly twenty feet beneath the surface.

"Is the hole large enough to hold this?" asked the captain when the young wrecker again came on board the schooner. As he spoke the former held out a square tin canister, to which was attached a reel of slender copper wire.

"Yes, sir," replied the boy. "It's big enough to hold me."

"Very good. Now, if you will go down once more, taking this can with you, and thrust it as far as possible into the hole, I will not ask you to go into the water again."

Grit cast a curious glance at the captain's face to see if he could detect any indication of madness, but the only signs he discovered were of perfect intelligence and an indomitable will. Still, as the boy again stepped over the side ready to descend into the crystal depths, and the canister was handed to him, his suspicion of the captain's sanity was revived by the latter's instructions.

"Take care of this can as you would of your own life," he said earnestly. "Don't let it hit against anything, and place it gently as far in the crevice as you can reach. It holds your life and fortune, as well as mine."

These words were so strange, and the whole business was so different from the usual proceedings in connection with a wrecked ship, that even as Grit worked at his novel task, far beneath the surface, the one thought that filled his mind was: "He is as crazy as crazy can be." However, he carried out his instructions, and when he regained the schooner's deck found it occupied by all the passengers of the stranded steamer.

"Take them off on a five minutes' cruise," ordered the captain, as with his own hands he cast off the lines holding the schooner. Then he swung himself up the steamer's side and disappeared in his own cabin.

At the end of five minutes the Polyanthus was nearly a quarter of a mile away, and her young skipper, who was trying to answer a hundred questions at once from the bewildered passengers, was also wondering what he would do next. All at once it was noticed that the propeller of the great ship was working furiously backwards.

Then came the most surprising thing that has ever happened in all the annals of wrecking on the Florida reefs. There was a heavy vibratory explosion, accompanied by a muffled roar. To those who happened to be looking toward the ship at that moment, she seemed to be lifted bodily from the water.

The next instant she was enveloped and hidden from view in a vast fountain-like column of foam. Directly afterwards the ship re-appeared, floating as steadily as ever in her life on the great billows of the mysterious submarine disturbance, and running rapidly backwards.

Late that afternoon the schooner Polyanthus again picked up her moorings off the glistening coral beach.

Mrs. Albury was wild with anxiety over Grit and Matey. A man had come from Quay West for the Polyanthus, with a view to purchasing her, but finding her absent, and being pressed for time, had gone away again. He had, moreover, left behind him a letter from the Northern commission house to which Mrs. Albury had sent her tomatoes, stating that the shipment had been spoiled, so that instead of being entitled to returns, she found she was indebted for freight charges.

As the poor woman sat quite overwhelmed by her misfortunes there came an exulting shout outside, and the next moment Grit and Matey rushed in, alive and well.

"Hurrah, mother!" cried the former, as he wildly waved a slip of paper above his head. "We've got your fish, and only stayed out a little longer to give the old 'Poly' a chance to earn this £100, just to show you what she was good for."

"What on earth do you children mean?" exclaimed Mrs. Albury slowly, as she took the New York draft for £100 from Grit's hands to examine it. "How could a mere boy and a still younger girl like you two wreck a big steamer and get her off!"

"Ma," replied Grit, with a mischievous twinkle in his eyes, "I don't exactly understand how we did it; but I think we blew her up with dynamite."

Digitized by Google

A MATRIMONIAL GAME OF CHESS.

OLD Mr. Archer was a devoted chess player, and an expert at that. He held chess to be the only game fit for a gentleman. There were few of his acquaintances who could cope with him, and but one among them who could match him fairly. That was James Bittles, his lawyer. It was a close contest between the two—first one ahead, and then the other. Bittles stood high in his profession, but he mainly won and retained Archer's confidence by his ability as a chess-player. He was barely forty, and Archer maintained that by the time he reached sixty he would surpass all others.

Archer had a daughter—his only child. Her father had married late in life, and ten years after the birth of the girl, her mother had died. Letty had a place in his heart next to chess itself. A bright, lively and pretty girl was Letty Archer, and she would be a heiress to something over £100,000.

Her father feared she would become the prey to a fortune-hunter, and endeavoured to avert it by the provision of his will. He neglected to execute his testament, however, until Letty was nearly twenty years old, and unmarried still. It was none too soon, for the week after he died suddenly of an apoplectic fit.

When the will was opened, it was found that Bittles was named sole executor, and constituted guardian of Letty until she was twenty-one, and trustee of all the estate, real and personal. The conditions of the trust were, that if Letty married with the consent of Bittles, the trustee was to turn over to her all the property on the day of the wedding, and as long as she remained unmarried after twenty-one ; but if she married without his consent, she was to receive only five hundred a year, and the residue of the estate, beyond that necessary to secure this payment, was to be conveyed to a third party, or her heirs. This third party was described as :

"Catherine Sinclair, daughter of Gordon Sinclair, if she be still single ; or, if she be married, then to the said Catherine Sinclair by whatever name she may be now known, to her and to her heirs for ever."

A further provision was that in case the said Catherine Sinclair, by whatever name she might be known, was dead and had left an heir or heirs, the property over and above the reserved amount in the contingency mentioned was given, devised, and bequeathed to him, her, or them.

Who Catherine Sinclair or her father was Letty could not tell, nor could the lawyer, but it was suggested that it was an early flame of Archer's. Some thought that the possible legatee was mythical, and brought forward to scare Letty from making an imprudent match. But the power of Bittles in the matter was as absolute as pen and ink could make it.

Bittles proved himself to be a vigilant guardian and a careful trustee—guarding his ward against adventurers, and managing the estate with prudence and vigour. Everything went well until about ten months after Archer's death. Then the current of affairs rippled a little.

Letty and Bittles both fell in love—Letty with Carter Cooke, a rich young man of good family, and Bittles, in spite of himself, with Letty, who did not care a snap for him, looking upon the middle-aged bachelor as a venerable person, and bestowing her heart upon his younger rival. Love is like the measles, and if we be attacked with it in middle age the disorder assumes an aggravated form. Bittles had a very severe attack indeed.

Letty might well be excused for reciprocating the feelings of Carter Cooke. The young man was not only by birth but by culture and associations a gentleman, with no censurable habits, and with polished manner. He had a well-proportioned figure, a pleasing face, and was well liked in fashionable circles in London, where he spent about half the year ; and though not by any means as rich as Letty would be, was possessed of a handsome competence.

Bittles pronounced him to be a fortune-hunter, and frowned upon his suit, really because it interfered with the one he wished to make. Letty was not of an age to reflect on the serious consequences of her guardian's disapproval, and had she been, her cheerful temper would have led her to optimism. Then Carter Cooke was a skilful chess-player, and Letty, who had been taught by her father, was about as expert as he, which strengthened the bond between them.

The wooing went on in spite of the frowns of Bittles, and the latter began to show the bitterness of defeat. This was seen when the young lover, with Letty's consent, made a formal proposal to the guardian for the hand of his ward.

"No, sir; decidedly no!" replied Bittles. "I have nothing against you personally, Mr. Cooke. Your respectability is undoubted ; but I do not consider you—nor will anyone else—a match for Miss Archer in fortune.

"I have examined the statement your solicitor laid before me, and find that you have barely a thousand a year, while the property of my ward yields many times that amount, most of it in property that is rising in value. I should be false to my duty if I approved of the match under such circumstances."

"Very good, sir," retorted Cooke. "Far be it from me to say that disappointed pretensions of your own prompt your refusal. I will admit that it is a mere sense of duty, if that admission pleases you. But I am authorised by Letty to say that when she arrives at the age of twenty-one, should your consent to our marriage be refused, we will marry without it. That will be the next move on the board, Mr. Bittles."

"You are playing a costly game, sir."

"Not at all, sir. At all events, I shall call on the bishop to capture your queen," replied Cooke good-humouredly, and bowed himself out of the room with mock courtesy.

When Letty heard of this positive refusal, in spite of her avowed contempt for money she was disposed to be downcast. But Carter whispered to her a secret—a proverbially dangerous thing to do to a woman—and Letty, after a look of astonishment, burst into a ripple of silvery laughter.

"Oh, you dear delightful boy!" she exclaimed. "Who would have thought of it?"

And Letty renewed her laughter, for the secret seemed to her the most comical thing in the world.

Bittles did not at all desire to exact the penalty, but he did very much desire to break the disagreeable connection. But, how? Letty went into society under the chaperonage of Mrs. Burroughs, Bittles' own sister, a well-to-do widow, who was four years his senior, and liked the mild kind of dissipation which she enjoyed by virtue of her office.

At her dances, tea parties, and the opera, or wherever Letty went, Carter Cooke was sure to be ; and Letty suffered him to assume the right of prospective ownership in a way that drove all other suitors from the field.

Letty made no secret of her feelings, and wore her engagement ring openly. Mrs. Borroughs, who liked Cooke, tacitly aided and abetted. It soon became known that Bittles frowned on Cooke, and folks were curious to learn how the affair would end ; as though in such a case, with two wilful young people, it could end in any way but one. Bittles was duly informed of this open courtship, and the lectures he bestowed upon Letty in consequence only increased his ward's dislike of himself, until it deepened into positive aversion.

Bittles trusted to time and the chances. He did not believe that Letty, when the pinch came, would sacrifice so large a portion of her property for a mere girlish love, which might be destroyed at any time by a lover's quarrel ; nor that Cooke, whom he had brought himself to believe had mercenary motives, would care to take her with so much less money.

Fifteen hundred a year of her husband's and five hundred of her own to one of Letty's expensive habits meant almost exclusive rural residence ; and he knew that Letty did not like living in the country, except during the time of flowers and sunshine. Bittles waited, therefore, not without reasonable hope.

He had calculated on an ally in his sister, and, to insure her co-operation, told her of his hopes and fears. She laughed at him.

"James," she said, "this is the most absurd thing possible. She is about half your age. You have staid, bachelor habits, and Letty, though she's a good girl, is fond of life and society. She'd drive you mad in six months, and put you in the grave in less than a year. If you must make an exhibition of yourself, matrimonially, choose some rich widow of thirty to forty, who would suit you better."

Digitized by Google

"Hang rich widows!"

"Quite polite and complimentary, considering that I am a widow with a comfortable income. You had better give it up. I have sounded Letty to the depths, and know that she loves young Cooke; and he is—putting the question of fortune on one side—a capital match for her. I would have preferred her to have made a richer marriage, but they will have enough between them."

"No, they'll not; for I will never give my consent. I'll take her from you—lock her up, if need be——"

"You are a lawyer and know better, James. You may refuse your consent, though everyone will penetrate your motives, and laugh at you; but, as to the locking up—they do such things in plays and novels, not in real life."

"She is under my control until she is twenty-one."

"Oh, yes—doubtless: that is nominally—for three months more. Then she'll marry in spite of you. If you strip her of all but £500 a year you'll incur general reproach, and gain no satisfaction in the long run. The best you can do is to keep off the wedding for a short time. Give in. If you were ten years younger I might strain a point to help you—not as it is."

As the Irish peasant girl says. "She was as stiff as he was stout," and Bittles fell back on his move of the forfeiture, which he thought would deter both parties for some time, and in the meanwhile no one could tell what chance quarrel, a newer face, or the whims of a woman might do.

Just then fate seemed to come to the assistance of the guardian-lover. It assumed the shape of a new suitor, or something like it, and, to the delight of Bittles, it was Major Bolling.

"Fire fight fire," thought Bittles.

Major Phil Bolling was considerably older than Carter Cooke. The major was of the old school, popular with the ladies, to whom he showed a respect almost reverential, and he was very much attracted by Letty Archer, and she liked to chat with him, and draw out his old-fashioned courtesy. They moved in the same set, and met frequently.

Carter Cooke was at this time called to Paris on business, and the major slid into his place, in spite of his years, and displayed attentiveness that led people to suspect that he had pretensions. To the surprise of Mrs. Borroughs, this grew into an almost confidential intimacy. Cooke seemed to have been forgotten in his absence, and Bittles chuckled. The gallant ex-officer showed himself to be under a spell, and expressed his admiration in the most positive terms.

Letty and the major got along famously, and his adulation apparently quite supplied the absence of Cooke. This was supplemented by the attentions of her guardian, who became kind and bland again.

Letty's twenty-first birthday came round, and Mrs. Burroughs' stately mansion was thrown open in honour of the event. The major was specially invited; so was Carter Cooke, who had returned from Paris and had been visiting his place at Highover, where he had been superintending repairs and alterations. Bittles was there, of course, gorgeously arrayed in honour of the occasion.

About noon Letty was missing, and the absence of the major was noted. Cooke had not yet come. Letty was not to be found in the house; but one of the servants had noticed that she and the major had gone out together, entered a carriage in waiting not far off, and been driven away. It was surely most extraordinary, and Bittles grew excited over the fact. It was probably some girlish freak, to result in some surprise, and so it proved.

At one o'clock a number of carriages drove up before the door. From the foremost of these descended the major, who handed out Letty, who was followed by Cooke. From the other carriages there alighted a number of "the set." It was quite a little procession that filed in, the major at the head, as proud and self-appreciating as a drum-major at the head of a street parade.

"Well, here you are," said Bittles. "I really began to fear, major, that you and my ward had eloped."

"Nothing of the kind, I assuh you," replied the other. "I was me'ly the best man on this joyous occasion. I have the honah to introduce to you Mr. and Mrs. Cahtah Cooke."

"Married!" cried Bittles, aghast.

"Yes, sir," responded Cooke. "My bishop, in the shape of a surpliced clergyman, has enabled me to capture your queen," and he drew Letty's arm within his own.

"Very well, sir. Miss Archer is of age and has a right; but, as she has married without my consent, she has thrown away a large fortune for a beggarly five hundred a year. I shall search for the heirs of Catherine Sinclair to-morrow. You have taken the queen? I cry check to the queen, sir."

"Excuse me, sir," retorted Cooke, "but you utterly mistake the situation on the board. Mrs. Cooke will have a larger allowance of pin money. I shall make it a thousand, with an unlimited command of a cheque-book which your action has made equal to a heavy drain."

"My action! Pooh!—stuff!"

"No, no, sir! You need not hunt far to-morrow. My cousin here, Major Bolling, who is the genealogist to both families, can show you that Catherine Sinclair, daughter of Gordon Sinclair, married with the fourth Carter Cooke, of Highover, and unfortunately died three years since, four years after her husband. She left one heir, a son, the fifth Carter Cooke, whom I have the honour to present to you as the husband of your ward, and the happiest man on earth. Mr. Bittles—checkmate."

Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

CHAPTER XV.

"I AM at a loss to understand the meaning of your message," said the colonel, stiffly, standing by the table, glowering at me. "You are fond of dramatic effects. I suppose you intend some sort of a scene?"

"Not unless you make it," I answered, coolly, as Liz went out and slammed the door as a token of her disapproval.

"No witchcraft," he continued hatefully, as he took a chair and looked into my face in that insolent way of his.

"No, Justina gave your gold piece to the church. Yara, the man you sent to murder John Scott, is dead. Your cousin bears a charmed life, you see. I want to talk to you about Xarras."

I noticed then he was looking haggard and old. I wondered if his inky hair and moustache were not dyed. I heard afterwards that he was a spendthrift and gambler, and broken in fortune, had come to America to seek aid from the very man he had wronged. He did receive some money, but not what he hoped, and then his only desire was to be revenged on John.

"I thought Yara told you about him in that trance," sneered the colonel.

"He tried to, but was so eager to show me Xarras was in Mexico; I was sure he was not, so I went up to the attic in the Scott house."

"And you found nothing?" said the colonel, smiling confidently.

"Well, only two letters in the pocket of a faded grey coat."

He sprang to his feet with a curse. The rushing tide of memory brought him back to the day he must have put them there, and he realised what their contents were. He turned on me with a torrent of ugly epithets.

"You can say all you want to," I said, quietly, "the only thing I care about is to have you go away, so that John will not be a thing like you."

"You'd better look into his past then. Bah! He has no intention of marrying you. I should think you would remember what you were."

"I want you first to give me some proof of Katherine's death, someone abroad to whom I can write; then you must leave Galveston immediately, otherwise I shall tell John you are Xarras."

"He will not believe you."

"My Aunt Margaret knew you, and I have the letters. She only spared you because Katherine was guilty, and she did not want him to have a crime on his soul."

He made a contemptible insinuation about Aunt Marg and John, and I jumped to my feet: "Don't dare to slander her, or I cannot keep my secret. I will not endure any more. I have given you your choice; the future rests with you."

He smiled, and threw a card on the table. "Write to that address in Havre, France. You will learn there of Katherine's death and burial. I give it to you because, little fiend as you are, I like you. Why are you so anxious to know about her?"

"I mean to marry John," I said, "and her hateful memory shall not come between us."

"My blessing on you," he laughed. "I think you are even cleverer than your sister."

He left Galveston the next day, and years afterwards I thought, in a wrinkled and tremulous old man at Monte Carlo, at a rouge-et-noir table, clasping his winnings with yellow, shaking hands, I recognised Dean Gregory. We looked at each other, but neither spoke, for I dared not tell the man with me, and Dean bore me no goodwill. That was the last of him.

Clasping his winnings with yellow, shaking hands.

I wrote to Havre, and in due time received a number of official-looking documents, certifying that a woman, named Katherine Dean, died at a certain street and number, and giving her age and general description. Aunt Marg said she had heard Katherine took Dean's first name when they went away together, so she was sure from the description, allowing for the changes of time and a lawless life, the dead woman was my sister.

I have not mentioned John all this time because I was angry. When he knew I was better, he went away from Galveston, and all we knew of him was from Bruce, who brought me flowers daily. I did not get strong very fast, and the doctor said I had some trouble weighing on my mind. I did not tell him nor any of them what it was, but I did not want to get well, life was so dreary to me.

One week Aunt Marg was odd and silent, like she used to be. She had nothing to say, and went about in one of her dreamy spells. Late one afternoon, she asked me for the letters I had found in the trunk. I petted and loved her a good deal, for I tried to make up for those wasted years. I told her they were at the bottom of a pile of sheets in the linen closet; that I had not read a line of them, I dared not, I thought a curse was on them.

"It may be a blessing," she said, absently. She came back to me with them in her hand and her bonnet on, with her long crêpe veil. Any other woman than her I would have thought wore that veil because it looked so well over her white hair. "Some day, my dear," she said, as she kissed me and stood there stroking my hair, "I want you to think of this time and remember how well I loved you." She did no. explain her words, but went swiftly away.

I watched her going towards the town. I played a little on the piano, but my fingers were too weak. I tried reading, but I could not fix my thoughts; and then I cried a little. I did not like to see myself in the mirror, I had grown so thin and pale. My eyes were too big for my face, and my gowns had to be taken in. I heard Liz tell Bruce she thought I was going into consumption.

I remember I had on a new gown that day, a soft pearl and white like a sea-gull, or a foggy day along the beach when the waves are all white with foam. I had white ribbons on it that made me think of a baby's coffin lined with satin, so dainty and pure. It was a gruesome sort of a fancy that pleased me. I wandered to the window and then my heart gave a great leap; there at our gate, talking to my Aunt Margaret, who was looking pale and strange, stood Mr. John Scott. I ran and picked a bunch of violets out of the vase and pinned them in my breast. I had not forgotten my vanity, even if I was plain and thin. I heard the gate click and his step on the path, and then the door opened and he staggered in. He had a queer dazed look, his face was ghastly, his eyes blazing and wild.

"I don't even know that you are Letty," he cried, with a strange, mad laugh; "my world has all gone wrong; I fled because I loved you more than her. My God, I fled because of that!" Then he broke into a sob that was half a groan, and clenched his fists. "Did you read those letters?" he went on, tearing them from his pocket and throwing them at me. "All these years I shrined her as a saint. Read them now."

"No, not one word; she was my sister."

He fell into a chair by the table and hid his face on his outstretched arms. After a little I went to him. "John," I said faintly, "she is dead and I am alive. Is it kind to treat me thus? Forget and forgive. We know that she is dead."

Digitized by Google

"But he is not," he cried fiercely. "You have sent him away, Margaret says, but you only stayed my hand for a little while."

"You have no right to touch him. Katherine was most to blame. How can you avenge a wrong to her when there was none? The vendetta of those other men I can pardon. They had the right. One of those Mexicans living was a reproach, almost a dishonour to them, after that day. But you," then I went to him and laid my hand on his shoulder, "have you not done all you could to make restitution? If you must be a murderer, begin with me; only a little more of my misery and I can be released."

"What do you mean?" he said coldly.

"I never knew what love was till you taught me, John," I went on, bravely; "that was not friendship, all that month, not the affection of brother and sister, but lover's love. I have been dying for you. I cannot explain it, but somehow you became a part of my life, and without you I will not live. I am not calm and good like other women, like Aunt Marg. All the pent-up affection of my starved life I gave to you. I am even without shame in telling you of it. I am so hopeless, John."

"Have you thought of my life? What I have been? Do you think any blessing would come to us? I hunted every man of those Mexicans down to his death. What would the world call me; how would it judge me?"

"You can reason so calmly, you do not care for me," I said bitterly; then a mad idea came to me, nor will I conceal what I did. He was sitting there with averted face. He had not looked at me, and I stood a full moment and watched him. Then, possessed by my worst spirit, I went to him and covered his eyes with one hand. I put my other arm round his neck, and stooped and kissed him full on the mouth. "You shall love me so well," I said, "that you will not argue but risk all, dare fate and all the world, to care for me."

He caught both my hands.

Had he not called me "darling" that night on the beach? I had the right anyway. He turned swiftly and caught me in his arms. Aunt Marg's bird, as if he felt a sudden change in the temperature of the room from storm to sunshine, began to sing merrily. I lifted my head from John's breast and looked into his eyes.

"Is there any memory between us, John; any shadow of the past?" I inquired of him anxiously.

"I will have no past; I have loved for the first time," he cried.

"I woke you as the Prince woke the Princess," I laughed.

> "I'd sleep another hundred years,
> Oh, love, for such another kiss," he quoted, and I stared in astonishment at John repeating love poetry. I took those two letters and flung them in the grate. "They are gone, and that ends all mysteries," I said. "I have confessed until I am weary of it. My mind is like a clean piece of paper. Let's play we were wandering in space until to-day, and just found our souls. I wish I were not so ghostly-looking."

"I think you prettier than ever," he smiled.

"Then you must really and truly care for me," I said, "for this very morning Liz said no one would ever think I had any good looks at all."

He caught both my hands. "Dearest, I love you," he said, and from that moment I never doubted him. Of course, grandfather had to come in then, and he grinned as he looked at us.

"I allus thought you two liked each other," he said, "but it took a powerful long time to find it out."

He was very merry at the tea-table with the usual jokes about my cooking and domestic failings, but I silenced him by saying John had a living conscience now, not he.

"Wal, I ain't too willing to give it to him," said grandfather, almost lovingly, and for that speech I forgave all his teasing. I have made that old cynic love me, and I am proud of myself every time I think of it.

"A colt 'thout speerit don't make no kind o' hoss," grandfather said, when I gently refreshed his memory about calling me skittish. I have never nonplussed him yet.

That moonlight night John sent for his horses and drove me out on the beach. What an enchanted world it was; the glorious silver sky, the plashing of the breakers, the tiny curl of foam splashing the horses' feet and the dark blue sea, gentle in motion as the breathing of a happy sleeper. At that creek where I nearly lost my life John turned to me. It was only a thread of silver now creeping along the sand, but I remembered and shuddered, and, of course, he had to thank me, as lovers do, for saving his dear life.

"I was only thinking about my property," I laughed; "do you know you called me 'darling' that night, for all your marble calm. I read those words in a book once, they fit you so well."

"I have loved you from that day in New Orleans," he said, solemnly. "I fought a long battle with myself, and wherefore? Oh, it was bitterly hard to play father confessor to you."

"About Jim, too," I said, for I was in one of my contrary moods. "I only wanted to marry him because I was tired of home, and I thought, some day, when you were dead, we could live in the big house and the garden would be mine."

"Poor little Eve. I am lucky you did not get Justina to charm me, so that I would wither away and let you get the property sooner."

"Justina says she knew I would marry you, and that was why she told me once the big house would be mine."

"Justina has more staircase wit than any woman I ever saw," laughed John.

"What is staircase wit?"

"The things you remember that you might have said when it is too late. Oh, my pet, what little creatures of to-day we are, at best! Look at the eternal sea, the countless stars, the night that never fails, the days that always dawn. In the great drama of nature and time, how infinitely small are human lives; less than the sands on the shore. A breath, and we are gone; our tragedies are closely followed by a comedy. We love, we forget, and why not? Is it not best to grasp all the happiness we can in passing, our journey is so short?"

"Is it not better that the dead be forgotten," I said, "than that they should harass the living? To give love to those who can feel it rather than to waste it in tears? The blessings to a poor home is better than a costly monument. Oh, dearest, let us live in to-day. If the ghosts of great dead men came back to earth, who among our great men could live? I am weary of the past. I want the present."

"You are such a deep and old philosopher, you make me feel frivolous, and yet I am near forty."

"The best of that is," I laughed, "that I shall never be a frump to you. Women grow old so much faster than men, and that is why boy and girl marriages are often unhappy. I shall keep my good looks and youth when you are too old to care for anything but gruel and a warm hearth."

We drove home to the mansion, where Bruce took the horses, and John and I walked in the rose garden.

"Come, walk in the rose garden, your own enchanted land. Let me fill your arms with flowers and your pretty head with poetry. I will fling away twenty years of my life to be young and a lover."

How much I loved him words cannot express—my other soul. Had we never met, I believe I should have gone unloving to my grave. In the morning, trouble began again—it seemed I never could walk save in tangled paths. He came to bid me "good-bye." He would not believe that Katherine was dead until he had been to Havre. There should be no mistake, he said fiercely.

Digitized by Google

"You are going to find Dean Gregory," I cried, "and you will come back a murderer."

He talked gently and kindly to me, and then promised all I wished him to, his face so white and haggard that, had I not been in one of my worst moods, it would have stricken me to my wicked heart. I even watched him go away without calling after him that I was sorry, but two days later I wrote a most pitiful and penitent letter, which he answered so nobly and forgivingly that I cried myself to sleep for two nights.

Justina was a great comfort during the long weeks of his absence. She read the cards to me every day, and there were always red ones that meant good luck, hearts and diamonds, instead of clubs that are sorrows, and spades that mean death. No dark man travelling in the King of Spades interfered, so my heart grew lighter. I wrote once that I did not believe in Justina's fortune-telling, but a person who never changes his mind is a fool.

My days were somewhat enlivened by preparing my trousseau, all John's gift, and when grandfather had scolded him about it, John said it was a Mexican custom to provide a bride's trousseau, as it is.

When Mrs. Scott came home she sent for me and told me John had said I was to be her daughter now; that she had always loved me, even in my naughty days; and she was so glad that he would be happy. She would not believe God meant his life to be all shadow. Every time I went to the great house she decked me with some of her girlish finery, long laid away quaint jewels, and soft laces, and all manner of pretty things.

"Katherine never let me love her," she said one day, "but you are such a sweet and lovable child, I begin to feel you are my own, as dear to me as my little daughter that died in her childhood."

She read the cards to me every day.

Once she showed me a miniature of that child, and cried over it as mothers do over dead babies, even when near a half-century has passed.

One morning that I shall never forget, I got a telegram: "I will be with you to-night. All is well.—JOHN." And then my waiting was forgotten in the joy of that near meeting.

CHAPTER XVI.

WHEN John came I was at the great house with his mother, waiting on the steps. He kissed her first, and then, taking my hand, led me into the library.

"She is dead, dear," he said. "When I knew that I went no farther than Havre. I did not let myself think of Dean at all. Will you believe me?"

"I never doubted you," I cried, "only I was so miserable when you went away, I had to be hateful."

"And now all the past is passed. See!" He drew aside the plush curtain, and where Katherine's portrait had been, was now a marine scene, a wreck drifting before a storm, a wild frothing sea, and low hanging, black sky. A picture one would not wish to gaze on often, especially we folks, who live so near the sea, and know its cruelty and disasters. I understood why he desired no pleasant scene. He did not wish to look even where the beautiful face had been.

"I have forgotten that I ever lived," he said, passionately. "I only know the life of to-day, and that I love you. Kiss me and let me claim my wife."

I put out my arms and he held me close to his heart. "Shall we be married to-morrow?" he pleaded, his lips close to mine. "I almost fear to trust the future; life has been so cruel to me."

"Any time you will. I was so miserable when you were gone, time dragged so. And John, I even went back to Justina, back to my old sinful ways; but she told me by the cards you would come home safe and soon—and haven't you?"

"We'll employ her hereafter for a family sybil, a familiar witch of Endor right in the house; and you know even King Solomon did not disdain witchcraft, and no one would expect more wisdom from you than from him. Are the gowns all finished? I know your dainty soul; and are they to your liking?"

I described each one and he did not seem bored at all. He drew me over to the sofa and looked at me fondly.

"You are as plump and pretty as ever, and that is not flattering to me. You never pined a bit."

"You told me long ago I was vulgarly fat; besides, I had to fill out my new finery. Give a woman dressmaking and an unlimited purse, and she will not pine very much."

"Is it those quaint gowns you wear and look so lovely in, 'broidered with silver in odd devices, with bodices, and queer sleeves, and all those little frills you affect, that makes you look like a picture?" he laughingly inquired.

"The idea of your noticing!"

"I know every gown you wear, every lace, pin, and ribbon. I could pick out your particular hat among a thousand. See, I brought you a big diamond ring. Is it rich enough for you? It looks so pretty on your little brown hand. You will travel in diamonds now, according to Justina."

"She meant good luck," I laughed, admiring my new ring.

"You are such a child," he muttered, half sadly.

"That can be remedied in time, John. I wonder if you will like my wedding gown—dead white, soft silk, and lined every inch with silk; I am so extravagant, but it does rustle so beautifully. It is like a shroud, Justina said."

I laid my cheek against his sleeve. How handsome he looked with that smile on his lips, the love light in his beautiful eyes.

Just then Mrs. Scott called us to dinner, and after that John and I wandered in the rose garden, and I promised to be his wife the next day. It almost seemed as if we were defying fate and all the ghosts of the past to be happy.

My wedding day! How odd it is to wake in one's own little white room, and think that never again will the past days come back. That one's very identity is gone. Letty Lombard on the morrow would have vanished from the earth. The moonlight would sift through the tiny window on my empty bed, over the pillow where my head would never rest again.

Then I wondered who would sleep there in the years to come, when the cottage would have passed into other hands. Would some young maid's story be half written there, her innocent dreams and vanities, her thoughts of a lover, her joy at his coming? Would he take her away, and she, like me, whisper farewell to her girlhood, dreading the future, yet by dear love guided to her fate as a wife and mother? I wrote as I finished dressing, "Violet Scott" on a bit of paper, then burned it guiltily with a match.

My last day at home was such a curious one. It seemed as though somebody was dead, the house was so quiet, and Liz going about her work on tiptoe. She gave me a few lectures on how to behave in the big house, especially "never to set foot in the kitchen. I must never sile my han's." Aunt Marg and I had some long happy talks, and I loved her better than ever before.

Digitized by Google

When we drove to the great house, I held her hand all the way. I could hardly realise that I was about to act the star part in that supreme drama in a woman's life. In fact I wanted to run away. I had the carriage window down, and let the cool air off the sea blow across my burning face and lift my hair. I felt as I had done when, possessed by my devouring curiosity, I had taken too much champagne just to see how it felt.

The mansion wore a gala air, with its lighted windows and flowers everywhere. Bruce opened the carriage door with tremendous solemnity, and Mrs. Scott led me to her room to put on my veil. Across the hall was a beautiful chamber, all newly decked in blue and gilt.

"This is your room, dear," she said, leading me there. "You are to stay a week at home before you go to Mexico."

But I would not look at the fine place or anything. I ran away.

"I believe I am almost sick of this getting married," I said miserably. "It makes me think I must be old and solemn all my life."

She pinned my veil, while her maid, a pretty quadroon, helped me put on my long gloves. After Mrs. Scott went down to greet the minister, Aunt Marg came to cry over me, and bid the Letty Lombard—her charge and a doubtful blessing for nearly nineteen years—"good-bye." She was very white and sad, and not until afterward did I realise why she was so strange.

"It is so hard, so bitterly hard," she sobbed.

"But I will be near you always," I said, "and I know I shall be better than I am now; one gets so grown up and womanly after marriage."

She smiled tearfully, going softly out, and who should creep in then but Justina. How she admired me! told the maid I was her baby, her Chica; she had saved my life; and then, as she turned to leave me, she put out her hands in a frightened way, and that queer, blurred look came into her eyes. She ran away from me, and Liz dragged her down the back stairs, where I heard her moaning and muttering her prayers.

I stood in the hall, scared and miserable. A presentiment of misfortune came to me; how or when it would fall I could not think; but the dim corners of the room seemed peopled with eerie shadows, as if the ghosts of those murdered men came back to mock my happiness. Someone touched my shoulder, and I turned with a scared cry. It was only John; and how relieved I was!

"I was thinking of horrible things—ghosts," I stammered. "Oh, John, forgive me for saying that," as I saw his face sadden; "but this place is so big and strange to me."

"Your besetting sin, Justina, has been giving you her blessing," he said, sternly. "If it were not for that day when I met her, long ago, and gave you, a helpless baby to her care, you should never see Justina again."

"Indeed!" I said hotly.

He took my hands then and laughed in my face. "Do you hear the matrimonial shackles clank, dearest? Oh, you sweet, wilful Letty! Am I doing right to link your young life with mine?"

"To a silly thing like me," I said, "but don't be too masterful, John, or you will learn what a temper I have. And I have tried so hard. There is your mother. Must we go down?"

As we went down the stairs, a hush came over me, a solemn feeling, as if I was standing by a coffin, my dead girl's-life. I noticed the people in the room, grandfather, Aunt Marg, Mrs. Scott, and the minister, the servants peeping in at the door, and the odour of flowers massed in profusion. I saw the lace curtain wave to and fro in the light breeze that blew across the perfumed garden and brought the breath of roses to me. Far off the splashing of the sea chimed with the low solemnly spoken words that made us man and wife.

He drew aside the plush curtain.

Was that my voice, faint and far away, saying "I will"? Could I never undo what I had done? unsay those words?

I lifted my eyes as the minister blessed us, and I saw Justina crossing herself with that blurred look in her eyes. When we rose from our knees, John kissed me and whispered, "My wife!" I was not Letty Lombard any more. Aunt Marg and Mrs. Scott called me by my new name, and grandfather, especially, took much pride in it, and I had to hug him and rumple his hair to show him marriage had not changed my ways.

I went up to that blue room and took off my wedding veil. How odd I looked in the big mirror, so young and shy, so childish with my short hair, even in my long gown. John came in and stood smiling at me.

"Come out into the garden, Letty. Can I find you a wrap? It is cool in the night air. I told your maid to put your things here. You will find me handy in waiting on you."

He found the wrap, and we went out into the garden, and, somehow, I wished that I had never known Jim, or wandered with him there. It was late when we turned back to the house, where I saw grandfather make his farewells, and Aunt Marg with her bonnet on.

"It seems as if I ought to go with them," I said, laying my cheek against his sleeve. As we stepped into the porch, I heard the rattle of wheels on the carriage drive to the house.

"Why, Margaret insisted on walking," John muttered, "yet that must be the carriage."

"She never changes her mind," I said, half fearfully; a sudden chill passed over me and I shivered. At that moment a bell pealed through the house, and I saw Bruce go along the hall, and as he went he shut the parlour door. We stood and listened, as people will at anything unusual happening. There was loud talking at the door, Bruce expostulating; then John, looking white and worried, went suddenly and opened the parlour door. He had scarcely reached the threshold when Bruce, ashy with terror, pushed him back forcibly into the room, crying in agonised tones:

"Fo' de good Lawd's sake, Mars John, don't yo' come out heah!"

(To be continued next week.)

Digitized by Google

THE MYSTERY OF A STOVE.

THERE were five of us in the party—six, counting Tom, the guide, and we were out on the Rockies, shooting. After two days' hard climbing, which we endured with exemplary fortitude, we arrived at the little valley high up in the mountains, which was our destination.

"Jest you all go over into the cabin there and make yourselves comf'ble, while I 'tend to getting the stuff unpacked," said Tom; "there ain't no one there. My pardner, he's down below."

"The cabin appears to be two cabins," said the Colonel, as we approached it.

"That is for economy in ridge-poles," said the doctor; "sleeping apartments on one side and kitchen on the other. In the space between, you keep your stores."

We entered the right-hand section of the twin cabin, which proved to be the kitchen side. There was not much furniture—a table of hewn logs, a chair of bent saplings, and a rough bench.

However, we did not notice such furniture as there was, for each member of the party, as he stepped over the high threshold, had his attention instantly attracted by the stove, and a brief roundelay of ejaculations went along the group.

"Well, that's somewhat strange," said the stockbroker.

"H'm," said the professor, in a mysterious tone, and rubbed his chin.

The stove was a plain, small cooking-range, rather old and rusty. The strange thing about it was its position. Its abbreviated legs stood upon large cedar posts, which were planted in the floor and were over four feet in height. This brought the stove up in mid-air, so that the top was about on a level with the face of the Colonel, and he was six foot two.

We formed in a circle about the stove and stared at it. We felt the posts—they were firm and solid, showing that the mysterious arrangement was a permanent, not a temporary one. Then we all bent our necks and opened our mouths to look up at the hole in the roof through which the stove-pipe vanished.

Suddenly the stockbroker burst into a laugh. "Oh, I understand it now," said he.

"Understand what?" said the Colonel sharply.

"Why Tom has his stove hoisted up so high from the floor."

"So do I," said the doctor; "but I suspect that my explanation is not the same that anyone else would offer."

"Well, I will bet that I am all right," said the stockbroker, "and put up the money."

"I am in this," said the lawyer; "I have a clear idea about that stove, and will back it."

"Count me in too," said the Colonel.

The stockbroker drew a small yellow coin out of his pocket and dropped it on the table.

"He has the stove up there," he said, "to get a better draught. In this rarefied mountain air there is only a small amount of oxygen to the cubic inch, and combustion is more difficult to secure than in the lower latitudes.

"I have heard that if you get high enough up you can't cook an egg—that is, I mean, water won't boil—or something like that," he continued, thrown into sudden confusion by the discovery that the professor's eye was fixed upon him with a sarcastic glance.

"Is that supposed to be science?" demanded the professor.

"Well," said the stockbroker doggedly, "never mind the reasons. Experience is probably good enough for Tom. He finds that he gets a better draught for his stove by having it up in mid-air, so he has it there."

"The right explanation," began the professor, "is the simplest. My idea is that ——"

"Excuse me," interrupted the stockbroker, tapping the table; "are you in this pool?"

The professor made a deposit and proceeded:

"Have you noticed that our host is a very tall man? Like most men of his height, he hates to bend. If the stove were near the floor, he would have to stoop down low when he cooked a rasher of bacon. Now he can stand up and do it with ease. Your draught theory is no good; the longer the pipe, if it is straight, the better the fire will burn."

"Professor," remarked the Colonel, "I regret to have to tell you that your money is gone. Tom told me on the way up that his partner did all the cooking, and he is a man of rather short stature."

The Colonel then paid his compliments to the pool, and continued: "Now, my idea is that the stove heats the room better there than on the floor. It is only a cooking-stove, but when the winter is cold, it makes this room comfortable. Being up in the middle of the space, it heats it all equally well, which it could not do if it were down below."

The doctor greeted this theory with a loud laugh. "Colonel," he said, "you are wild—right off the mark. Hot air rises, of course, and the only way to disseminate it is to have your stove as low as possible."

"I think," said the Colonel, "that I could appreciate your argument better if you would put your money in the pool."

"The pool is mine," said the doctor, as he deposited his coin; "you will all adopt my idea the moment you hear it, and Tom, who will be here in a minute, will bear me out. This room is very small; it has but little floor space and none of it goes to waste. Now, if he had put the stove down where we expected to find it, Tom could not have made use of the area underneath as you see he has done.

"On all sides of the supporting posts you will notice there are hooks, on which he hangs his pans. Underneath there is a space for pots and cooking utensils of various sorts. What could be more convenient? Under your ordinary stove there is room only for a poker and a few cockroaches."

The lawyer, who had been listening to the opinions offered by the others, now stepped forward and dropped a coin on the table. He then rendered his decision as follows:

"It appears that none of you have noticed the forest of hooks in the roof just over the eaves. They are not in use at present, but they are there for some purpose. I imagine that during the winter huge pieces of venison and bear's meat dangle over the stove and are dried for later use. Now if the stove were on the floor it would be too far from the roof to be of any service in this way."

"Here comes old Tom!" shouted the Colonel, who had stepped to the open door while the lawyer was speaking.

The old trapper put down the various articles of baggage with which his arms were loaded, and came into the kitchen cabin where we all stood. He glanced at the group and then at the stilted stove in our midst.

"I see you air all admirin' my stove," said he, "and I'll bet you've been a-wondering why it is up so high."

"Yes, we have," said the professor; "how did you know it?"

"People most allus generally jest as soon as they come into the place begin to ask me about it—that's how I knowed."

"Well, why is it up so high?" demanded the stockbroker impatiently, with a side glance at the well-developed pool on the table.

"The reason's simple enough," said Tom, with a grin that showed his bicuspids; "you see we had to pack all this stuff up here from down below on donkeys. Originally there was four j'ints of that stove pipe, but the cording wasn't drawed tight enough on the donkeys that was carrying them, and two of 'em slipped out and rolled down the mountain. When we got here and found that there wasn't but two pieces left, I reckoned that I would have to kinder h'ist the stove to make it fit the pipe; so I jest in and h'isted her. And thar she is yet. Say, what is all this here money on the table for?"

There was a deep silence, which lasted so long that Tom ventured to repeat his question about the money.

"It is a pool," said the doctor sadly, "and, as near as I can make out, it belongs to you."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE
FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. S. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON · S.W.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES. TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s. 6d.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.
LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.
LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S M.B. FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth. For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Adresse de M. SUEZ, 9, Rue de Prony, PARIS

VINAIGRE LACTÉ de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE

EAU de SUEZ

VACCINE for the MOUTH
Strengthens the Gums
Perfumes the Breath
The only Dentifrice securing
BEAUTIFUL TEETH

POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICES DE SUEZ

London Agents: WILCOX & Co, 239, Oxford Street.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND, 1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

Patronised by Royalty.

SILK UMBRELLAS

Direct from the Manufacturer, 2/6 each.

Ladies' or Gents' Plain or Twill Silk. Parker's Hollow-Ribbed Frames, Carved and Mounted Sticks.

THE "PARKER" UMBRELLA REGISTERED

Sent Parcel Post Free, 2/9 Postal Order (or 36 Stamps).

Re-covering neatly done, Plain or Twill Silk, Ladies' or Gents', 2/6 each, returned next post. List and Testimonials Free.

J. B. PARKER, Umbrella Works, Broom Close, SHEFFIELD.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

HOW TO BOTTLE Tomatoes, Gooseberries, Currants, &c., with (or without) sugar, Dry Cherries, Peaches, etc.; make Tomato Marmalade, Green Tomato Jam, Tomato Sauce, Ginger Beer, Lemonade, Gooseberry Champagne, British Champagne, Pickle Plums, Apples, etc. Over 100 excellent New Recipes in "SMITH'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA of New Methods of Bottling Fruits, and making Jams, Jellies, Marmalades, Preserves, Wines, and Summer Drinks." 48 pages, price 6d., post free —Address,

JAMES SMITH,
WALLANDS PARK GARDENS, LEWES, SUSSEX.

MELVILLE'S New Upright GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE,
61, Charing Cross Road, London.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice, both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect. Letters to be addressed, D. COLLINS, Gothic House 9, Erskine Street, Liverpool.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 294.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 18, 1894. [Price One Penny.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS LIVER COMPLAINTS
SICK HEADACHE DYSPEPSIA A Splendid Tonic and Gentle Aperient.

MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.

Sold in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each, by all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BEETHAM'S WORLD FAMED CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists, CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

THREE HALF CROWNS

IT IS A STARTLING FACT that Three Half-Crowns (7/6) will purchase a beautiful SERGE DRESS LENGTH in any of the following colours:—Black, Blue, Brown, Green, Claret, Nut Brown, Chestnut, Mulberry, Ruby, Red, Moss, Olive, Myrtle, Bronze, &c, also several very pretty and effective mixtures.

Full Dress Length (Carriage Paid) FOR 7/6

Money returned if not approved.

20,000 Sets of Patterns now ready, write at once. Patterns are sent Post Free and need not be returned.

These beautiful Serges are specially manufactured for Autumn and Winter wear, elegant in appearance and are not heavy as most Serges are. They will not spot with rain or wear threadbare.

£5,000 to be Given Away in Presents to Purchasers.

Thousands of Testimonials from all parts of the World.

Cloth Table Covers, 2 yds. square, 4s. 9d. each, in Crimson, Claret, Tan, or Emerald. Remnant Bundles of Serge, 5s. and 10s. each, carriage paid. Write to-day for Patterns of Dress Materials, post free to any address. (Dept 21)

LUTAS LEATHLEY & CO., The Dress Warehouse, Armley, Leeds.

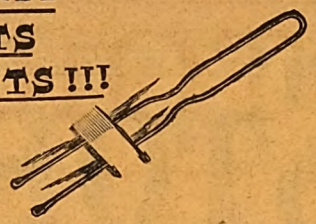
PREVENTS COLDS AND CHILLS

BOVRIL

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST STOCK FOR SOUP.

Digitized by Google

A HAIR PIN
WITHOUT POINTS
HAS GOOD POINTS !!!
SEE THE POINT ?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES. BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s. 6d.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.
LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.
LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

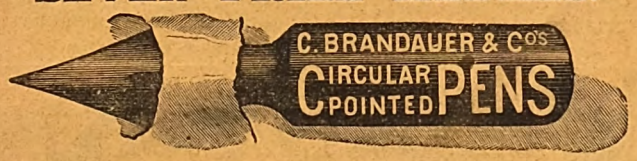
If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S STRENGTHENING SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from

THE INFANTINA CO.,
LONDON, S.W.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR.

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES, &c.

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 ... Black
No. 2 ... Dark Brown
No. 3 ... Light Brown
No. 4 ... Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 ... Pure Golden

No. 6 ... Imperial Hair Grower

Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED)
J. BRODIE, 41, Museum Street, London.
Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

HAIR REMOVED permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope. G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 294.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING AUGUST 18, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

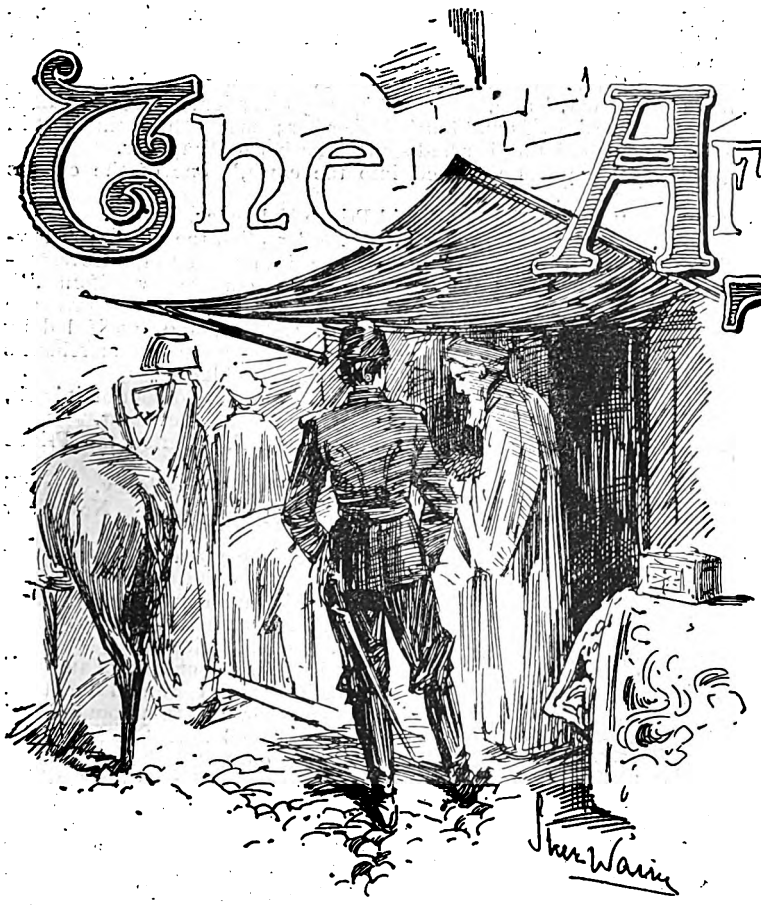
The Afghan's Turquoise



SAMARCAND possesses in perfection the peculiarities of the Oriental cities so well described in the marvellous stories of the Thousand and One Nights. It is an aggregation of low buildings enclosed in whitewashed walls, its bazaars teeming with specimens of all that Asia can offer of different types and colours of the human race, from milk-white through clear yellow and saffron to ebon black.

The merchandise there displayed is as diverse as the people—simple calabashes, fashioned out of the shell of the cocoa-nut, coming from the Indian Ocean; vases of enamelled silver from the Caucasus; primitive bridles of half-tanned leather thongs; gorgeous saddles and caparisons, covered with turquoises set in unalloyed gold; and clothes of Russian make, side by side with Oriental stuffs woven in marvellous colours that delight the eye.

In the midst of the bright scene was a group of Russian officers, mounted on the lithe-limbed ponies of the steppes—beautiful beasts, full of intelligence, though only half tamed as yet. As the officers passed through the bazaar, they stopped here and there to examine, sometimes to purchase some article that struck their fancy—a chibouk, with a long, jasmine wood stem, wound with gold and bright-hued silk; shoes, gay with multi-coloured mosaics of Morocco, or strangely figured dressing-gowns from Bokhara.

All Rights Reserved.

One of these officers stopped at the little show-case in which a merchant displayed his most precious wares, and examined a necklace formed of large beads of ambergris and musk, with a great turquoise, cut in the form of a pyramid, hung at its apex. The stone was of a magnificent blue—the blue of the sky after a shower, so pure, so soft, that the sight of it was a caress to the eye.

"How much?" asked the officer, indicating the necklace.

"Five hundred English pounds, not a penny less," replied the shopman, a Persian merchant, attired in an elegant gown of violet silk, embroidered with gold and silver thread.

"Come, come; no joking. You ask too much," said the officer, who had adopted the invariable Eastern custom of haggling over any and all bargains.

"You need not take it," said the Persian; "in fact, I could not sell it to you now. Perhaps in five days I may be able to let you have it. I promised to keep it that long. The person from whom I had it stipulated that time in which to buy it back."

"Indeed!" said the officer, descending from his horse to examine the ornament more closely; "and who is this person?"

"A woman, and a very beautiful one. She belongs to the harem of an Afghan emir, who has gone to Cabul and is expected back any day now. She was obliged to pawn the stone, finding herself out of money."

"A beautiful Afghan, eh?" broke in one of the other officers from his saddle; "we must see her. It might be possible to profit by the absence of the emir. What do you say, gentlemen?"

"I do not know where she lives," said the Persian, suddenly becoming very grave.

"Are you lying to us, you old rascal?" laughed the officer. "But come, we are blocking the wheels of trade, and all because of a turquoise and a woman. Come, Prince Voldemar, let us go on."

"Wait a moment," replied the officer to whom these words were addressed—he who had dismounted to examine the turquoise; "I shall come to-morrow, alone," he added in the merchant's ear; "meanwhile, put this necklace aside and show it to no one. If the lady of whom you speak does not come, I shall buy it. The inscription pleases me: 'That which is past is a dream—that which remains, a desire.'"

Digitized by Google

"I shall obey your Highness," replied the Persian, as he received the ornament from the officer's white-gloved hands, and deposited it in an Indian coffer of green ivory, crusted with silver.

The officers departed at a gallop, amused at the fright of the peasants who fled before them, pressing themselves against the walls and shop fronts. Soon they emerged from the narrow street of the bazaar into a square surrounded by covered galleries, in the middle of which stood a basin of marble, green with age, in which played a little fountain of limpid water. The fountain was shaded by a roof sustained by slender columns of blue-enamelled porcelain, about which were twined dragons and serpents in relief.

"Where shall we go now?" asked one of the officers, turning towards the others. "We must find something to do."

"Easier said than done," returned one of his companions; "there is absolutely nothing to do in this dog's country. If the powers that be would only find us a little fighting to do, it would be a very welcome diversion."

Astonishing young women danced before him.

"Yes, if we could kill a few Afghans once in a while, it would keep our livers in order. But no, we must simply sit down and wait."

While his companions railed at their fate, Prince Voldemar remained silent and pre-occupied, though he showed no less ennui than they in the pure and commanding lineaments of his handsome face. He had come to Asia a year before to lead an active military life; but, save a few skirmishes with Bokharan marauders, who were not even brigands, he had found nothing but the enervating existence of the Orient, in which life seems one long waiting for something that never comes.

Having a large revenue at his disposal, he had for a time amused himself by furnishing his house after the fashions of Central Asia. He had a Sartian salon, a Mongolian salon, an Indian work-cabinet where it was impossible to do anything but dream, a Russian dining-room, furnished with heavy wooden furniture, painted and varnished in the ancient Muscovite style. His house was crowded to the ceiling with bibelots. He gave his companions entertainments after the fashion of the country; astonishing young women danced before him and gazed languishingly at him from beneath their Sartian veils, but not one of them had the fortune to fix his attention.

A general brought out his daughter, a pretty little blonde, from the convent at Smolna. She married within the year—the favoured one being an adroit aide-de-camp of the General—and devoted herself to her duties as a young wife and soon as a young mother. The animation she had brought to her father's dinners and receptions, and the riding excursions into the country, ceased almost immediately after the wedding. Again the old question, "What shall we do to be amused?" presented itself. The young men drank and gambled, but Prince Voldemar, who cared neither for wine nor cards, relapsed into a state of inertia little better than melancholy.

Seated now by the fountain, gazing blankly at the tiny thread of water that shot up in its midst, he vaguely heard its gentle plash mingling with the complaints of his companions.

Suddenly a shadow fell on the sun-whitened square. The Prince raised his head and sought the object that could cause this purpling shadow. He beheld a grey horse, trotting quickly along, covered with a cloth of green and rose colour embroidered with silver, the bridle and head-stall starred with facets of onyx, on which were engraved verses from the Koran; at its breast shone an enormous stone of citron colour in a silver setting and a fringe of little balls of onyx, green, cream-coloured, red, and orange, embellished in rich trappings. At the side of the superb beast ran an Afghan servant, and gracefully installed in the red velvet saddle was a woman. She was carefully veiled from head to foot, her blue and gold garment falling in graceful folds about her. The horse traversed the square at a sharp trot and in the twinkling of an eye the vision disappeared.

"Who is that woman?" the officers wondered; "we must find out," and, delighted at any diversion, they turned their horses' heads and hurried after her; but the brief time lost in contemplating her had sufficed for her to disappear.

"She has vanished into the earth," one of the officers declared.

"Or into the sky," said Prince Voldemar.

"Always poetical, Prince," replied the officer; "however, it is dinner time and we are invited to the Governor-General's. We have just time to change our uniforms."

A few days later Prince Voldemar had his favourite mare, Smaragda (Emerald), saddled, and, as if led by the hand of fate, he returned to the Persian merchant's shop and asked for the turquoise necklace.

"The lady returned and bought it back, Excellency," replied the merchant.

"Confound the luck!" cried the Prince angrily.

"Console yourself, Excellency, I shall find another to please you. Now, how would this——"

The Prince glanced abstractedly at the stones the merchant spread before him in an onyx vase, pouring them out of a sack of rose-coloured silk, broidered with gold.

"There is not one so beautiful," he said, "and I wanted the other. Do you know who this woman is?"

"No, Excellency. She came here mounted on a grey horse, covered with a green and rose cloth, which I admired greatly, such as are made only at Homs, in Syria. She told me that her father had bought it for her on his return from a pilgrimage to Mecca."

"What's that you say?" cried the Prince. "It must be the same woman. Had she an Afghan with her?"

"Yes, Excellency; she was closely veiled, but as she counted the gold she gave me, she raised a corner of her veil, and I saw her superb eyes and a complexion like the petal of a white rose."

"I will give you two hundred roubles if you will find this woman and the turquoise for me."

"Excellency, how should I find them? I stay always in my shop, and I did not see which way she went. The city is large, and the houses are mysterious behind their walls. But I can commend to you a Jew who comes to buy merchandise in the bazaar to sell to the porters of the houses. He may be able to give you some information. Perhaps he knows this unknown. But be guarded, Excellency; if she be the wife of an Afghan, it will be dangerous to pursue this adventure. The Afghans have an evil name—and they are jealous."

"I fear no Afghans. Send me this Jew this evening," replied the Prince, remounting his horse.

In vain he rode slowly through the streets about the square, peering at the houses; no young Afghan woman appeared at any of the narrow windows. Only one daughter of India showed her wrinkled face on a high terrace, surrounded by a lattice on which clambered a sweet-smelling jasmine. Prince Voldemar looked at her and called—which was quite enough to frighten her away. It was midday, and the burning sun had driven the hardiest within doors. The Prince, weary of his quest, determined to return to his house, feeling that he must cut a ridiculous figure as the only living being in this city of the Sleeping Beauty of the Wood.

Digitized by Google

He followed the narrow streets that led to his habitation; at the sound of his horse's hoofs the servants ran out and opened the gate, which gave entrance to a vine-covered gallery. The Prince stroked his horse's neck and entered the Sartian salon, which was lighted by a cupola of yellow glass, in discs like the bottoms of bottles. A table set in the Russian style awaited him; his great, white hound rose lazily from its couch on a tiger skin and leaned its head upon his knee for a caress.

The Prince ate quickly, and slipped on an Asiatic costume composed of trousers and a khalat of light Bokharan silk. Then he stretched himself out on a divan, and gave himself up to dreams of the turquoise and the mysterious beauty. The hours dragged slowly along; the servants were still, awaiting the commands of their master. The Prince fell into that condition of semi-somnolence that the Orientals call kieff, in which existence is suspended—one is half-asleep and half-awake, one knows that one lives and yet scarce lives. The Asiatic delights in this condition. The European endures it, but, at bottom, it wearies him and seems almost like some melancholy nightmare.

A breath of fresh air stirred the orange, citron, and pomegranate trees in the garden, and came in through the wide, arched door of the Sartian salon. The profound silence was broken only by the gentle song of a bird peculiar to China and Central Asia—a bird whose song seems pervaded with melancholy; it commences in a high key, which sinks by slow gradations to the bass notes, and forms a kind of despairing wail, which affects the hearer as an inexpressible sorrow.

At six o'clock the hound rose with a deep growl. A djighit appeared at the door: "A Jew craves talk with your Highness; he dares to say he is expected. Shall he be thrust into the street?"

"No; let him come in," replied the Prince quickly.

The Jew entered a few moments later. He advanced with low obeisance and stood respectfully a few paces from the Prince, glancing timidly from the Prince to the hound, which was showing its enormous white fangs.

"Highness, am I so blessed as to be of service to you?" he said, laying one hand on his skinny chest. He was clothed in a gown of lavender silk, worn by usage and faded by the sun. The two hooped earrings that hung beneath his turban trembled in his abjectness and timidity.

"The Persian has doubtless told you what I desire," said the Prince; "find me this woman and the turquoise. Can you do it?"

"Can I?" replied the Jew: "I could find you a needle lost in the sands at the ocean's shore; I could find it for you and I would bring it to you, by Moses and Aaron I swear it. Do you want the turquoise first or the woman?"

"Well—if I want the turquoise first?"

"Very good—I will steal it. What would I not do for so magnanimous a Prince, who deigns to make use of a poor Jew?"

"Can you do it—no lies, now!"

"May I never celebrate the Sabbath next week if I do not succeed," replied the Jew; "and, in the first place, I will venture to suggest to your Highness that, having the turquoise first, the pretext is provided for attracting the lady. As to returning the turquoise, that is your affair; but you can keep them both—the turquoise and the woman—if it please your Highness to do so."

"As to that, we shall see," responded the Prince; "I know the stone, and it pleases me. I do not know the woman—she remains to be seen."

"Then I crave permission to leave your Highness. This night, by two o'clock, you shall have the stone. One of my colleagues has entrance to many houses of the city, and this one should be of their number," and the Jew, renewing his obeisances, retired from the room.

The Prince remained for a moment in deep thought.

"I will return the turquoise," he said at last, "for it is only by robbery that this Jew can procure it—at least, if she will not give it to me."

It was only eleven o'clock when Prince Voldemar returned home from a reception at the Governor-General's house, but he found awaiting him the Jew, who offered him a carved sandal-wood box, in which lay the necklace and the turquoise.

"She lives in the street of the Sartians," said the Jew, without waiting for the Prince to recover from his surprise; "the second house from the Square of the Fountain."

"Let us go there, then—you shall show me the house—for I have no desire to sleep on such a brilliant moonlit night."

"Follow me, Excellency. But, pray, do not forget that at two hours before dawn I must pay the price of the theft to an old Hindoo woman who serves as laundress in the household of the Afghan lady, whose name is Adaita. The Hindoo is afraid the robbery will be discovered, and at daybreak she joins a caravan on its way to Cabul."

"How much do you want?" demanded the Prince.

"Two hundred English pounds for her and three hundred for me. It is very little, Excellency."

The Prince said not a word, but entered his bed-chamber. There he threw aside the fold of the many-coloured tapestries and disclosed the little iron door of a small safe built into the wall. Opening the safe he drew forth a handful of gold, which he thrust into his pocket, and then counted out five hundred pounds. Closing this secret repository and replacing the hangings so that they offered no suggestion of concealing an opening, he returned to the Sartian salon and paid the sum due to the Jew, who outdid himself in bows and thanks.

A few minutes later the Prince, mounted on a black Persian horse, and the Jew, astride of a modest ass, made their way, side by side, along the deserted streets of the sleeping city. The moon alone lit up the irregularly paved streets and the staring white walls of the houses.

They soon arrived before a house with an arched entrance of faience in mosaic. Within this arch, between two pillars of green marble, stood a heavy wooden door in which was a small iron-barred window. The Jew tapped lightly on the bars of the window and immediately a brown face appeared, mutely interrogating them.

"Djelana," said the Jew, "here are the two hundred pounds; you can leave with the caravan at dawn."

Djelana mumbled her thanks as she clutched the gold in her skinny hands.

"Is your mistress sleeping?" demanded the Prince.

"No, she is on the terrace. Listen and you will hear her guzla and her song."

A strange melody floated gently towards them from the garden, and they heard a sweet voice singing an Afghan love song, a passionate lament for the absent. The Prince frowned as he caught the meaning of the song—he was jealous already.

"I wish to see her," he declared briefly to the Hindoo woman. "You may go, but leave the gate open and I will enter. You need have no fears for yourself."

The Hindoo woman held out her brown hand. The Prince dropped half a dozen gold pieces into it.

"Enter," said she, "but let me escape," and passing quickly between the horse and the ass, she disappeared round the corner of the street.

"Excellency," said the Jew, spurring up his beast, "may good luck attend you. I have performed what you required of me; I can be of no further service to you. In fact, my ass need bray but once to arouse the neighbourhood.

"Go, you cowardly knave!" muttered the Prince, and making his horse enter the court of the house, he tied it to a ring in the wall and closed the door securely behind him to prevent a surprise. After an instant's search he found a little flight of blue faience steps leading up to the terrace, whence still came the sounds of the guzla. Ascending these steps, he found himself on the terrace, which was covered with white Indian cloths and lit by the moon, which glittered on his silver epaulets and aiguilets.

With a cry of terror, a young woman rose hurriedly from

Digitized by Google

The turquoise, which she took as if in a dream.

couch at the end of the terrace. The officer bowed respectfully before her.

"You need have no fear of me," he said: "permit me to approach you—I shall not advance one step without your permission."

The young woman stared at him with terror in her great dark eyes. She was dressed in a garment of light gauze, which enveloped her supple figure like a transparent cloud. Her arms, bare to the shoulder, were extended before her in a gesture of alarm. Her black tresses fell in heavy waves to her little feet, which were shod in slippers of orange velvet.

The Prince sank upon one knee and laid his hand upon his heart and upon his forehead after the Oriental custom.

"What seek you; what do you want? Allah, Allah, what is this man?"

"What I seek," replied the Prince, "is your love. Since I saw you, some days ago, I have suffered much. Before I had seen you I loved you. I am he who wished to acquire your turquoise at no matter what price. I have it—here it is."

"What! Why—how?" stammered Adaita.

"I had it stolen from you, and I bought it to return it to you. Will you receive it again?"

Adaita evidently feared to advance, so the Prince rose and handed her the turquoise, which she took as if in a dream.

"Unhappy man," said she, "I am married. If my husband should return he would kill us both. Why did you come here? The Afghan women are not for you Russians. Save yourself while there is yet time."

"What is life to me without you?" replied the Prince. "I shall remain."

"Oh, what can you be thinking of? I am lost! Do you see that ruddy line in the east? It is the coming dawn, and my servants will soon be astir. Go, I implore you. My husband has left six Afghans at home; they will murder you. And what is this?—your horse in the courtyard! Come quickly, and fly!"

Terror lent wings to her feet; she flew down the stairs, followed by the Prince, and unfastened the horse with her little jewelled hands.

"Save yourself; go, I implore you!" she cried, and she ran to the gate and flung it open.

The Prince leaped into the saddle.

"I go," he said, "but not without you," and giving her no time for reflection he lifted her before him on the saddle and set out at a gallop for his own house.

That morning, at sunrise, to the consternation of the servants of the Afghan's house, they found the gates of the court-yard open and their mistress gone—disappeared utterly. The Afghan servitor, whose duty it was to accompany the lady on her excursions about the city, signalled to his companions to be silent. Bending over the pavement, he sought for traces of the flight. Here and there, in the interstices between the stones, the sand retained the imprint of a horse's iron-shod hoofs. He emerged from the courtyard and continued his search, never missing the slightest sign. That evening he returned.

"I know where she is," he said; "let us wait for the master's coming."

Meanwhile the Prince was trying to tame the wild dove he had caught. He overwhelmed her with attention and caresses. She ensconced herself in a corner of the divan in the Sartian salon, and would listen to nothing. The Prince gave out that he was ill and would see no one, in order not to be disturbed. To be loved by her, to feel her arms creeping about his neck, to rest her head upon his breast, and kiss her long, silky hair—the Prince would have given his life to experience that sensation of soft delight. He passed the whole day on his knees before his idol; he kissed her feet, but she drew them back affrighted.

"Let me go home," she said; "give me my liberty. I am accursed to be loved by a Christian. I am afraid—I am afraid," and she hid her face in her hands, which he tried to draw away, imploring her to have pity on him. He wept, he sobbed at her feet. His love grew only the stronger, and he neither slept nor ate.

"I am alone and miserable," he cried. "I shall die without your love. Have pity on me! You will soon love me."

Night fell, and the Persian lanterns were lit, and cast a ruddy glow on the rugs and divans. Adaita was tired, languid, worn by the struggle against this handsome young man, who burned her with his breath, clasped her with his nervous hands. He drew her, trembling, toward him.

The Prince's head, with its crisp curls, bent toward her, he kissed her long and passionately, and they were both sinking in a dream of love, when they were startled by a sudden knock on the door.

"Your Highness," said the voice of a djighit, "an Afghan wishes to speak with you. He comes from the Governor-General, and says he cannot wait."

The Prince did not reply at once. He covered Adaita with kisses.

"Your Highness! your Highness!" cried the djighit.

"Yes, I am coming," replied the Prince, gently letting Adaita sink back upon the sofa; "I shall return immediately, my darling, my adored one," he whispered.

He entered his work-cabinet and saw an Afghan whom he did not know.

"What do you want?" he demanded.

The Afghan handed him a note:

"What is this the Emir tells me, my dear Prince?" (the Governor wrote).

'I shall return immediately.'

Digitized by Google

"A woman carried off—at your house? Give her up at once and rid me of this scandal."

"I am waiting," said the Emir, "to kill her. You will understand, Prince, that my wife, having spent a whole day here, is no longer worthy of a true Mohammedan."

The Prince looked at the Emir—a superb warrior, bronzed, with brilliant black eyes and a proud and energetic air; he wore a robe of white cloth embroidered with gold, his green turban was made of costly cashmere and an arsenal of arms, studded with emeralds, rubies and sapphires, thrust in his sash.

"Do you think I shall give her up to you that you may assassinate her? You are mad," replied the Prince, anger and jealousy getting the better of him.

"Then it is you whom I shall kill!" cried the Afghan, drawing his scimitar.

His soul winged its way into the infinite, while his limp body rolled at the feet of the fair Afghan.

The Prince had barely time to spring to a trophy of arms on the wall and seize a yatagan. But the Afghan scimitar, more prompt, fell upon his left arm, making an ugly gash.

"Ah, you would strike me unarmed!" cried the Prince; "now, defend yourself, I shall give no quarter."

The Afghan cast a glance about him and his eye fell on a low table of nacre in the middle of the room, covered with rare bibelots. The Prince saw that it was in the way and with one hand tossed it into the garden. At the crash of its fall a number of djighits rushed into the room and were about to throw themselves upon the Afghan.

"Go! Leave me with this man!" cried the Prince; "I command you."

The djighits retired.

The Afghan took up his stand in the corner of the salon, facing the garden door. He was in the shadow, while the moon threw a white light on the marble pavement of the terrace and the arches about the garden, against which the Prince's figure made a black silhouette.

The combat began with a few passes, in which each tried the other's mettle, the Afghan's scimitar always meeting a firm guard in the Prince's yatagan. Then both drew back to resume the combat with new fury. The Afghan stooped and sought to bring the Prince down by wounding him in the leg. The latter divined this intention let him succeed and, at the same time, drove his weapon into the Afghan's chest till the blood spurted. But, in spite of this wound, the Afghan hurled himself on the Prince and gave him a deep cut in the side; but, in the darkness, he did not see the point of the yatagan concealed in the shadow of the Prince's body, and fell upon it with all his weight. The combat was at an end.

Prince Voldemar, himself dripping with blood, called his djighits.

"Deliver up this body to the Emir's suite," he directed, "and dress my wounds quickly and wash away this blood."

Half an hour later he re-entered the salon where Adaita awaited him. An immense vase of roses filled the room with perfume. The Prince selected a flower and offered it to the young woman. A drop of blood fell from his forehead upon the rose.

"What is that?" cried the startled Adaita.

"It is nothing—a mere scratch on my forehead. A caress from you will cure it," and, sinking upon the divan, he rested his head on the young woman's shoulder.

"Ah, how happy I am," he murmured, with a deep sigh; "you are mine at last, mine alone—my soul, my star, my adored one."

He drew toward him the charming, anxious face of Adaita and exhaled his last breath in a supreme kiss. His soul winged its way into the infinite, while his limp body rolled at the feet of the fair Afghan.

When the djighits entered the Sartian salon in the morning, they found only the corpse of Prince Voldemar, already cold in death. Adaita had disappeared. In spite of all inquiries she was never found. It was thought that she joined one of the caravans then passing through Samarcand on their way to Mecca, and, as a veiled woman is sacred to all Moslems, she was not recognised.

THIS HOUSE TO LET.

"YES," said old Mrs. Pounce, nodding her orange-coloured cap-strings, "they put me in—the House Agency did—to take care of the house, with a bright-painted 'To Let' stuck up in front of the area windows, and coal and house rent free. Which I don't deny, my dear, is an object to a lone female like me, with neither chick nor child, and my own way to make in the world, with fine laundressing out of the question on account of rheumatism in the finger-joints.

"'You seem like a respectable person, Mrs. Pounce, that has seen better days?' was what the house agent said, when he handed me over the keys. 'I think we may trust you to take good care of our doorsteps and windows, show applicants over the house, and answer all questions.'

"'You may so, sir,' says I, with a curtsey; 'there's many houses I've had charge of, and never a fault has been found yet. And this shan't be the first one,' says I.

"'We've a large business,' says Mr. Eagle, 'and if you give satisfaction, Mrs. Pounce,' says he, as civil spoken as possible, 'it's likely you'll never be without a roof to your head.'

"Well, my dear, of all nice houses—and I've seen a many in my day—this was the nicest. Stone front, with a bay window and snug garden planted with box borders, hot and cold water throughout, a little conservatory with an arched glass roof at the rear, and the hall floor covered with real painted tiles, which made you think you were walking on pictures; walls painted with Cupids and Venuses and garlands of flowers. Neighbourhood most desirable; drainage and sewerage perfect; and churches conveniently near.

"Excuse me, my dear, if it sounds like an advertisement, but Mr. Eagle wrote it down for me, and I never rested until I'd committed it to memory, so I could speak it off easy like, without any stops or hitches. And this I will say, as can't be said of all advertisements, there wasn't a word in the agent's description but what the house bore out.

Digitized by Google

"And the board hadn't been up twenty-four hours before there was a rush to look at the house. Young married couples as wanted to give up apartments, old married folks as wasn't suited with their homes; boarding-house keepers as made believe they was private families, and private families as wanted to take a few select boarders. But the rent was up tolerably high, and most of 'em dropped off, after I'd named the sum.

"'Never mind, Mrs. Pounce, never mind,' says Mr. Eagle, rubbing his hands. 'It's a house that there'll be no difficulty in letting, without any reduction of rent. Just wait,' says he, 'till the spring sets in.'

"But one day in trots an old gentleman, with gold spectacles and 'business' writ in every wrinkle of his forehead.

"'This house to let, ma'am?' says he.

"'Yes, sir,' says I.

"'Can I look at it?' says he.

"'Certainly, sir,' says I.

"I began as smooth as oil about the hot and cold water, the marble-floored bath-room and the tiles, when all of a sudden he puts up two hands in a warning sort of a way.

"'That'll do, ma'am,' says he, 'that'll do. I've eyes, and can see for myself.'

"'Certainly, sir,' says I; but I don't deny as I was took aback by that queer, dictatorial way of his.

"'Any ghosts about the place, ma'am?' asked he.

"'Sir?' says I.

"'Ghosts,' says he, out loud and sharp. 'Mysterious footsteps—lurking shadows—clanking chains at midnight?'

"'Mercy, no, sir,' says I, beginning to feel my flesh creep all over.

"'Rats?' says he.

"'Certainly not,' says I; 'with solid cemented cellar floor, and patent wood blocks.'

"'Beetles?' says he.

"'Look for yourself, sir,' says I, bridling up a little.

"'I like the house,' says he, after he had gone sniffing about the drain pipes, and peered into the coal cellar and wine vault, and sounded the copper boiler with his knuckles, just for all the world as if he was in the plumbing business. 'You may tell the agent I'll take it, if he and I can come to terms about the rent. When shall you see him?'

"'Most likely this afternoon, sir,' says I.

"'I'll drop in at his office to-morrow at nine,' says he. 'I'm going to be married,' says he, as composed as if he were saying that he was going to take a blue pill. 'The house will suit my wife's ideas. She thinks we are going to board,' says he, with an odd sort of a chuckle in his throat, 'and she's not a bit pleased with the idea. It'll be a pleasant surprise for her,' says he.

"Well, no sooner had he gone than in comes a stout, middle-aged lady in a black dress, rows of curls on either side of her face, and cheeks as red as any cabbage roses.

"'I've just come from Mr. Eagle's office,' says she; 'he has given me the refusal of this house, in case it suits me.'

"'I don't know, ma'am,' says I, 'but what it's let already.'

"'Let already!' says she, with a sort of scream. 'But that's impossible! Have not I told you that I've the refusal of it? Show me the premises at once.'

"Well, I was in a pretty puzzle, as you may believe; but I went all over the house with the curly lady, and she declared that it met her fancy exactly.

"'Possession on the 1st of May, I suppose?' says she.

"'Yes, ma'am,' says I, 'if——.'

"'There's no "if" in the question,' says she, as short as pie-crust. 'You may take down the "To Let," my good woman.'

"I curtseys very low, but I says to myself, 'not if I know it, ma'am, without orders from the agent himself.'

"Away went the lady with the curly hair and rose-red cheeks, and I was just putting on my hat to run round to the House Agency, when in comes Mr. Eagle himself, all smiles.

"'Well, Mrs. Pounce,' says he, 'so the house is let.'

"'To my thinking, sir,' says I, 'it's let twice over.'

"Then I up and told him about my old gentleman.

"'Dear me,' says he, 'this is very perplexing. At what time was this personage here?'

"'The clock struck twelve, sir,' says I, 'just as he went away.'

"Mr. Eagle hit himself a blow over the forehead like a play-actor.

"'Confusion worse confounded!' says he. 'It was twelve precisely when my customer left the office. We can't split the house in two, can we? Well, we must tell your old gentleman just how it happened. I dare say he will be reasonable about it.'

"But he wasn't reasonable, Mr. Eagle told me afterward; he never saw any one in such a rage.

"'I've taken the house,' says he, 'and I'll have it, cost what it may. Do you say that the rent is two hundred pounds? I'll give you two hundred and fifty down; if my claim and that of this lady are equally good, the question of price must settle it.'

"Well, we supposed, me and Mr. Eagle, as that was the end of the matter. But not a bit of it. The lady came that same afternoon with an upholster and a tape measure to see about the carpets. 'Two hundred and fifty pounds indeed!' says she, with a toss of her curls. 'It will take more than a paltry two hundred and fifty pounds to unsettle my plans. I'll give three hundred sooner than I'll lose the house.'

"When my old gentleman hears this, he grinds his teeth in a manner as was frightful to hear.

"'It's my house,' says he, 'and I will have it! Three hundred and fifty pounds, Eagle!'

"'Come,' says Mr. Eagle, 'matters are getting lively. The house agent business is looking up.'

"But you should have heard what a whistle he gave when I told him, the very next day that the curly lady had authorised me to offer four hundred.

"'I'll not stand this any longer,' said Mr. Eagle, jumping up and sending the papers flying all over the office table. 'I've a conscience, if fate has made a house agent of me. Tell her to come round this afternoon and sign the lease. Four hundred pounds is twice what we asked, and we asked twice what the property was worth to begin with.'

"So the curly-headed lady had her own way, after all. The bald-headed old gentleman stamped about in a pretty rage when he heard as the house was let.

"'I'll sue the Agency,' says he; 'I'll have the house if it costs me all I'm worth.'

"'Oh, hush, sir,' says I, all in a tremble. 'Here comes Miss Wix now.'

"'Who?' says he.

"'Miss Wix,' says I. 'The lady who has taken the house.'

"I got behind the door, fully expecting a scene, after what had come and gone. But, to my surprise, she gave a little shriek and flew into his arms.

"'Dear Josiah!' says she.

"'Dear Barbara!' says he.

"'I was looking for a desirable residence for you, my own angel,' says he.

"'You duck!' says she.

"'And thought this would exactly suit you,' says he.

"'Oh,' said she, 'it does, and I've taken it at four hundred pounds a year. It seems a good deal of money to pay, but I've been driven to it by a horrid old cormorant who was determined to have the house at any price. However——'

"'Barbara,' says the old gentleman, with a little gasping sound in his throat, as if he was swallowing a lump, 'that horrid old cormorant was I!'

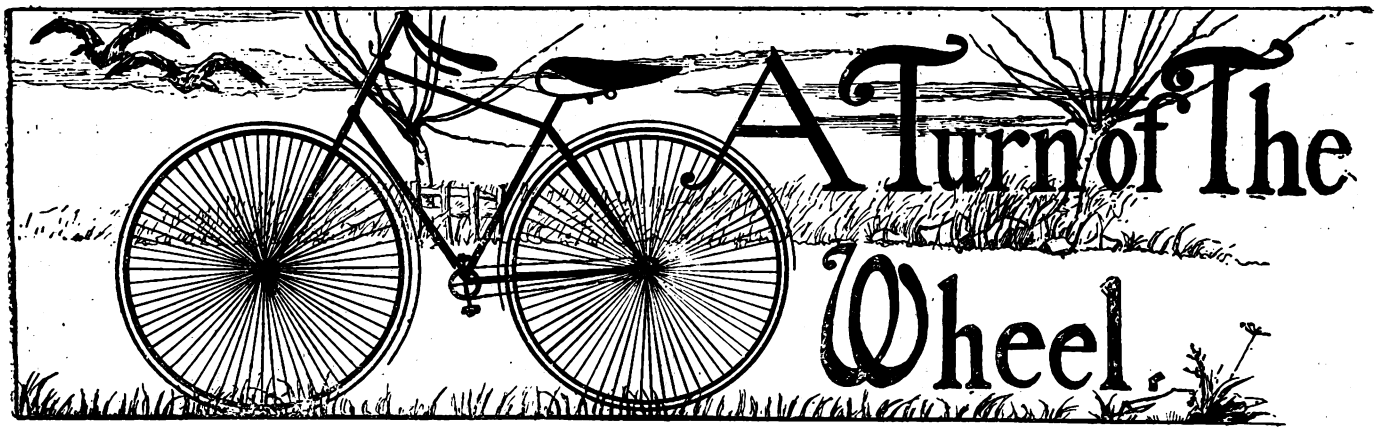
"'You don't mean——' says she.

"'That we have been bidding against each other,' says the old gentleman. 'Yes, we have.'

"'And I was going to give you a pleasant surprise,' says she, pulling out her handkerchief.

"'It is a surprise,' says he. 'But as for the pleasure of it——. Never mind, Barbara. Let's go in and measure for the carpets and curtains.'"

Digitized by Google



A Turn of The Wheel.

A FEW years ago a bicycle rider was no common thing in Provence. Brian Blair was perhaps the first who came wheeling by the golden fields and vineyards like a mounted Mercury.

"Qu' c'est qu' ca?" the peasants asked each other, staring after the glittering wonder. One look at the strange chariot, and one longer at the handsome, clean-shaven youth whose shapely legs propelled the wheels so deftly and swiftly. He was pleasant to look upon, for his eyes were brown and merry, his smiles came quickly, and he knew enough French to toss a gay salutation here and there.

"Pardieu!" he cried, impatiently pushing back a broad-brimmed peasant's hat, for he had exchanged his own blue polo by the way. "When one is in France one must exclaim in French. I suppose I must ask these Provencals what they say when it gets so confoundedly hot. Heavens, how hungry I am getting! I could eat black bread and cheese even. What a treat it would be to sit down under those hop-vines, and—by Jove, what a pretty girl!"

In the arched doorway of a little stone cottage, a young girl stood—a figure off an old Watteau fan—young, fair, smiling. It was Fanchon Thibault, who had the unconscious trick of posing like a basque statuette in her flowered chintz skirt and fresh muslin draperies, with a white kerchief tucked round her pretty neck; some frills of Swiss needlework half hiding her round arms, and a most becoming cap coquettishly perched above her braids of soft brown hair.

Of course Brian stared, and that was his undoing, for bump went his machine against a large stone; and just when he might have wished most to make an impression he took a terrible header into the road, and a cloud of dust enveloped his prostrate form.

Brian remembered afterwards the vision of a fair and lovely face bending over him and a little hand wiping something wet out of his eyes. Could it have been blood! He did not know, nor did he trouble to think, and in a moment it had all gone from him like a dream.

The first thing that came back to his memory was a cool little room with white walls, against which an ebony crucifix hung in bold relief. Brian turned his head, and a soft step glided to his bedside.

"What has happened to me?" he asked, raising himself on his elbow with a painful sense of weakness.

"You have been ill—very ill," was the gentle reply, in clear and beautiful French. "Lie down, please. The doctor says you are not to raise your head for several days." Brian turned inquiringly, and saw his Watteau shepherdess.

"Oh, I remember," he said, sinking back on the pillow with a prolonged sigh. "It was you who upset me."

"I, monsieur!" she cried, in startled tones.

"I was looking at you," Brian replied. "You were standing in the doorway, and I was thinking how pretty you were, when my wheel caught, and over I went. So you see, it was your fault, mademoiselle."

"Yes, but—" she began, blushing prettily.

"Fanchon!" called a low even voice from the next room. "Nanon wants you down-stairs, my child."

"Yes, uncle," she said quickly, and Brian suddenly found her place by his side taken by an old man in priestly robes, who looked at him with stern disapproval.

"You are not to talk," said the newcomer curtly. "You are very ill. Besides, you must not say such things to my niece. She is going to join the Sisterhood of the Blessed Virgin, and I cannot have you putting wrong notions into her head. A sick man should be better employed."

Brian had nothing to say. He was weak, and the stern hard face of the priest awed him. "What a pity!" he thought, with a sudden fierce rebellious feeling he could not understand. "Such a pretty girl—such a wonderfully pretty girl to be shut up in a convent!"

"You are an Englishman, I believe?" the priest said suddenly.

"Yes; I am from London," Brian replied, and wondered at the peculiar look that swept over the priest's thin, worn face. "Do you think I'd better send any word to my people?"

There was no reply, and when he turned his head Père Thibault had gone.

There were some dull days after that—days when he looked in vain for a glimpse of Fanchon, when his heart beat strangely as he heard her singing below in the garden. Père Thibault and an old household witch they called Nanon came in and out and sat with him between the doctor's visits, till Brian had a wicked desire to throw his boots at the old priest's head, and take a shy at Nanon's black silk cap, which was invariably crooked.

"This is beastly," he said, tossing himself impatiently on his rumpled pillow. "I wonder how much longer I am to be kept here."

A knock at the door interrupted this amiable soliloquy. "There comes that Macbethian witch with my dinner," he reflected. "Come in." The door opened, but it was Fanchon who carried the tray.

"Oh," cried Brian eagerly, his face quite radiant, "I am so glad to see you! Do sit down and talk to me. I am dying of ennui. Nanon is so stupid, and your uncle is so pious, that they drive me frantic between them."

Fanchon smiled sedately as she set the little tray down.

"I hope you are feeling better, monsieur," she said.

"Since you came——. Yes," he replied. "No, no. Don't go——, please, don't. Sit down here. Where did you get those violets you are wearing? Just give me a smell of them. Oh, you don't know how I lie here and long for the green fields and the birds and the flowers! You love flowers, don't you?"

Fanchon took the bunch of violets from her breast, and held them out to him.

"Don't tell Père Thibault that I gave them to you," she said, with a provoking little moue. "He wouldn't allow it."

Brian seized the flowers, and pressed them to his lips.

"You are very good," he said, as gratefully as though she had saved his life.

"Very bad, I'm afraid," she said, sighing. "When my uncle comes home he will be very cross at Nanon for letting me bring you your dinner."

Digitized by Google

"Where has he gone?"

"He has gone to Mère Brissac. She is dying, poor soul! God save her!" And Fanchon crossed herself devoutly.

"And what is Nanon doing?"

"Poor Nanon! She has the toothache. Oh, it is frightful!"

"I did not know she had any teeth left to ache," Brian observed. "Well, that's a blessing in disguise—that toothache. No, you must sit down. I won't eat a mouthful if you don't."

"Oh, you are bad!" said Fanchon, yielding with a little laugh, and they were soon chatting gaily there together. Brian heard all about the chickens and the pigeons, the bees and the rabbits, the flower garden and the vineyards, and all the time he was falling more deeply and hopelessly in love with this charming Provencal.

"Is it really true, mademoiselle," he asked, at last, "that you are destined for the Church?"

A cloud drifted over the bright, lovely face, and Fanchon's eyes fell.

"My uncle says so, monsieur," she replied.

"But you don't want to be a nun?" Brian urged eagerly, almost trembling with suppressed emotion.

"It is not what we wish that is best for us. My uncle says the world is very wicked, and that I shall be far happier if ——"

"Bosh!" cried Brian savagely. "I beg your pardon, mademoiselle; but you are too young and too fair to bury yourself in a convent. The world must go on, and why may you not share the lot of other women? You were born to make some man happy with your love. There is no lot in the world that would suit you so well as that of a happy wife and mother."

"You must not say such things to me, monsieur," she cried, in agitated tones. "You must not; it is very wrong."

"But I will say so," said Brian, seizing the little hand that rested on the bed beside him. "If you will let me, I will say more. I have seen you only a few times; but I know I could love you. Nay, Fanchon, I do love you! Hear me. I am rich. Let me make you my wife, and give up —— "

"Never!" burst forth a stern voice that made Fanchon spring up in terror, and the next moment the irate form of Père Thibault was standing between them. "Shame upon you, Fanchon!" he passionately cried, his blazing eyes fixed upon the girl's trembling form. "You—the bride of the Church! You listen to words of love from a man you have not known a fortnight, and he was one of that accursed race that murdered your father! And you," he went on, holding out one thin hand that trembled with rage as he turned upon Brian, "you repay me thus for taking you into my house, and nursing you back from the doors of death. Begone, disobedient girl! Get down on your knees and pray for forgiveness. Silence! Not a single word! Go!"

Poor Fanchon stole away, trembling with fear, and perhaps Père Thibault expected Brian to fall on his knees then and there, praying for mercy; but he did not. Fanchon had no sooner left the room than he sprang out of bed and confronted the angry priest.

"Hear me, Père Thibault," he said, in a voice that was strong and clear with excitement; "it is my turn to speak; I love your niece, and wish to marry her."

"That you never shall," cried the priest vehemently. "She shall marry no man, and you least of all. Was it not the cursed war in the Crimea in which the English stirred on the French to fight that robbed me of my brother Ambrose, my only brother, whom I nursed in these arms as a mother nurses her babe?

"Yes. You killed him there amongst you, and now you wish to take from me his only child! But you shall not. I swore once that no Englishman should ever cross my threshold; but the devil sent you. You found a shelter in my house only to abuse the kindness that aided you. Out with you, I say! Begone at once, monster ingrate!"

Brian shrugged his shoulders. He went downstairs, groping his way, surprised at his own feebleness. Fanchon was standing in the shaded doorway, and he saw that she had been weeping.

"Oh," she cried in alarm, "you are not able to go about!"

"Oh, yes," he said lightly, "I am quite well; but thou," he added, dropping into the tender second person, "thou art unhappy, little one. I have gotten thee into a sad scrape, I am afraid."

She did not reply, for her tears suddenly welled up again, and she could not speak. Brian was like other men, and the sight of a woman weeping—especially this one—was quite too much for him. He put his arms round her, and drew her head down on his shoulder.

"Dost thou love me, little darling?" he whispered. "My heart is thine, Fanchon. No one can take it from thee if thou carest to keep it."

"No, no!" she cried hurriedly, withdrawing herself from his embrace. "Hush! I must not listen to thee. Thou must go away. I will never forget thee—never—never; but——" She burst into tears, and then, flinging herself upon his breast, she sobbed, "God forgive me, but I do love thee!"

Brian's arms clasped the little form to his heart. "Come with me, Fanchon," he cried joyously. "Be my wife. I have a home where thou shalt be welcome."

"No, no!" she said, again withdrawing from his embrace. "My uncle is old and lonely. He loved my father as he loved his own soul. My father was killed in your war, and my uncle can never forgive you."

"But what had I to do with that?" exclaimed Brian impatiently.

"You are an Englishman. My uncle will never, never forgive you. You must go away and forget me."

"I'll be hanged if I will!" said Brian, in vigorous English.

"What sayest thou?" Fanchon asked gently.

"I said I wouldn't."

"But I can never marry thee. First of all, I am wedded to the Church, and then I will never disobey my uncle. Provencals who disobey live accursed. Thou must go, and thou must never return."

This one idea she repeated again and again, till Brian slowly realised that he could not persuade her; yet he lingered on the cottage steps. The sun was setting, and a mellow light fell on the grass near them, which was studded with white star-eyed flowers.

On the ground lay Brian's jacket, which he had tossed there indifferently as he stood and talked to Fanchon.

"Do not make me any more unhappy than I am," she said, at length. "You are not able to go far, I know, but the inn is just below, and there you can stay till you are stronger."

"You seem deter-

In the arched doorway of a little stone cottage a young girl stood.

Digitized by Google

mined to get rid of me," Brian said jealously. "I am going—since you wish it. I dare say you will soon forget me."

"Dost thou think so unkindly of me?" she said in gentle reproof. "Did I not say I would never forget thee?"

"Didst thou mean it?" he asked, looking up into her eyes. "If thou wilt promise me that, there may be some hope yet."

"I promise you," she said softly.

"You will not marry anyone else, Fanchon?"

"No—never."

He took her hand in his, and, bending over her, kissed her. Then, with a resolute step, he turned and went away. Poor Fanchon's heart was at her lips as she saw him mount his bicycle and wheel away.

"If he should fall again," and then she resumed her womanly occupation of crying.

A week passed by. Père Thibault had said nothing further to Fanchon about her conduct toward the detested Englishman, but Sister Agnes came back and forth at the cottage, and Fanchon knew that she was being disposed of, and hat made her cry the more.

"Dry thy tears, child," said Sister Agnes. "Thy sorrows will be soon at an end. In the holy Church there is no grief. To-morrow I will take thee to a haven of rest."

"But I don't want to be a nun!" Fanchon burst forth. "I don't want to leave this world and shut myself up in a convent. I hate it! I detest the dark corridors and the gloomy cells—and everything! I love the fields and the birds and the flowers. I don't want to leave them."

At this outbreak of passion Sister Agnes's face became grave. "Unhappy child!" she said sternly. "Thy heart is full of a less holy joy than the love of nature's beauties. Pray to God for purity. Seek not the idols of this world."

"I do not ask for much," said Fanchon, in a low, broken voice. "I ask only for what God meant every woman to have You cannot crush such thoughts out of my heart, and if I may not be his wife I shall die!"

As she spoke her voice trembled, and she entreatingly stretched out her arms. The nun opened her lips to utter a pious rebuke, but they closed again in silence, for someone came down the garden-walk to the little summer-house, and the hop-vines parted before a strong, manly hand.

"Fanchon, my darling," said Brian Blair. "I have come back to thee!"

The nun turned away, for in a moment they were in each other's arms, and Père Thibault was coming rapidly towards them with a strange gentleman by his side — strange, yet oddly like the tall old priest, on whose face shone a look that Sister Agnes had never seen there before.

"Fanchon!" he said, in a clear, ringing voice, "embrace thy lover and God bless you both. He has brought back thy father and my brother Ambrose. He was not killed in the war, but taken prisoner, and kept for a long time in Russia. See, he is there!"

"Dry thy tears, child," said Sister Agnes.

"I found thy father in Paris."

The bewildered girl turned from Brian to embrace her father.

"Tell me," she whispered; "I do not understand."

"I found thy father in Paris," said Brian, holding her hand tightly in his own. "It was the merest chance. He had a shop there, and the name was the same as yours. I asked questions, and learned that he had been in the Crimean War, was taken prisoner, and shot in the head by a sentinel while attempting to escape. This bullet affected his reason. For ten years his mind was gone. Then a great surgeon extracted the ball, and his reason was restored. He returned home, but his brother was gone from his old home, his wife was dead, and he could find no trace of any of his family. After searching for years, he gave up all hope, and settled down in Paris, where I found him."

"God bless you for it," said Fanchon softly, and she kissed her new-found father with tenderest joy. The old priest wiped his moist eyes on his cassock sleeve.

"Sister Agnes," he said, in an altered tone, "I am afraid you have lost your young proselyte. Fanchon's father is willing she should marry, and—I have nothing to say against it now."

The Sister stooped and kissed Fanchon's forehead. "I hope you will be happy," she whispered, and then left them to their joy.

"Do you think you can be happy?" said Brian, looking down into her eyes.

"I am," Fanchon replied, nestling against his side.

A few days afterwards, at the close of the matin service, Père Thibault married them, and Brian brought away his bride with many blessings.

Digitized by Google

"NIG."

"DON'T be afraid, sir; you will not miss the train. I've taken travellers to the train for five years, and I have never made them miss the train. Do you hear, sir? Never."

"However——."

"Oh, don't look at your watch. There is one thing that you don't know which you ought to know, but which your watch will not tell you. That is, that the train is always fifteen minutes late. I never knew it to be in time."

But it was one of those rare days when the train was exactly in time, and I was left.

I now had to wait three long hours in a lonely village in one of the cantons of Switzerland. It was hemmed in by two dismal-looking mountains, the tops of which were covered with snow.

How was I to pass these three hours? I invoked the help of the bystanders. There was another general response: "Go and see the whirlpool. There is nothing to equal it in the country." And where was the whirlpool? "Upon the mountain to the right, about half-way up; but the road is very bad." They advised me to take a guide, and there below, in that little white cottage with the green blinds, I could find the best guide in the country, an honest man, Father Simon.

I went and knocked on the door of the cottage. An old woman came and opened it.

"Father Simon?"

"It is his house—but is it to go to the whirlpool?"

"Yes; it is to go there."

"Ah, well! Father Simon has already been there this morning. He is tired, and does not wish to go again. But don't be alarmed. There is someone to take his place. There is Nig."

"Send for Nig."

"But you must know beforehand Nig is not a person."

"Not a person?"

"No, it is our dog. He will show you very well—as well as my man. He is used to it."

"How used to it?"

"You see that for years and years Father Simon has taken Nig with him, so he has learned all the roads, and now he can make the trips alone. He has often taken travellers, and we have always been complimented by them. As for his intelligence, have no fear. He has as much as you or I."

"But is it not necessary to speak?"

"If it were to show you the monuments, yes, for then it would be necessary to give you the history and the dates; but this time there is nothing to see but the beauties of Nature. Take Nig. Besides, it will be cheaper. It is three francs for my man; with Nig it is but thirty sous; and Nig will show you as much for thirty sous as my man will for three francs."

"Very well; where is Nig?"

"He is asleep by the fire. He has already taken some people this morning to the whirlpool. Shall I call him?"

"Yes, call him."

"Nig! Nig!"

He came with a bound through the window. He was a homely enough little black animal. His long hair was curly and twisted into knots. He did not look like very much on the outside, but he carried himself with a certain air of gravity, of decision, and of importance. He immediately looked me over closely, precisely; casting his eyes from my head to my feet with an air that said very plainly: "It is a traveller, and he wishes to go to the whirlpool."

To lose one train was enough for one day, and I did not care to expose myself to that misfortune a second time, so I explained to this honest woman that I had but three hours to make the trip.

"Oh, I know that perfectly well. You can take the train at four o'clock. Do not fear; Nig will bring you back in time. Go, Nig! Start, my boy; all ready!"

But Nig did not appear to be at all disposed to start. He remained immovable, watching his mistress with apparent anxiety.

"Ah! I am so foolish!" said the old woman. "I had forgotten the sugar." She went and brought four pieces of sugar from the closet and gave them to me.

"See! this is why he would not start. You have now got the pieces of sugar. See! Nig, the gentleman has the sugar. Now. Go! my boy. To the whirlpool! To the whirlpool! To the whirlpool!" She repeated these words, speaking very slowly and distinctly.

Nig answered the words of his mistress with little nods of his head, which quickened at the last with a show of impatience, as if to say, "Yes, yes; I know. The gentleman has some pieces of sugar, and we go to the whirlpool. I understand. Do you take me for a numskull?" And without waiting to hear the third "To the whirlpool" of Madame Simon, Nig turned round on his paws, came and raised his face to mine with a look as if showing me the way, and said, as plainly as it is permitted to a dog to speak to man:

"Let us go. Come, you!"

I followed him obediently. We went down the road, he ahead and I behind. We were obliged to cross the entire village. Some children who were playing in the road recognised my guide.

"Here, Nig! Good-day, Nig!"

They wished to play with the dog, but he turned away his head with an air of a dog who had no time to amuse himself—of a dog who had to make his living and was earning thirty sous. One of the children said to the other:

"Let him be. He is taking that gentleman to the whirlpool. Good-day, Mister!"

The rest all laughed, and repeated after him:

"Good-day, Mister!"

I smiled reluctantly. I felt embarrassed—even a little humiliated. He was, for the time being, my master. He knew where we went, and I did not. I was anxious to get out of the village, to find myself alone with him, and face to face with the beauties of Nature.

The beauties of Nature, so far, were a frightful road, dusty and burning under a leaden sun. The dog travelled on with a quick step that tired me to keep up with him. I tried to moderate his ardour. "Nig, my boy, not so fast!" Nig dropped his ears, evidently not wishing to hear his fellow-traveller, and when I attempted to seat myself by the side of a tree, he exhibited signs of impatience. He barked in a little, sharp voice, and looked at me in a very ferocious way.

Evidently it was not the proper thing to stop there. Nig pawed the ground so sharply and vigorously that I arose to follow him. He instantly became quiet, and began to trot gaily ahead of me. I understood him, and he was contented.

Some minutes afterward we came to a beautiful pathway, flowery, shady, full of the perfume of roses and filled with the murmur of the springs. Nig had already entered the wood, and had disappeared at a gallop. I followed him, a little out of breath.

I had not gone a dozen paces when I found Nig, who waited for me, head in the air, and eyes sparkling. Where he stopped was a grassy arbour, made musical by the song of a rippling brook. There I saw an old bench, and the eyes of Nig turned impatiently from me to the bench. I had begun to understand the language of dogs:

"Now," said he to me, "behold a place to rest. It is pleasant here, and cool. You were foolish to wish to rest in the open wood. Now sit down. I will permit you to do so for a short while."

I stopped and seated myself. I lighted a cigar. I made a motion to offer one to Nig. Perhaps he smoked, but I thought that he would prefer a morsel of sugar. He caught it very adroitly, and cracked it with his great white teeth. Then he lay down and slept at my feet. He was evidently in the habit of taking a nap in this lovely spot.

He slept about ten minutes. I had by this time become accustomed to the whole thing. Nig had inspired me with perfect confidence. I was resolved to obey him blindly. He arose, casting his eyes from side to side, which meant, "Let us start, my friend"; and now behold us, like two comrades, travelling slowly along under the trees. The dog enjoyed the charm, the silence, and the beauty of the surroundings.

Digitized by Google

Before this, while we had been exposed to the fierce sun, he had travelled with quick, short steps, to escape the dust and the heat; but now, refreshed and rested, he walked for the pleasure of walking under the green shade of the trees.

A road now appeared toward the left; a short hesitation on the part of Nig. He reflected. Then he passed on and continued his route straight before him, but not without a certain lack of confidence in his manner, and now I see him stop. Ah! he was almost cheated that time. He is coming back, and now we take the new road to the left. At the end of a dozen paces he brings me into a sort of circle, and then, with his nose in the air, invites me to contemplate a very respectable wall of rough rocks, forming a rude amphitheatre.

When Nig thought I had inspected this place enough he turned about, and we went back again to the other road. Nig had evidently forgotten to show me the Circle of Rocks—a light enough fault in a dog, but which he had quickly rectified.

The route now became very steep, very dangerous, and difficult. I advanced more slowly and with infinite precautions. The dog sprang lightly from rock to rock, but he did not abandon me. He waited for me, watching my steps carefully with the most touching solicitude. At last I began to hear a boiling and roaring noise. Nig made a great demonstration. "Courage!" said he. "Courage! We have arrived. Now you will see the whirlpool."

It was indeed a whirlpool. The stream was modest enough, and the falls equally modest, but the water leaped from rock to rock, crossing and recrossing, and fell sparkling into a great basin of rock, around the edge of which the water fumed and whirled.

I should certainly never have been really consoled for my laborious tramp by seeing such an ordinary scene if it had not been for my companion, the brave Nig, who was to me much more interesting and remarkable than the whirlpool. On each side of this stream was a little Swiss châlet, or dairy, attended each by a little Swiss maiden, one a brunette, the other a blonde.

Each was dressed in the national costume, and was awaiting anxiously my arrival. It seemed to me that the blonde had the prettier eyes, and I had taken three or four steps in that direction when Nig, barking loudly and furiously, absolutely prevented my advance in that direction. Had he a preference for the little brunette? I changed my direction, and all went well.

The dog, appeased as if by enchantment, went ahead to a seat at the table in front of the châlet of his young friend. I asked for a glass of milk. The girl went into the house, and Nig followed behind. By a half-opened window I soon saw the bright, shining eyes of my dog. The little wretch! He was being served before me! It is he who is always first. I could see him there now with his great basin of milk.

After a while he appeared, with great white globules of milk dripping from his moustache, and condescended to wait for me while I drank my fill. I gave him a piece of sugar, and we both appeared to be well satisfied with ourselves and with each other.

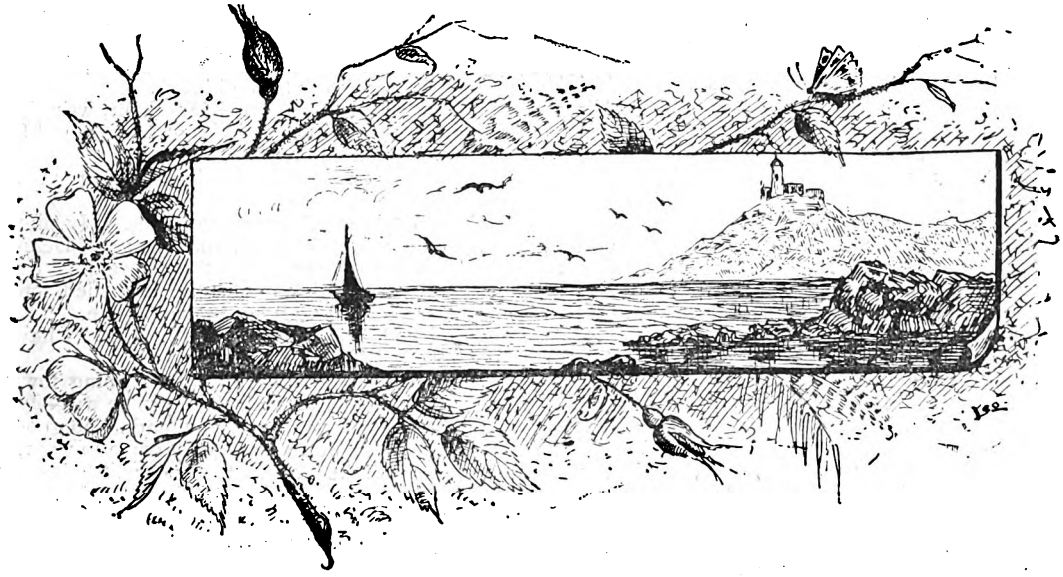
Nig began to show signs of anxiety. I read now in his eyes as in a book. He wished to start. I paid my bill and rose; then I started for the road which had brought us up the mountain. I saw Nig had gone and planted himself squarely at the entrance to another road. He cast upon me a serious look, even severe; but I had made such progress during the two hours that the eloquent silence of the animal had become familiar to me.

"What sort of opinion must you have of me?" said Nig. "Do you think I will travel twice over the same road? No, no; I am too good a guide for that. I know my business. We will return by another route."

We descended by this other road, which was still prettier than the first. Nig was very lively now, and often turned toward me with a little triumphant air. We recrossed the village to the platform of the station, and were met by three or four other dogs, who wanted to gossip with my comrade, but Nig growled, and refused their advances.

"You see well enough what I have got to do. I must conduct the gentleman to the train." It was only when I was in the waiting-room that he would consent to leave me, after having cracked gaily the last two pieces of sugar; and this is how I translated his parting glance:

"Now we are five minutes ahead of time. It is not I who would let you miss the train. I wish you good-day, sir; good-day."



Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

CHAPTER XVII.

"You never saw me show fear yet, Bruce," said John quietly. He pushed the old man aside, stepped out, then turned and came back into the room, a queer, dazed look on his face. I followed his eyes, and there, on the threshold of the door, was a woman.

She was clothed in a tawdry shawl, a dirty, draggled gown, and over her battered hat she wore a thick veil. She was tall and straight, with a proud bearing, despite her poverty-stricken apparel.

With a quick gesture, she flung off her veil, disclosing a pallid haggard face, wrinkled and shrunken, shadowed by that dreadful destroyer, consumption.

But the eyes; those great dark eyes! I knew her then! She was my sister Katherine. An icy hand clutched my heart, and with a wild grasping at the empty air, I sank into a low chair behind the portière. The room went whirling round, and for a moment I heard a crashing like the sea, and yet I knew there was a dreadful silence in the room.

Then she herself spoke, and I seemed to come back from far away, and to be forced to listen. Her voice was hoarse and low. Words came with difficulty, as if to speak gave her pain, and there was a querulous tone in all she said, such as a sick person uses.

"I seem to have interrupted a family gathering. Grandfather and Aunt Marg here! You were not so friendly twenty years ago. John, as young looking as ever, so little changed, and me—what a wreck I am, and poor; why, I've almost starved! Then someone sent me money, someone of my past, perhaps Dean, it does not matter, and I dragged myself home. I've come like Lazarus, to feed from the crumbs of the rich man's table. You might want a cup of cold water in the next world, John. There is murder enough on your conscience, as there is on mine, for that matter. I know I don't deserve anything, but you can't let me die of hunger."

Still no sound from those waiting people. How ghastly still the room was! No one dared to speak. For the first time in his brave life, John's courage failed him. He sank into a chair, covering his face with his hands. It all seemed like a terrible nightmare to me. I tried to rise. I would go to him and comfort his misery, and then it flashed over me what Katherine's presence meant to me.

She flung off her veil.

"I haven't got long to live," she went on recklessly. "Consumption's got a hold on me; been dying by inches. Even after the past, John, you haven't the heart to drive me out to die like a dog."

Then Mrs. Scott spoke: "It is impossible for you to stay here in this house," she said icily; "even in Galveston, where people think you dead."

"If it's Dean you are thinking of," Katherine cried eagerly, "you need not fear. I have not seen him for years. Don't know where he is; maybe he sent me the money to come here; some spite work; but the few months left me, Mrs. Scott, I'll be so good, you needn't dread me."

"I have suffered enough through you," said Mrs. Scott bitterly; "you wrecked my son's life, sent him a wanderer from his home for years; made him an outlaw; on your head is all the guilt of that awful past. I would not breathe the same air you do, nor have you one hour under my roof."

"She must see she cannot stay in this house," said Aunt Marg, "there are plenty of places outside. When she understands pleading is hopeless, she will have sense enough to go away quietly."

"Not until he says so," cried Katherine; "not for you, Margaret Collier, with your soft, purring ways. What are you but the accomplice of assassins, the only witness? You cannot judge me now. Oh, for a shelter and kindness! I deserve none, I know that; but I will not cumber the ground long. I am a living dead woman. If there was any pity, but there is none; a good woman like you, Mrs. Scott, and a narrow one like Margaret Collier, will never forgive. You keep us down. You drive us to the gutter—to suicide!"

"You deserve no pity, for you had none that day. I saw you then," said Margaret fiercely. "I saw my sister dragged away, and you uttered no petition for her; you left her baby to lie there to die. You saw your own father shot without a tear. You are not a woman, but a monster, a moral leper, and if you died at the door you should be thrust out of the house. Is it right, is it just, that you live to bring sorrow and dishonour, when those good women died?"

"Be silent, Margaret," said John steadily. He rose to his feet, and for a moment struggled with himself, as though fierce, burning words came which he would check. How noble he looked then, and I was glad. I had not thought he would be unmanly, even to her; I felt that he would be gentle. He had that chivalrous courtesy for the suffering and weak that all gentlemen have. I realised the meaning of that word then.

"I—I can hardly trust myself to speak," John faltered, passing his hand over his eyes; "it is so hard; oh, my God, it is so hard! But you are suffering, ill, in want. I have plenty—you shall be cared for." He had never looked at her once. She moved a step nearer him.

"You will not drive me out, John."

He shuddered and stepped back. "You must go away, otherwise I shall invoke the law for my mother's sake, for my——" Then he stopped, and turned so ghastly pale I thought he would fall. He staggered back to his chair with a bitter groan—he had almost said, "my wife." To him, too, that awful sentence had come. What were we to each other now?

"I wonder you do not use your strength," she hissed; "but, John, you used to be so kind, so generous, I thought you might forgive when you saw the wreck I am. In that past I never dreamed the consequences of that awful day. I could not check them; as well stop the fierce flight of a herd of stampeded cattle as reason with those drunken Mexican brutes. I was so young then. It happened so quickly. They said you cared for me all the long years that my portrait hung in your room. It is there, still, I know it." She ran across to the library.

"What can we do?" cried Mrs Scott, wringing her hands.

"Send for the police," said Aunt Marg; and I realised how cruel a good woman can be.

Katherine came feebly back, catching at the door for support.

"You love some other woman, John. My picture is taken away; only a wreck there, like me; yet Dean told me you had been true to my memory all these years. I used to boast of it. I wish I hadn't come back; had died long ago," she went on, tremulously, all her bravado gone. "I was wicked, I am punished—ill, suffering, and broken. I haven't a place to lay my head."

"Katherine," said my grandfather, going toward her—and what a pathetically brave little figure he was—"I never liked you, nor believed you, and you hadn't no goodwill to me in your proud days; but, now you are come to want, are sick and homeless, I'll take you to that poor little house you used to despise. Come home with me." He went to her and drew her arm through his. "I am very sorry, John, that any of my blood should be like her; your misery is not greater than mine. None of your money must do for her. I have enough and plenty, and from this moment she shall never cross your path."

Digitized by Google

When they were gone, Aunt Marg, a set, angry look upon her face, turned to Mrs. Scott. "I cannot go home now," she said, "where that woman is."

"Then stay with me," answered Mrs. Scott; "and Letty—oh, my poor child, my Letty!"

I pushed by them and went to John; kneeling by his side, I put his arm about my neck. How dreadful he looked, with that white face, those staring wide eyes that did not seem his at all, a deep wrinkle between his brows I never saw there before.

"You will believe I knew," he gasped; "but they said she was dead. I saw a grave. It was his vile work. If I had married, thinking that woman, Katherine, was dead and there were children, he could upset any will of mine. It was a deep-laid plot, but he could not wait for his vengeance, and you made me spare him. Letty, if you think that I deceived you, that—I—I knew her to be alive, I shall go mad."

"I do not—and, John," I cried miserably, "what am I now? You said, 'if I had married.' Am I not your wife? I cannot reason any more."

"You are my wife," he said, clasping me in his arms; "they shall not part us. I will take you to Mexico. My yacht is ready. We can sail to-night. We will!" He lifted me to my feet and stood there defiant and eager, a reckless look on his face—all that will of his, so strong and steadfast, fixed on our departure. But there was one to win him to his better self, that quiet little woman, his mother.

"If you say it is right, John, I will," I whispered.

"It is not right, my child," said Mrs. Scott. "Oh, John, when you were so brave and true, my good son, would you begin your life with her with a sin? Let the law free you, and then you can come together again."

"And drag that story through the courts," he answered roughly. "Do you know what that means—all the past coming to light, and from the lips of such a woman as that? Those men, wronged by her, are living yet, and she will accuse them of murder. I have no right to give her that chance. Did I not wrong those men enough? In her anger she would stop at nothing, at no accusation. Such are the weapons of her kind. Where might the story end? Her very presence would set a thousand tongues talking; a dead woman come to life—and such a one! I will not reason with you nor anyone. Margaret you shall not speak. I will have my say, and Letty is willing. Our lives are in our own hands."

"And other lives," sobbed Mrs. Scott. "Oh, John, I have lived too long!"

"Come with me, Letty," pleaded Aunt Margaret, clasping my hand. "If only for to-night, until we can think what is to be done."

"Come where?" I asked rebelliously; "I must not stay in John's house. I am not his wife, and you will not go home."

"There are hotels."

"What would people say? They knew that I was to marry John, and I did. I shall go with him. I never was a good girl, anyhow. I must be a trial to you to the last."

And then Justina hobbled in, that ill-omened soul who read my fate, but could not ward off the shadow she saw over me. She put her wrinkled arms around me and drew me to the sofa.

"Chica come to her old nurse; her mother, Justina." She cooed over me, stroking my burning forehead. "She is so wild-eyed and ill, my pretty, she does not know. Lay your silky curls on old Justina's breast. She love you, oh, so dear, and cared for you—my baby. Will you come to her poor home and let her guard you?"

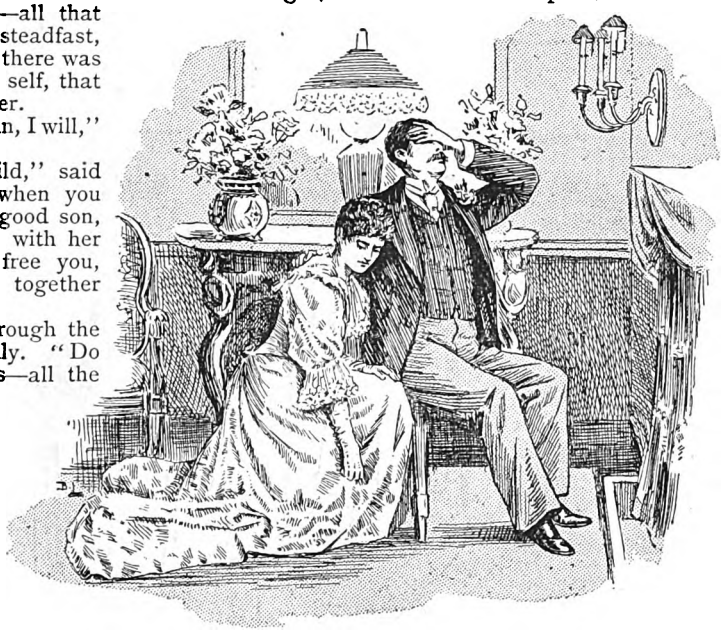
"For to-night," said Aunt Marg hopefully. "John, let me take her there, if only until to-morrow. It will give us time to think."

"She shall not go to that hovel," he cried; "she must stay here."

"I will go," I said; "I am so queer in my head. I can't think, but I love Justina. She saved my baby life. I wish she had not now, or anyone. I wish I had died when you carried me on the big horse, John. If you take me away from her," as he came to me and took my hand, "it will be a crime, John, for I am not myself. I don't know what I am doing. Play I am your baby, Chica, and take me away, Justina; away from making Mrs. Scott and Aunt Marg cry, and from him that I love."

"I smooth your forehead, so, Chica," murmured Justina, "and you always sleep when you little baby. Now your pretty eyes close."

She kept rubbing my forehead, and I ceased to think any more, but I felt, after a time, that someone lifted me gently and placed me in a carriage, and afterwards I saw the dim-lit room in that poor hut on the sand, and the same strong arms were laying me on Justina's bed.



"I shall go mad."

"In my wedding gown," I cried; "Justina said it was a shroud."

"Do not drive me to despair," said his voice, but I had no pity nor tenderness. I lay there and looked at the stars in the black, black sky. Aunt Marg came to bathe my head and fuss over me, and I—I almost hated her. I stretched out my hand to Justina, and she held it tight, crouching by my side. I must have slept even in my misery. I think they gave me some draught, for it was grey morning when I began to realise again. Justina was talking with someone at the door, and Aunt Marg, worn out, slept in the other room by the table.

"You have bought Justina. She is a Mexican," I said, sitting up.

"Well, why not?" said John. He came in with a big fur cloak on his arm and wrapped me in it. "I would buy her if it took my fortune. Now, drink this brandy. You are better; your colour is coming; you will understand by-and-bye; you are dazed yet. You will come with me?"

"My grandfather said you were such a good man. If you say I must go, it is right, I suppose; but I am very tired of all this. If I could die it would be settled. Your mother will be so angry."

"Will you ever be yourself again?" he said with a sob. "Oh, my broken lily, my pretty child! What can you do here? If I leave you, you will be so miserable, and I—I have not the strength to do it."

"May I not bid Margaret good-bye?" I said, and my voice seemed to belong to somebody else; "but she will be angry about my going."

"You cannot bear another scene, dearest. We will come back some day when all is well, and you are my own wife in their sight as well as the world's."

Bruce was waiting outside with the carriage, and I fancied he looked at me with stern disapproval. I think John saw it, for he gave his order to drive to the docks in a sharp voice, and slammed the carriage door.

Digitized by Google

"Leave me to myself," I said, and I leaned my head by the window where the soft moist air from the sea blew across my face. I heard the wheels rattle over the planks; then John lifted me out on the wharf. What a curious grey world it was, everything dripping and cold, the masts of the vessels black and shining, the grey water rolling against the piers, and faint and ghostly voices of sailors coming out of the fog, or the rattle of cordage and clank of oars.

A small man, compactly built, wearing a short peajacket, came out of the greyness toward us. I fancied I smelled tobacco, and there was something familiar in the way the figure waved the black pipe with its left hand. Then, suddenly and rudely, my curious mood was shattered by a voice that went to my heart, sent the sluggish blood away from my brain, and made me think again.

"I want a word with my granddaughter, Letty Lombard, Mr. John Scott, afore she goes away with a married man."

CHAPTER XVIII.

"THERE is nothing you can say to Letty that has not already been said," John cried angrily. "My yacht is waiting for us. She has agreed to leave the decision to me. I say that it is right for her to go. No reproach from you will make her change her mind. You would be needlessly cruel."

"Not so cruel as you," said my grandfather sternly; "for you know what you are doing and she don't. I thought you were a good man, John, and all her young days I brought her up to think so; little did I dream it would lead to such trouble as this. You're not fair nor manly, John, taking that child away from her home, and you know it. Letty," and he grasped my arm.

"Letty I once used to think you weren't a good girl, light-thoughted and easy to lead, of no stability nor truth, but as years went on I got to know you. I 'most leaned on you as to a tall young sapling; I grew to love you. Keep to my idea of you and take the better way. Give me comfort of one of my son's children."

"Now, John Scott, plead your case."

"How do I know the better way?" I asked doubtfully, still in that queer dream.

"With me, my love," John whispered close to me.

"The happiest way to you now will be the saddest one in time to come," said my grandfather solemnly. "No woman can outlive a stain on her honour. It crops up in buried letters; in idle tales of old folks like me; it is a haunting ghost that will not stay in its grave; some day a child may ask and know, Letty. It isn't for a few years, but always. I never had no comfort with my wife. She wasn't of my nation nor nature, and your father was diff'rent from the Lombards. Katherine gave me only misery; but I do love you, my bright-eyed girl. God knows I do, the sunshine of my home. Love for human kind woke up in me, after I'd kept from it a quarter of a century. Mebbe you made play of me; taught me to love you, to turn away from me like this. Can you take pleasure, make merry, over the misery of an honest old man? Letty, can any future be bright to you after this appeal of mine?"

"I don't know what to do," I said drearily. I went away from both of them and stood by myself. Half idly, I watched the grey water dashing against the pier; I could not think yet.

"I took Katherine home," continued my grandfather bravely. "Someone must care for her. She is thought dead in Galveston, so I must take her away for fear of people's talk. If I go with her my stay will be short; I am a very old man, used to the beaten track of my days, and a change will be my death. She'd take no comfort from me, for I never liked her, nor she me; but you, Letty, you are not of her past. She don't imagine you even know any of it.

"I told her last night about your being alive, and such a dear girl, and I said you should take her to San Antonio an' be with her to the end. Her father was your father; save me, she is all of your kin. I would not ask Margaret Collier to care for Katherine. It would be terrible for them both, but I do ask her little sister. Make it a duty, a labour of love, Letty, and teach that wicked heart to repent. Smooth that dreadful death-bed, you whose hand is so gentle, whose ways are so womanly and so helpful. Let her learn to bless you as Captain Dana did. The wrong she did you, you never knew.

"Now, John Scott, plead your case if you can. Tell her what the world will say of her. Promise her, if you dare, such care and tenderness that the evil speech of the world will never reach her and break her heart. Promise her to save her from herself when she comes to reason once more, for my girl is a good woman, pure in heart. To such when the awakening comes there is but one way of escape from the torment of conscience—death by one's own hand."

"It is very hard," I muttered. I looked at John; he turned his face away, and I saw his broad chest heave.

"'He can say nothing to you now, Letty, see!" cried my grandfather triumphantly. "John, I pity you. Life hasn't treated you fairly. Mebbe the parting is not for long. It's only good-bye for a little time. Some day I'll write you Katherine is no more on earth to curse us, to make us doubt infinite wisdom, when good people die and are mourned, and she has lived so long. Then you can come back to Letty."

"I want you to understand," John said coldly to me, and he never even looked at me, "that if you leave me here our parting is for ever. I cannot suffer any more. I shall put you out of my life entirely. I can live out my life alone. I have for long years. There is no future for us two if you go with him. The minister married us last night. You are my wife in my eyes. You promised me to love and honour me. Because a dead woman came to life is no reason we should be miserable for ever."

"I am glad that you said honour, John," I faltered, "for I realise that some day I should not honour you. I would reproach you bitterly. That is woman's way, when her heart tells her she is wrong, and she wakes to find herself false to all goodness and purity. If our parting is for all the future, I still say good-bye."

"He will come back to you," said my grandfather hopefully.

"I understand now," said John coldly. "I would not have one word of mine influence you. I dreamed you were an ideal woman, such as men have died for. I thought you a nobler creature than your kind. I find the first flaw of adversity frightens you. You fly to the shelter of narrow doctrine and empty words that mean nothing to love. You thrust away duty, forget our love, and talk of caring for a hag who would have left you to die in your helpless babyhood.

Digitized by Google

"Women cannot love! A few have, and their memories are bright and beautiful, still held in men's hearts; but you and all your kind are the shallow little brooks that babble all day in sunshine, and disappear in drought. I fancy, when the scales were gone from my eyes, I should have hated you, or at best, wearied of you, as men do of narrow women and narrow minds. Good-bye, little girl; that was all a farce last night, a comedy this morning. It is better so."

"How sorely you will repent all this, John," cried my grandfather, "when this dear child is lost to you, and must go on her sad round of duty and labour, without one kind memory of you she loved. There is your yacht, John; I hope you'll sail now and try her no more. I never knew a brave man could be so cruel, so cowardly before. Every word you said struck her like a blow, and yet she has no word of rebuke for you. Her little gentle heart will forgive all, forget all. She is a woman and like all her kind, and I am proud of her for that. She loves you; she wants to honour you, and so she says 'good-bye'; there is no love where there is no respect. I am an old man, and I have learned that, and it's worth living all the years to know."

"I am quite ready to go," said John quietly. He gave some directions to Bruce, then turned to me and held out his hand. "Good-bye, dear; I hope and pray we shall never meet again. It would be best for you. There is no legal tie between us. I will be your brother, as I was, ready to aid you always, but never into my life shall love come again."

"You are my husband," I said steadily. "Ah, I do love. I can love. I gave all my affection to you. I was so starved all my life. It would be so fair, so blessed a thing to go with you; I cannot like Katherine. I almost fear I shall hate her; but something in my heart tells me to do right. I never was good and calm like other women. I was always doing things that grieved people who cared for me. I was wilful and thoughtless, but some lost chord in my nature is touched.

"That you shall not," said Aunt Marg in a passion.

"I want our love to be good, John; that is all the love that endures. You shall not drive me out of your heart. I will haunt you always, a poor little wan-eyed ghost. I will come to you in your dreary hours, at sea—on shore; I will summon you from your dreams; you shall feel my head resting on your heart. If I die, my spirit will call you in its flight. I will keep you and win you back every time you thrust me away. Take my wedding ring—my wife's ring, and I no wife.

"You pity me, John. You are crying. Is it not hardest for me? Some day you will put it on my finger again." I took his hand and laid it against my face. "Will you not, John?" I said, and he, with a sob, stooped and kissed me, then, pushing me away almost rudely, rapidly walked to the end of the pier.

I heard the rattle of cordage, the creak of taut sails, and then, as the fog lifted, in the roseate dawn, we saw the yacht, a great white-winged bird, speeding to the Mexican coast. We drove home in silence, grandfather and I, but as the carriage stopped at the gate I said:

"If Cinderella has lost her Prince, she is not going to sit in ashes; no moping martyr is a brave one; you and I will keep our secret, only you can comfort me once in a while."

"Miss Vi'let," said Bruce hesitatingly, "'tain't none ob my affair, I knows, but I has to tell yo' yo' done mighty proper an' right, an' I know de doctor looking down from Heben say so, an'll bring Mars John back to yo' some day; dem trifflin' wimmin like de fust Mrs. John Scott ain't no comfort to nobody." He drove off rapidly, fearing he had said too much; and Bruce tries at least to keep his place, but being in the family so long, he thinks he has a right to an opinion occasionally.

I crept upstairs to take off my wedding gown, and Liz, her face swollen with crying, helped me. I smoothed the soft silken folds, as I laid it away. "I thought to be so happy, Liz," I said, and only a little ghost of a sob came, but she could not trust herself to speak; she had to go down and slam the kitchen door to ease her feelings.

"Go now and get the tickets, grandfather," I said; "I cannot live here another day in the ashes of my hopes."

He put his hands on my shoulders. "Can you bear it anyway, Letty? That white, set look on your face ain't naterel. You'll break under the burden on you; consumptives is so long a-dying."

"Don't think of that, dear. I would not shorten her life one moment. She needs so long to be better in, and think how little I have done for any of you for all your kindness to me. My day of reckoning has come and I am so happy. I never thought I could do you any good." Before I finished my sentence Aunt Marg came in, and whether her look on seeing me was of relief or regret I could not tell.

"Justina said you had gone with John," she cried.

"I came back. Grandfather showed me my duty."

"What is your duty?"

"To care for—my—sister Katherine," I stammered.

"That you shall not," said Aunt Marg in a passion, her face pallid, her eyes blazing; "you, a white-souled girl, in daily, hourly contact with a woman like her. Captain Lombard, you must be in your dotage to think of such a thing. I have some rights you must respect; Letty shall not go."

"Don't you try to warp your nature, Margaret Collier," said grandfather severely. "You are a good woman, but narrow, and such are often more a power for evil than for good. Seems like I was looking at folks through the big end of a telescope, they're shrinking so."

"I have made up my mind to care for her, Aunt Marg," I pleaded. "You must see there is no one else to go. If it breaks my heart, I will do my duty."

"Talk it over between ye," put in grandfather, hurrying away; he dreaded a family argument, man-like.

"Hearts do not break so easily," cried my aunt, with strange bitterness. "Nor will yours. What is your grief to mine? He has always loved you and will come back, but I have cared for him all my life, and he has never dreamed it. He might have liked me, grown to love me, but Katherine took him away in my girlhood.

"All these long years I have been forced to see his love for an ideal woman—a Katherine that never existed. What I would not do for myself I did for you, Letty—I shattered his idol. You, the little baby I saved, took his love away. You talk of heart-break! Think of me. Don't touch me; I have laid my soul bare to you, and I cannot forget. Go, do your duty, dear. You can forgive her better than I."

Digitized by Google

I bowed my head before my Aunt Margaret. I could have worshipped her as a saint. Oh, sorely tried, faithful, fond heart, is there any hereafter that repays your long years of loveless duty, the dreadful fate that made you—the gentlest among women—the witness against those assassins that made your life one long agony and terror? Too late I knew you and your inner life—too late to give you the love and gratitude I felt.

I left Aunt Marg, and went softly up to my room, where Katherine was still asleep. I noticed her waxen hands, her hollow cheeks, hidden by the tangled masses of her grey hair, her beautiful mouth half parted, as if she dreamed of some happy scene in her past. I wondered with a shudder what that past had been. Once I thought a life like that had some roses; all girls do when the glamour of genius in the narrator makes it so; now I realised there were only thorns.

I picked up her ragged garments from the floor, and from my scanty wardrobe brought others for her. She was about my size now. All my pretty gowns were at the big house, and I wanted never to see them again. They belonged to the dead Letty Lombard. The sun was shining on Katherine's face, and I went softly to lower the curtain.

"I am not asleep," she said, opening her great dark eyes. "I've been watching you. I don't like the dark; I always sleep with a light or the curtain up; and how hard it is to breathe when one's lungs are nearly gone. Come here."

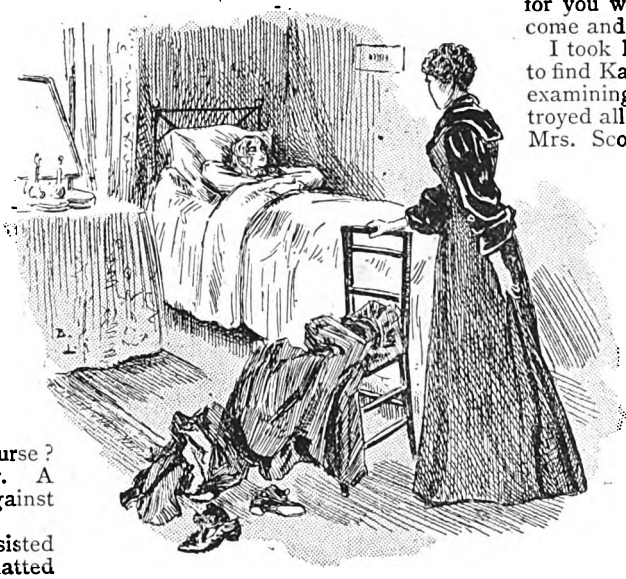
As I sat on the bed she lifted my hand. "It's smaller than mine. You have no rings, either. I used to have such pretty ones—all pawned. What size glove do you wear?"

"Five and a half." She was so odd. Imagine this was the first time she had ever seen me.

"Have you got any lovers?"

"No, I don't like to talk of men," I answered stiffly.

"Oh, that kind," she said pettishly, flinging my hand from her. "What kind of horrible penance has grandfather planned for me to have you for a nurse? Saint Margaret would be better. A young prim is such an offence against nature and youth."



Katherine was still asleep.

I did not speak but quietly assisted her to dress, brushing her matted hair, she often saying some very strange words, when I pulled it out of a tangle. I described Justina to her, and said she was going with us.

"I know Justina," she smiled, as if recalling some pleasant recollection. "What a skeleton I am, and I was so beautiful once. What poor clothes you've got. I looked in the closet last night. I suppose, though, you never wanted fine things. It don't go with the 'prim.'"

Still I did not speak. She was so helpless and weak, it took all my energies to dress her. She grew so exhausted I had to get her brandy twice; then I arranged a chair for her by the window, and Liz, looking very grumpy and cross, brought in her breakfast.

"This curse has come home to roost," said Katherine, "and I never saw her anything but mocking and merry, no matter how she suffered."

"I'd rather see de debbil in de house," muttered Liz, "an' good folks die an' yo' lib."

"Well, I'm nearly dead, if that will console you. Why is it you darkeys keep so young looking? You haven't changed a bit in twenty years."

"Yo' made nuff wrinkles in folkses faces," growled Liz.

"I like an honest hater. You don't bother me, Liz. And now, Miss Prim, get me out some sort of a bonnet, I lost mine on the beach. I lay out there all night, too weak to crawl further, found a bathing machine and stayed there until dark again. Then I got strength enough to get back to town, and hired a carriage to take me to John's house. Queer, you all being there. Your influence possibly. Mrs. Scott used to look down on grandfather. He said John educated you. His mother like you?"

"I—I think so."

"You look pretty when you colour like that. What eyes you've got! Your mother was only pink and white prettiness. You're quite chic. Margaret had a fine strong face, pity John had not married her; a solemn ass like him ought to be severely domestic, yet his life has been a regular romance."

I went out and left her trying to eat, but she could hardly touch a morsel. If I had stayed I should have broken down. Justina, quite gorgeously arrayed for travelling, met me in the hall. She was very cold and distant, because, I suppose, I did not go with John.

"If you had any moral sense, how I could love you, Justina," I said.

"Mebbe I'd better not go with Chica," she growled.

"You couldn't leave me, dear; and all your folks live in San Antonio. You must have a hundred cousins there."

"Chica want the money back?" she asked slyly.

"What John paid you? No. I think you deserve that, for you wanted to make me happy. Now come and see Katherine."

I took her upstairs, where I was pained to find Katherine staggering weakly about, examining my boxes. Luckily, I had destroyed all the relics of my girlhood. Then Mrs. Scott came to see me, and was so sweet and kind, I was glad I had taken the better way; to lose the love of good women shuts out the best of life. She told me she would send me things for Katherine's comfort.

"As I grow old I learn forgiveness and charity, dear," she said, "and I will wait in the big house for the coming of its mistress—my Violet. I know she will find her happiness some time."

She clung to me at parting, weeping bitterly; and then, sick at heart at the task before me, in bitter anger at the world that had been so cruel, I went up to my sister's room. She was lying on the bed, a half-emptied glass of brandy beside her, between her lips a cigarette; while Justina, lying at ease on the floor, was rolling another one in her long fingers.

(To be continued next week.)

NOT TO BE MISSED.

The new story by H. RIDER HAGGARD in Pearson's Weekly. Also a GRAND PHOTOGRAPHIC COMPETITION with valuable money prizes.

Pearson's Weekly is the only paper which insures its readers against Burglary.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE

FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND, 1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from
THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice, both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MELVILLE'S

New Upright

GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE,

61, Charing Cross Road, London.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/3, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
TO OBSTINATE CASES, LADIES
TO NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, LADIES
TO GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES
TO No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:— LADIES
TO "By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise. LADIES
TO A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case. LADIES
TO Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope. LADIES
TO Write privately to— LADIES
TO Mrs. S. S. S., LADIES
TO 145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LADIES
TO LONDON, S.W. LADIES

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, (a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine and they can be seen at any time.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALACE STEAMERS. PARIS AND BACK FOR A GUINEA. BOULOGNE AND BACK for 10s. 6d.

LA MARGUERITE. FINEST and FASTEST STEAMER in the WORLD. SPEED, 25 MILES AN HOUR.

BOULOGNE and BACK DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted), by LA MARGUERITE.

PARIS and BACK, Saturday to Monday for 21s., other days 26s. return, By LA MARGUERITE.

MARGATE and BACK, DAILY (Tuesdays only excepted).

SIX HOURS ASHORE AT MARGATE for 5s. 6d. by LA MARGUERITE.

Passengers can Return by the ROYAL SOVEREIGN at their option.

Cook's Hotel Coupon Tickets may be obtained for all places.

TIMES OF SAILINGS (Weather and other circumstances permitting).

Leaving	Week days.	Sundays.
FENCHURCH STREET (by Special Train to Tilbury Pier) ..	8.38 ..	8.55
TILBURY (Gravesend) ..	9.30 ..	10. 0
	Noon.	p.m.
Margate .. About	12. 0 ..	12.30
Arriving.	p.m.
Boulogne .. „	2.30 ..	3. 0
Returning.	p.m.	p.m.
Boulogne .. „	3.30 ..	3.30
Margate .. „	6. 0 ..	6. 0
TILBURY (Special Train awaits Steamer) .. „	8.45 ..	8.45

Arriving at Fenchurch Street Station (City) 9.35 p.m.

All passengers disembark at Tilbury and travel by train to Fenchurch Street.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN, DAILY, at 9.30 a.m. (except Fridays, on which day LA MARGUERITE will run as usual), from Old Swan Pier, London Bridge, calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch Street Station 10.28 a.m. in connection. Tender steamer Greenwich 9.25, Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Margate Passengers can return by LA MARGUERITE.

YARMOUTH and LOWESTOFT by Palace Steamer VICTORIA, from Harwich DAILY (Fridays excepted), at 3.0 p.m., in connection with the Koh-i-Noor, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.10 a.m. Return tickets available for season except as above.

Offices—33, KING WILLIAM STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

VICTORIA STEAMERS. (Weather and other circumstances permitting.)

CLACTON, HARWICH, and Back, YARMOUTH, LOWESTOFT, IPSWICH, and FELIXSTOWE, by KOH-I-NOOR DAILY (Fridays excepted), from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch Street 10.15 a.m. in connection. Tender Greenwich 9.25 a.m., Blackwall 9.35 a.m.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND from Old Swan Pier, at 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m. DAILY (except Friday), calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich.

HAMPTON COURT, by CARDINAL WOLSEY, DAILY, at 10.0 a.m., from Old Swan Pier.

KEW GARDENS, BATTERSEA, and GREENWICH PARKS, frequently.

Offices—VICTORIA HOUSE, LAURENCE POUNTNEY LANE, E.C.

Price 7s. 6d. for any Size up to 40 inches.

POST FREE U.K.

"MINNOW" LIFE BELT

Trade Mark. FOR

LADIES, GENTLEMEN, and CHILDREN.

The Belt will support three men with their clothes on, can be inflated in a few seconds, and is so constructed that in the event of accidents the wearer is turned in a floating position, with the face well out of the water. It weighs a few ounces only, can be conveniently carried in the pocket, is made of the strongest material, nothing to get out of order, will bear a pressure of 2 to 300 lbs. and withstand any climate. Parents can with perfect confidence allow their children to bathe without fear of danger. Used by yachting and canoeing clubs, fishermen, and bathers all over the world. Worn as an ordinary belt. State size of waist. Cash to accompany all orders. Cheques and P.O.'s to be crossed "Bank of Liverpool."

The following, one of the many Testimonials received, speaks for itself:—

New Brighton Sailing Club, June 13, 1894.

Dear Sir,—It may interest you to know that we had practical illustration of the efficacy of your "Minnow" Life Belts last evening. We were struck by a heavy squall and upset whilst racing, but having, in accordance with our club rules, life belts on, in this case of your make, we suffered nothing but a little inconvenience, such as naturally arises from getting wet, and this even was partial, as your belts floated us so high, that, we were practically dry from a little above the waist up.

Yours truly, J. F. JELLICO, "Dever," N.B.S.C.

ADDRESS ORDERS TO

W. R. HARGREAVES, Waterloo, near Liverpool.

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I.O.F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; £600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW.

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 295.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 25, 1894. [Price One Penny.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS LIVER COMPLAINTS
SICK HEADACHE DYSPEPSIA A Splendid Tonic and Gentle Aperient.

MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.

Sold in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each, by all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BEETHAM'S WORLD FAMED CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists, CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S Strengthening SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from

THE INFANTINA COMPANY, London, S.W.

PREVENTS COLDS AND CHILLS

BOVRIL

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST STOCK FOR SOUP.

Digitized by Google

PALACE STEAMERS.—LA MARGUERITE. FASTEST STEAMER in the WORLD.

BOULOGNE and BACK DAILY (Tuesdays excepted), for 10s. 6d. (3rd. rail and fore cabin); 3rd. rail and saloon, 12s. 6d.

Returns available three days, or for season for 2s. excess.

PARIS AND BACK, SATURDAY to MONDAY, for 21s.

Other Days, 26s. return. Return Tickets available third day of issue. Special Train when the numbers warrant it.

MARGATE and BACK, DAILY (Tuesdays excepted).

SIX HOURS ASHORE AT MARGATE for 5s. 6d. by LA MARGUERITE.

From Fenchurch-street Station for Tilbury, weekdays, 8.33 and 8.38; and Sundays, 8.45 and 8.55 a.m.

All passengers disembark at Tilbury on return journey, and travel by train to Fenchurch Street, arriving about 9.50 p.m.

Passengers may obtain tickets beforehand for rail and boat at 33, King William-Street.

Cook's Hotel Coupon Tickets for all places.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN, DAILY, at 9.30 a.m. (except Fridays, on which day La Marguerite will run as usual from Tilbury), from OLD SWAN PIER (London Bridge), calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch Street Station 10.28 a.m. in connection. Tender steamer Greenwich 9.25 a.m., Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Margate Passengers can return by La Marguerite, but if they hold London Bridge tickets they must exchange same at Purser's Office on ship for rail tickets, and pay 6d., third-class train.

YARMOUTH and LOWESTOFT by Palace Steamer VICTORIA, from Harwich DAILY (Fridays excepted), at 3.0 p.m., in connection with the Koh-i-Noor, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.10 a.m. Return tickets available for season except as above.

Offices—33, KING WILLIAM STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

VICTORIA STEAMERS.—CLACTON, HARWICH, and BACK in the day. YARMOUTH, Lowestoft, Ipswich, and Felixstowe. DAILY (Fridays excepted), when the Lord of the Isles will run to Clacton, by KOH-I-NOOR, from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at Woolwich (South) and Tilbury. Tender Steamer from Greenwich 9.25, and Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Special Train from Fenchurch-street Station at 9.45 and 10.15 a.m., to meet the Koh-i-Noor at Tilbury.

SALOON STEAMER LORD OF THE ISLES, from OLD SWAN, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich. MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and THURSDAYS, for ROSHERVILLE, GRAVESEND, SOUTHEND, and SHEERNESS, at 11 a.m. FRIDAYS, CLACTON, SOUTHEND, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 9.10 a.m

SATURDAYS, HUSBANDS' BOAT to MARGATE, and BACK, at 1.30 p.m. Train, Fenchurch-street Station 2.45 p.m., in connection.

SUNDAYS, ROUND NORE LIGHT, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 2.45 p.m.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND DAILY (Fridays excepted) by MERMAID, 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m, from OLD SWAN PIER, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and Woolwich (South).

HAMPTON COURT, RICHMOND, or KINGSTON, from OLD SWAN PIER at 10.0 a.m. DAILY by CARDINAL WOLSEY, calling at all piers.

KEW GARDENS, GREENWICH and BATTERSEA PARKS frequently.

Cheap Through Tickets to and from Stations on District Railway.

Offices—VICTORIA HOUSE, LAURENCE POUNTNEY LANE, E.C.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 295.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING AUGUST 25, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

The Hand that Murdered

TOIL! Toil! Toil! From the break of dawn till the fall of night; from Sabbath to Sabbath; from December to June, from June to December; nothing but toil. His brush must be always between his fingers, his palette for ever on his hand, and faces and figures and fancies must grow beneath his all too incompetent touch.

But there is a faint glimmer of light ahead through all the inky darkness, to which he struggles bravely on, a glimmer that grows and grows as times passes, now diminishing, now increasing, according to his state of mind. For John Turner makes a brave fight against adversity, and he struggles manfully on through the gloom to the happiness that is the light, the happiness of being always with Marie Deloncle, the young French girl who lives across the way in the tall, solemn house with the broken chimney-pots and the musty green bedraggled curtains at the windows.

Their love has been the love of years, yet it has not grown stagnant, nor have their embraces lost any of their pristine sweetness.

Marie was a tall, well-developed girl, with a supple figure, and a wealth of handsome black hair surmounting a pair of eyes that had again and again appeared in Turner's pictures. She lived with her mother, and worked at a hat warehouse, where her French aptness for trimming brought in a small weekly wage barely enough to keep them free from hunger, and certainly not enough to save up to replace the old musty green curtains with a pair of a brighter colour.

Yet there was a glimmer of happiness ahead for both Marie and her lover. By scraping in one direction and another he had hoarded a few pounds, and kept them in the wall, where nobody knew of them but Marie; and often would he spread out the money before her, and together would they build their castles in Spain, and make life seem brighter than it had done since the last ones had been shattered.

Of an evening she would sit at her window and knit, and look across the way into the room of her lover who toiled at his pictures. And when it became too dark for work he would visit her and her mother and talk of the future.

One day the bright glimmer of light that led him on disappeared of a sudden. All the happiness of his soul was gone in a flash; the plans for the future were broken and gone; the darkness of his soul became intense; and with a great sob he threw himself on his bed and buried his face in his hands.

Marie had deceived him. Mrs. Potter, his landlady, the fellow-lodgers—all the people in the street knew it, and told him of it; and, before he waited to hear her explanation, he saw nothing but misery before him. After a while he roused himself and awaited her coming. But she did not come, nor did he see her at the window; and at nightfall he had not the courage nor strength of mind to seek her out and demand the reason for her neglect.

It was a night of misery—a night of hopes and fears—that he spent tossing about on his bed, maddened with the thought that he had lost her for ever, and the next moment reviling himself for his mad folly in believing the lying tongues of mischief-making scandalmongers.

Next morning he awoke from a short, restless doze, and, without taking any food, crushed his hat on his head and went across the road to her house. He knocked at the door of her room and went in and found her preparing the morning meal. She was not astonished at seeing him, and she went on with her work as if he was not there—in fact, as if she did not know of his existence at all.

Then she spoke, her eyes flashing with a strange light.

"Why did you not come to see me last night?"

Of course, he didn't know why. He had had no reason for breaking his general rule except the rumoured story of her deception, and he felt and looked abashed.

"I waited a long time for you," she went on, in her soft easy voice, moving about the room and laying the cloth. "I sent mère to her bed at last, and knew you would not come when the clock struck ten. It was unkind of you."

She looked so sweet, so innocent in her simple cotton gown, and her voice was so pretty that Turner strode over to her side and took her hand.

"Marie, where were you yesterday?"

"Me? Yesterday?"

She raised her eyebrows and assumed a look of childish surprise. "I was at my work. Why do you ask?"

"Because," he said sternly, trying in vain to fix his eyes upon hers as she gazed on the floor, "because I heard that you were seen with a man during the dinner hour. Come now, was that true?"

"And that was why you did not come and see me

"Why did you not come to see me last night?"

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

last evening," she answered petulantly. "You could not trust me."

For a moment he was on the verge of relaxing the firm attitude he had taken up and of kissing her and making friends once more. But in her nervous, restless glance he found guilt, and continued,

"You have not yet told me if the rumour was true, Marie. Was it?"

She made a movement as if to release herself, but he strengthened his grasp of her arm so that she flushed with the pain of it.

"I did see my cousin, yes. He is over here in England. That is all."

"And why did you not tell me of this last night?"

"There was no need. Why should you know? He is my cousin."

And with that Turner had to be content, for nothing more would she tell him, and he left the house with a hard, gnawing pain at his heart, and a misery over his soul that he had never known before.

That evening she was at her window, and smiled to him when she raised her head from her work, but that was not often, for she seemed more thoughtful than she had ever been, and his share of her smiles was small. At dusk he went and sat with her, but she was quiet, and did not speak much, nor when he kissed her good night did he feel the responding pressure of her arms nor the kiss upon his lips.

Before the next day was half over he heard again another rumour that corresponded with the first. Marie had been seen by one of her factory hands speaking with a foreign-looking man, who had walked part of the way home with her.

She was not at her accustomed post in the evening until it was almost time for him to stop his work, and then she appeared and called across to him to say that she was too unwell to see him that night.

When he heard what she said, he did not move from the chair on which he was sitting for fully a minute. He had gone quite white, and stared at her with eyes that said nothing, nor meant nothing. She looked frightened, until he rose slowly and disappeared into the shadow of his room, then she closed her window.

Turner sank on his bed. His head throbbed wildly and his eyes burned in his head. He was a strongly imaginative fellow, with a melancholy habit of looking at absolutely the worst side of things that was possible, and as he lay tossing about he thought of the happy days he had spent with Marie, that were all past and gone, of the cutting and contriving to save sufficient money to marry her, all of which was useless to him now, of the thief who had robbed him of her love, who would kiss the lips he had so often kissed, who would hold in his arms the form he had so often embraced. And he groaned aloud in the agony of his thoughts, and bitterly cursed his fate.

Took his seat in the train.

Any ordinary man would have discovered the whereabouts of this French cousin of Marie's and, having brought himself face to face with him, would have ascertained at once how matters stood, and got some satisfaction out of the whole business.

But John Turner was not an ordinary man. His Bohemian life had excited his sensibilities, and although he loved with a wild love and hated with a bitter hatred, his finer feelings told him that if Marie loved another, whoever it might be, he would not stand in the way of her happiness.

This was all very noble, but it is not human; but his highly sensitive nature would not allow him to see it in any other light, so that when morning broke he had resigned himself to his melancholy fate, and had planned out his course of action.

As the dinner-hour approached he left the house and took up a position where he might see Marie come out of her place of business. The time arrived, and with it a Frenchman, who greeted her cordially when her anxious eyes rested upon his. That was enough for Turner. He went back to his dismal lodgings, lone, sad, and broken-hearted.

Taking a sovereign from the place where it had lain so long he went out into the street, and made his way to the nearest railway station. Then he booked for a place twenty miles down in the country, and took his seat in the train. As the houses became fewer and fewer, and the fields and trees more frequent, there crept over his soul a lighter feeling of pleasure—a thrilling delight, a happiness that he had never before known.

It was so many years since he had enjoyed the freshness of God's undefiled country, that he positively yearned for the time to come when he might step out into the broad white roads, and ramble unrestrained through the woods that capped the long low-lying range of downs.

That night, on his return, he bounded up the rickety stairs to his attic as he had never done before, and threw himself on his bed thoroughly fatigued. His whole body was throbbing with the exercise, and the usually sluggish blood coursed rapidly through his veins.

All day long he had driven the thoughts of his false sweetheart out of his mind, he had exercised a will power that refused to come to him while his body lacked vigour. His plans for the future were simple. He would sell up his miserable little home and betake himself to another part of the town; he would make a practice of taking jaunts into the country at least once a week with the money that he had over from the daily expenses; instead of saving it up, he would start life afresh, and the Academy would find room for his productions before another year was out, a state of affairs that hitherto he had only vaguely thought of when he painted only to sell.

Next day he made preparations for his departure, and gave notice to the landlady. In the evening he went over to Marie's rooms to bid her farewell, an undertaking that he would have shirked like a coward while his body lacked vitality. In her room, and talking to her and her mother, was Jacques Maynard, the stranger. Turner had not bargained for this untimely and inconvenient meeting.

He looked from one to the others in turn, then, with an impulse that was not of himself, he went over to the Frenchman and boxed his ears. Turner was a big man, and, as he stood in the twilight, glowering at the Frenchman, who had tremblingly curled himself up in the chair holding up his hands to avoid further blows, he looked a formidable antagonist.

The sight of Marie, flushed and heated, with her dark flashing eyes, and her quivering lips, re-aroused in his heart the passion that he had believed, that he had hoped, was gone for ever. He loved her again with a force that he had never known before, and the jealous rage that filled his heaving breast would have strengthened his arm to any deed.

He was a different man now to the pallid, slaving, bloodless artist, toiling from morning till night at pictures that brought in only a few shillings, and he believed that this new departure of manliness in his nature would retrieve the love that he fancied he had lost.

Madame Deloncle, after the lapse of a few seconds, found strength to give a little scream. This brought the trio to their senses. Turner strode over to Marie's side, and whispered harshly in her ear,

"Do you love him?" pointing to the Frenchman.

Digitized by Google

But she was too terrified to answer, for in all her life she had never once seen Turner so mad with rage, so uncontrollably violent as now.

Then, pressing a hot kiss on her lips, he went out into the street.

The rain was falling heavily when he reached the front door, and by the time he reached his room it was striking the patched roof above him smartly. The wind blew in strong gusts, shaking and rattling the windows, while the drops of water drifted in between the cracks, filling the air with a chilly dampness.

Once in his room, he threw himself down in a chair and fell to cursing the man who had stepped in between him and his sweetheart. As thought followed thought, he grew more and still more violent as to the course of action he intended to take up. Until this interloper arrived on the scene he was everything on earth to Marie. And he would yet be so—when the French dog had gone, no matter where.

But go, he certainly should, and the sooner the better. He would throw up all thought of moving now, unless he took Marie with him, and she, he was certain, would acquiesce if only the third party were out of the way.

To-morrow, then, there would be one fiend less on this earth, and he would marry Marie, who should never know that his hands were dyed with the blood of the man who had attempted to filch her love from him. To-morrow, the world would be brighter for him and for her. To-morrow, God's judgment would be meted out upon the cowardly interloper through the hand of his servant. And, revelling in the anticipation of the deed, he got into bed, and fell asleep.

Next morning Mrs. Potter took up his breakfast, and found him lying cold and lifeless in his bed. She let fall the tray from her hands and flew shrieking downstairs and out into the street, and shortly after a couple of policemen took possession of the room and its ghastly occupant.

An inspector came a little later and made notes of the position of the different pieces of furniture in the apartment. Washstand in the back right corner, facing window; foot of bed against wall opposite window, head facing window; easel, close to window, bearing picture of Arab chief in act of falling—half finished; lay figure dressed as Arab chief on floor near bed, right side, as if it had been knocked down; old horse pistol, empty, lying alongside bed, muzzle pointing towards deceased, lying on its left side, hammer towards window, distance from bed three feet, ditto from wall at head of bed four feet three inches; large pool of water near lay figure, smaller pools near washstand and easel, all probably from leaks in the roof.

A lay figure dressed in the garb of an Arab chief.

The inquest was held, and when everything concerning the feud between the deceased and Jacques Maynard and the quarrel on the night before the death, and of Maynard's threat to revenge himself upon Turner, a threat that he made before leaving the presence of Marie, and all this and much more, was known, the coroner passed a verdict of wilful murder by Jacques Maynard, and next day he was arrested and charged before a magistrate.

The case was clear and strong against the Frenchman. Madame Deloncle and her daughter had given evidence at the inquest, and both of them, greatly agitated and frightened at the solemn proceedings answered all questions put to them without daring to hesitate or to speak an untruth.

This state of affairs resulted in much more being known concerning the positions taken up by the deceased and the accused than would otherwise have been the case, for Marie being unacquainted with the English laws, did not dare to shield her cousin by playing upon her knowledge as she would certainly have done had the case been brought before a French court of Justice.

Consequently, every word that fell from her lips wove a fatal net round Maynard. By the magistrate he was convicted and sent for trial.

Marie was brokenhearted. It was only too true by her demeanour that the arrest of Jacques caused her tenfold more misery than the death of her former lover; yet, in spite of her affection for the accused, she fully believed that it was he who had committed the murder, for she was aware of his violent passions and of the facilities which offered themselves for obtaining access to Turner's rooms while he slept.

Maynard she had loved when she lived at Lierve, the little town in the south-west of France; but she had believed when she came to England that she would never see him again. When she met him one day coming along the street the old love was rekindled, and M. Maynard usurped her English lover.

The trial came on. At the end of the first day a young Frenchman from the body of the court, who had been listening to the proceedings, made his way to the counsel for the defence, and conferred for some time with him on a subject that appeared to throw a fresh light on the matter.

The learned counsel asked the judge at the moment of leaving whether he would grant a couple of days' remand until the conclusion of some experiments that would probably be of intense moment in the issue of the case. The respite was given, and the prisoner removed to his cell.

On the third day the young stranger entered the witness box. He proceeded to give a short and concise outline of his connection with the case, which, he explained, did not extend further than a casual hearing of the proceedings in the court a couple of days before. He was, he said, a student, and his chief study was capillary force. He then went on to say:

"I have made a minute examination of the room in which the unfortunate John Turner met with his death, and I have been ably and intelligently assisted in my researches by Inspector Johnstone, to whom I tender my best thanks.

"I found that on reference to the unfinished picture resting on the easel in the deceased's room that it represented an episode in the Soudan War, the principal actor being an Arab chief in the act of falling dead. In his hand was a pistol.

"Lying on the floor near the bed was a lay figure dressed in the garb of an Arab chief, while close by lay a pistol. This pistol beyond a shadow of doubt was originally in the hand of the lay figure.

"Wood, when moistened, expands. In ancient stone and slate quarries wooden wedges were forced between cracks, and soaked with water, with the result that the wood, by expanding, split the solid mass. Capillary force is irresistible.

"You are already aware of the fact that a large pool of water was found near the lay figure, which had fallen from a leak in the roof. The rain had been falling all night through. The stream of water had doubtless run for several hours on to the wooden hand of the figure. The joints of all the fingers are, I find, fashioned to closely resemble the movements of those of the human hand, and beyond all doubt one finger was placed in the trigger-guard and over the trigger.

"The pressure required in firing the pistol would have been readily afforded by the general swelling of the whole hand, as it requires only the slightest movement to release the hammer.

"My theory is, therefore, gentlemen, that the water, falling upon the model's hand, fired the pistol.

"I am willing to conduct a number of experiments to prove that what I say is borne out by fact, but, I think you will agree with me, this is unnecessary."

. . . . . .

Yet, had this inanimate hand not taken John Turner's life, he might even then have been standing, a trembling criminal, in the dock from which Jacques Maynard was now released.

Digitized by Google

A JEALOUS GHOST.

—o—

THREE photographs hung over the mantel-piece in the parlour behind the bright shop of the young German apothecary. One was a pretty girl, another an old man, the third a young man. They were framed alike, and no one had ever noticed anything particular about them, until one evening one of the young Schaeffer's compatriots, Professor Schwartz, chanced to come into the room, and, having contemplated the etchings and the water-colours which graced the walls, placed himself before the mantel-piece, and after staring through his blue spectacles for at least fifteen minutes, said solemnly:

"My good friend, Schaeffer, perhaps you will be kind enough to tell me if I am crazy, or if this gentleman is transparent? It appears to me that I can see some shelves and bottles directly through his coat and vest. Is it so?"

"It is so," said Schaeffer, lighting his painted china pipe at the brass student-lamp. "You make no mistake, Doctor Schwartz, I assure you.

"It is some clever trick of photography, I suppose?" asked the doctor.

"It is one of the facts of a tragedy," said young Schaeffer "It is something that haunts me day and night. I should like to speak of it to some one who can keep a secret; a doctor must be able to do that,"

"Especially, if, like me, he is a bachelor," said Doctor Schwartz. "I give my promise to repeat nothing that you tell me."

"We will have a glass of Rhine wine together then," said the druggist: "and while I get the bottle, look at the other photographs—the one to the right is the only girl I ever loved; the other is Doctor Hoffman, of whom I shall have something to say."

"And the transparent gentleman?" asked the doctor.

"I keep that for the story," said young Schaeffer.

Ten minutes later the two faced each other at the table, their glasses between them, and the room full of smoke, and Adolphe Schaeffer began thus:—

"At noon to-day it was exactly five years since a note was handed to me, signed by Doctor Alexander Hoffman, and asking me to call upon him at once. I obeyed the summons promptly, and found him in his shop. He was, as I am, an apothecary.

"He was evidently in deep distress of some kind, and soon told me what it was. He had lost his only son, Theodore, whom he adored, and who was his assistant in his business, and his destined successor.

"Broken down with sorrow, the old man was unable to do all that fell upon him, and hearing that I wanted a position he had summoned me. He desired me to board with him, and offered an excellent salary.

"However, the low ceilinged shop, situated in a narrow street, and having very small flat windows into which the sun could scarcely come, was so gloomy, and the old man in his sorrow so depressing, that I felt as though to accept the offer would be to bury myself alive, and was doing my best to decline it with civility, when a very beautiful girl appeared at the door of the inner room. She had the face of an angel; her hair was golden, and her eyes a beautiful dark-blue; her dress was black. Seeing a stranger she retired; but in that moment I gave her my heart. Love at first sight is a serious fact.

"I concluded that she was the old man's daughter, and the thought of seeing her every day filled me with rapture. I changed the wording of the sentence I had half finished into an acceptance, and established myself in the house as soon as possible.

"If ever sorrow dwelt in man's abode, it rested there. The very walls seemed to mourn for the dead Theodore; the old servant cried her eyes red every day; the father gave miserable glances at the empty place at table when he sat at meals.

"The girl was a very Niobe. Shortly I made the discovery that she was not old Hoffman's daughter, but the child of a friend, whom Mrs. Hoffman had taken to bring up, and that she had been betrothed to Theodore.

"However, this did not put an end to my hopes, but simply postponed them. I knew that young people usually outlived the greatest grief. I was quiet and sympathetic. I made myself useful to old Hoffman, and soon won my way into his heart.

"A year had passed before I received my first smile from Lina Henzel. It was in the little garden, where I had been helping her water the flowers. That was the first, not the last. I took my steps softly, one at a time. Finally, I understood that I might speak, and did so.

"She smiled, and then sobbed:

"'You will not ask me to forget poor Theodore?' she pleaded.

"I reassured her, and she gave me her promise. For awhile we kept our secret, but Doctor Hoffman soon discovered it.

"'Children,' he said one day at breakfast, 'I know what thoughts are in your hearts, and they do not offend me. Theodore has been truly mourned, but he would not wish Lina to live the life of a nun. Besides, if you marry each other, we can all live together until my time comes, and then I will leave you everything. It gives me some hope of domestic comfort in my old age. You, Adolph, will be a second son to me.'

"I thanked him affectionately. I had now begun to love even the dark little house where I had first seen Lina.

"That night, however, bad dreams troubled me, and I awoke unrefreshed, and with a strange foreboding of evil. Dr. Hoffman was away on business, and I had sole charge of the shop. The customers were numerous, and a great doctor himself brought in a very particular prescription. It was while I was making this up that I felt a hand grasp my wrist, as a teacher does that of a younger child whom he assists to form his first letter on a slate.

"But instead of aiding me, this thing that clutched me prevented me from doing what I wished. It was impossible for me to open the jars to extract the contents. At last, terrified and trembling, I flung myself in a chair, and I saw—I swear it—all the proper jars lifted from their places and the prescription correctly made up by some invisible being. The package was also labelled and tied up and then vanished, and the next moment I heard the doctor call me.

"'I must have been asleep, I think,' he said. 'At least my wits were wandering, for I did not see you place this in my hand. Good morning.' He was off.

"'You see you are not wanted here,' said a voice at my ear. 'In fact, consider yourself dismissed.'

"I looked about me; there was no one there. I rushed into the shop. Several customers were waiting, but the moment I attempted to serve anything my wrists were once more imprisoned in that vice-like grasp. I was obliged once more to seat myself.

"Fortunately these people only needed cologne water, soap, and some patent medicines in bottles, and I desired them to help themselves, saying that I was faint, and must take a few minutes to recover myself. They did as I asked, hoped I would feel better shortly, and left me alone.

"With an indescribable terror upon me I hurried into the room, where Lina sat at work.

"'Ah, Adolph, how pale you are!' she said. 'Are you ill?'

"'I do not know. I am afraid so,' I said. 'I am unable to make up the prescriptions.'

"I seated myself near her and took her hand in mine. On that instant that iron grasp was upon me; not on my wrist this time, but on my neck; and gasping for breath I was flung violently to the floor.

Digitized by Google

"'You are not wanted here either,' said the same voice that had before spoken to me. 'You had better go.'

"Although I felt exactly as though human hands had seized me and thrown me down, to Lina it appeared that I had swooned or had vertigo.

"'And you were not yourself, Adolph,' she said; 'for you told me I was not wanted and had better go.'

"'Indeed, I did not speak,' I said.

"'Indeed, you did,' said Lina. 'There was no one else in the room.' Then she began to weep."

There was a pause. Doctor Schwartz seemed to ruminate, Adolph Schaeffer to be lost in reverie. Suddenly he started to his feet and began to pace the room.

"Thus it began," he said; "to give you the details would require hours. Ah, it was horrible! In the presence of Doctor Hoffman it contented itself with making me drop glasses, drop jars, fall down, and do all sorts of mischief, by catching me by the wrists and ankles, or by the coat collar, but if I were alone in the shop there came a repetition of the work of the first day.

"At last, one afternoon a girl entered, and I was about to attempt to wait on her, when suddenly she screamed and rushed out of the place.

"Afterwards she told everyone that she had seen Theodore Hoffman's ghost behind the counter; but as she was only a little servant from the country, she was simply laughed at for her pains.

"However, this gave me an idea. I was fond of photography, and rather expert. One morning I brought my camera into the shop, and, when the invisible being began to make up a prescription he had snatched from my hand, commenced operations.

"The result was the picture about which you asked me. I myself saw nothing, but it was developed upon the plate. The doctor had a likeness of his son Theodore. This was the same man, save that, as you see, he was transparent.

"I hid the picture; I tried to bear my misery as well as I could. I hoped to weary the revengeful ghost; but though at times he allowed me to be myself in the shop, he never permitted me to touch the lips of my betrothed wife.

"She, angry and astonished, grew very cool to me; and at last one night I was awakened by a touch upon my forehead, and, opening my eyes, saw a figure at my bedside—the figure in the photograph.

"'Come, then,' it said in that well-known voice, 'why do you not go?'

"'Why do you wish to ruin my life?' I asked. 'What have I done?'

"'Robbed me of my father's affection, my proper work, and, above all, of Lina's love,' said the spirit. 'However, you cannot keep my treasure; you must go. I have no hatred to you, but this is my place which you usurp. The fight is useless.'

"'I shall fight all the same,' I said.

"The ghost vanished with a laugh.

"Never shall I forget the next day; its events are burned into my soul. The invisible hands scarcely left me; I appeared to work destruction wherever I went. I was made to be offensive and even insolent to the best customers.

"Late at night, the professor and I sat alone in the little parlour where I had been so happy.

"'What has happened to you, Adolph?' he said. 'Why have you changed so?'

"It was a relief to tell him all. He listened gravely.

"'I believe you,' he said. 'I have reason. When I am alone I now constantly see my son standing near me. There is reproach in his eyes. Adolph, you must go.'

"I knew it must be, and bowed my head.

"'And Lina?' I asked.

"'She must not know the reason,' he answered. 'I will quarrel with you and break the match. Privately, I will give you a sum of money to enable you to set up business in England.'

"'I cannot part from Lina,' I said.

"'You must, since Theodore desires it,' said the old man."

There was another pause. Adolph Schaeffer reseated himself at the table and refilled his glass.

"It was as Theodore wished," he said. "My life became unbearable, and I went through the farce of being quarrelled with by Doctor Hoffman and dismissed.

"Theodore had become such a real person to me that I felt like a person who had been about to marry a woman who had thought herself a widow, but to whom her husband suddenly returned.

"The fact that Lina knew nothing of the facts of the case caused me much suffering, but the spectral Theodore would not permit her to be told; he never touched or approached her.

"Later, Dr. Hoffman wrote to me that he assisted him efficiently in the prescription department, and that he frequently saw him, but that Lina never did. Later he wrote me that the shop had gained a reputation for being haunted, and that his patrons had one by one departed.

"'However, I am very well off,' he said, 'and may retire from business. I am very happy in the constant company of my beloved son Theodore.'

"Then for a while there was no more correspondence. One day a letter reached me—it was from Lina.

"'My dear old papa Hoffman is dead,' she said. 'He passed away one night in sleep. He was always kind to me, save in the manner of which you know, in which you suffered equally with myself. But he had hallucinations before he died, and was thought by many to be mad. However, it was only on one point. I mention it, because it explains his unreasonable quarrel with you during an attack of illness which should have awakened sympathy. Be assured that that was the only feeling it aroused in my heart.'"

"Ah," said Dr. Schwartz, "the young lady would be very well pleased to renew the old engagement."

"Perhaps," said Adolph Schaeffer, sighing—"perhaps. But as she, without knowing it, belongs to Theodore Hoffman—who will undoubtedly claim her in the other world—I shall be very careful never to meet her again in this, neither do I believe that Theodore would permit me to do so.

"Everyone has a tragedy in his life—this is mine; but I asked you to keep my secret, because I am engaged to Miss Millwood, a lovely and estimable young lady, to whom I shall try to be a perfect husband, and for whom I have great affection. Of course, she must never hear this story.

"The day before the wedding the portraits of Lina and Theodore will disappear from my walls, and I will strive to banish them from my memory for ever."

The clock struck eleven. Doctor Schwartz started to his feet.

"Adolph Schaeffer, you tell an excellent ghost story," he said. "If I did not know that man goes out as a candle in a puff of wind, I might believe it."

"But how do you know that?" cried Adolph.

"Oh," said Schwartz, "I have dissected many bodies, but never discovered the seat of the soul! Good night."

He marched away, laughing; but the young assistant, who, with his ear to the partition, had been listening most of the time, could never quite make up his mind whether Adolph Schaeffer believed the story that he told or had merely been amusing himself.

NOT TO BE MISSED.

The new story by H. RIDER HAGGARD in Pearson's Weekly. Also a GRAND PHOTOGRAPHIC COMPETITION with valuable money prizes.

Pearson's Weekly is the only paper which insures its readers against Burglary.

Digitized by Google

A FOOL'S ADVICE.

THE man who told me this is no longer a young man; he was not young when he confided the tale to me, and that was quite fifteen years ago.

He was a little, lean, dark-complexioned—a truly foreign-looking man, although he was an Englishman. Long years of residence in India had burned him to the colour of mahogany, and the hot, pestiferous winds of the great peninsula seemed to have well-nigh mummified him, so dried and shrivelled did he appear.

For convenience I will call him Doctor Goslett, although that is not his name, you may be sure; nor is it anything like his real name. He had been a surgeon in the Indian army for a long term, having gone out there while still a young man—just after taking his "sheepskin," in fact.

"It was when I had been in India but a few months," he said, in the course of his reminiscences," and was stationed at Raipur, in the Orissa district.

"At that time the 'old stagers' in the army—men who had been in the country for a long term, and knew its ins and outs—were in the habit of chaffing new-comers unmercifully, and making them the butt of all sorts of practical jokes.

"I had been afflicted in the usual manner by the younger officers in my regiment (the —th Lancers), and I presume that I was as much fun as a box of monkeys for them. Being a quick-tempered and not over-wise youth, it was hard for me to keep my passion from getting the better of me; and, once having lost control of it over some trivial 'sell' of which one of the mess made me the victim, I was at once selected as a promising subject for all the stock jokes of the regimental mess-room.

"The man who had first caused me to lose my temper was a certain Lieutenant Mainwarring—Henry Mainwarring—a handsome, dashing fellow, with an inexhaustible fund of good humour, and a man who was seldom, if ever, careless of the feelings of others. His joke was a simple enough little thing, and would not have injured me in the least, had I had the good sense to keep my temper.

"Unfortunately, I did not control myself, and the result was, as I state, I became the butt of half the jokes of the mess. Mainwarring never entered into any of them again, but nevertheless, in my unreasoning anger, I laid the whole trouble at his door. Each time I was made the victim of my comrades' chaff, I grew more bitter against the lieutenant. He had first discovered my vulnerable point, and held me up to the ridicule of the mess, and I could not forget it.

"Goodness knows, the life we led at that little station was so dull that anything was welcome to the young fellows, so that it gave a little spice to their existence. I should have been satisfied to lend myself to their entertainment without feeling ugly over it," and the doctor smiled grimly.

"My confrère, Doctor Fearing, a much older man, told me as much, and often advised me to pay no attention to the harmless chaff of the others. But I couldn't see it. To me their jokes were the deadliest insults, and I believe that I hated Mainwarring as intensely as I should had he done me a premeditated injury.

He was a little, lean, dark-complexioned man.

"The lieutenant really endeavoured to repair the wrong he had unwittingly done me by urging the others to let me alone, and refusing to countenance or take part in any joke in which I was to be victimised; but they were a wild set, and I was too promising a subject for them to wholly give up their sport. Besides, I openly showed my antagonism for Mainwarring, and, as he was the most popular man in the regiment—'Handsome Harry' they called him—my course naturally did not gain me any friends.

"I was passionately fond of botanising, and, being simply assistant-surgeon, had much more time to myself than did the majority of the subalterns. The country about Raipur is, or was, nothing but jungle, and I had every opportunity to follow my chosen study in a field exactly to my taste. In a few months, I obtained a very handsome cabinet of specimens indeed.

"My brother officers told me long and blood-curdling yarns about man-eating tigers and cheetahs which infested the jungle, but I had never seen any sign of the creatures during my rambles, and began to believe their stories to be some of those myths usually trotted out for the benefit of new-comers.

"After a time, I began to be weary of always lugging a gun about with me, and quite frequently went on short trips about the station with no other weapon than my revolver or a short hunting knife. This coming to the notice of the colonel, he took me to task for it at dinner one day.

"'You really ought not to do it, you know,' he said mildly

"He was a mild man always, and seldom made his commands other than requests. 'There are beasts in the jungle that would think nothing of snapping up a full-grown man.'

"'Oh, Goslett wouldn't be averse to a bout with a tiger or leopard, armed or not,' sneered somebody.

"Of course that was enough to 'rile' me, and I spoke up sharply:

"'To a coward danger lurks behind every spear of grass. Don't accuse me of running from my shadow.'

"The colonel turned away with a shrug of his shoulders at this ungracious reply, and doubtless put me down in his own mind for the foolish young cub that I was; but Mainwarring looked up from his position directly opposite me at the table, and said gravely:

"'What the colonel says is only too true, Goslett. My man told me only yesterday that a regular man-eater has been ranging the jungle lately between here and Odorro. It is unsafe for any fellow to venture into the forest without a good weapon to fall back upon.'

"My feelings were still rankling from the sneering remark addressed me but a moment before, and, of course, I selected the well-meaning Mainwarring on whom to vent my spite.

"'I do not doubt, lieutenant, that you have my welfare entirely at heart,' I said, with a sneer. 'But I haven't issued a circular requesting advice on the subject.'

"Some of the men looked up quickly, expecting the lieutenant to take offence at my insolence; but he only laughed good-naturedly.

"'Well,' he said, in what I considered an air of insufferable superiority, 'you'd better take a fool's advice and not go wandering through these jungles as though you were at home on your father's farm.'

"'Thank you,' I responded, boiling over with rage; 'I've been in several places since I left my father's estate, even though I may not have had your experience in India, lieutenant. And if such experiences make a man a coward, I'm glad I've had none!'

"Mainwarring flushed up like fire, and our neighbours ceased eating, and waited breathlessly for what should follow. It was apparent to all, I presume, that I had deliberately insulted the lieutenant—or, at least, tried to do so. But I must admit that Mainwarring was remarkably forbearing, considering the way I had treated him.

"'Experience makes a man less foolhardy sometimes; but it's a hard schoolmaster, as my copy-book used to say,' he returned, after a minute spent in controlling his indignation. 'You'll find a fool's advice—aye, a coward's advice—sometimes worth following.'

"He looked at me meaningly, and I knew that his words were meant as a warning to me that I was going too far; but my heart was bursting with rage against him and against my other comrades, and I stared him squarely in the eye and replied:

"'I consider the advice given me as that of a fool and a coward!' I declared hotly. 'You have rightly named it.'

"There was a babel of voices as I delivered this direct insult

Digitized by Google

at 'Handsome Harry' Mainwarring, and several of the fellows about me sprang to their feet. I certainly had done nothing to increase my popularity with the regiment. But the lieutenant waved them all aside, and half rising from his chair and bending his flashing eyes on me, with a sudden fierceness which almost made me quail, demanded:

"'Do I understand Mr. Goslett, that you are ready to answer for that remark?'

"'You may understand just that, sir!' I declared, for I had a certain amount of dogged persistence which would never allow me to back out of anything.

"Then, by Jove, sir, you shall answer for it!' he cried, his face blazing with wrath; and he immediately rose and left the room.

"The younger officers looked at me askance; but I was too mad to pay any attention to them or to care how far the matter went. More than one duel had been fought already that year among officers of the Indian army, for there were not the strict laws against it then that there are at present.

"Soon after, I left the mess-room myself, and taking my stick, went out for one of my lonely walks, ostensibly for specimens, but really to quiet my nerves and think the matter over.

"I was in a scrape, I knew, for Harry Mainwarring was an expert with either sword or pistol, while I could use either with but slight skill. If he challenged me, I should of course have the right to choose my weapons: but which should I choose, and what advantage would I obtain by choosing either?

"Naturally I was in no condition to hunt for specimens, although I had slung my bag over my shoulder on leaving the station; but I tramped on and on for several miles while I thought over the situation in which my abominable temper had placed me.

"I could hope for no mercy from Mainwarring (I did not want any, in fact, for with all my faults I was not a craven); for the lieutenant had been terrifically enraged, and when a man who is slow to wrath once gets angry, stand from under, say I!

"Well, in my state of mind I had taken no thought of the way I had come from the station, and finally I awoke to the fact that I had reached a part of the jungle which was totally unfamiliar to me. I pressed on a bit further in the hope of finding some landmark to guide me, but the deeper I went the more certain became the fact of my non-acquaintance with the place.

"Finally I reached a little glade in the centre of the thick jungle and halted a few moments to try to gain my bearings from the sun; but I was not certain of any point of the compass and was almost at my wit's end.

"While I stood there at the side of the glade wholly undecided as to what course to pursue, I heard a sudden crashing in the jungle in front of me, and in a moment a man burst through the reeds and entered the glade. He stopped at once when he saw me, and to my surprise I recognised Mainwarring himself.

"I could not ask him the way to the station. I remember that I drew myself up haughtily and vouchsafed him no salutation as he freed himself from the reeds and creepers and stepped fully out into the opening. He appeared surprised to see me, too; but in an instant a terrible change came over his features.

"He was armed with a heavy express rifle—a weapon which carried a ball like that of a young cannon. Hardly had he entered the glade and obtained a fair glimpse of me when, with a slight exclamation he unslung the piece, and the next instant it was at his shoulder and I was looking straight into the black barrel of the weapon!

"His eyes seemed to blaze with fierce passion, and for an instant I cowered back, realising that he had me completely at his mercy. I did not stop to think that such a course as I believed him to be following was entirely foreign to the man's nature.

"'Don't move!' he shouted, in a hoarse, strained voice.

"But I did move. I had no idea of standing there and being shot down like a dog, and although I had no other weapon than my heavy stick, my fingers tightened on that, and the next moment the staff flew hurtling through the air at my antagonist.

"At the very instant I made my cast his heavy weapon blazed forth, the echoes of the shot rebounding with a roar like thunder from the deep forest about me.

"I heard the shriek of the bullet as it passed me, and the next instant a terrific roar of fury sounded from my rear, and some heavy body bounded against me and carried me headlong to the earth.

"Like a flash I rolled out from beneath the struggling snarling beast and sprang to my feet. It was a huge tiger-cat, and for the next few moments the earth for some yards round was torn up by the dying struggles of the beast. Mainwarring's bullet had saved my life. He had seen the brute crouching in the reeds behind me, and had nobly rescued me from a fearful death.

"Do I understand, Mr. Goslett, that you are ready to answer for that remark?

"Then I looked for the lieutenant himself. What was my horror to find him lying flat upon his back on the spongy sward, his rifle lying at his side. My aim had been only too true, for his upturned face was covered with blood from a deep cut in his forehead where my stick had struck him!

"I ran to his side at once, but he was unconscious. The wound was a serious one, as my professional instinct told me; but, fortunately, I had some things at hand to assist me in the dressing of his hurt, and as soon as it was as comfortable as the rude appliances could make it, I raised him in my arms and set out for the station.

"Fortunately I had noticed from which direction he had approached the glade, and returning that way I quickly came upon landmarks which I recognised, and after a terribly hard tramp arrived at the quarters.

"Mainwarring was still unconscious, but after Dr. Fearing and I had worked over him some time he came to himself. But he was in sick-bay for weeks, and do what we could we were not able to save the sight of both his eyes. The upper lid of his left optic had been torn by the pointed end of the stick, and in that climate little things lead to great.

"I did not spare myself in recounting the adventure, and you may guess that I was almost completely ostracised by my brother officers, for 'Handsome Harry' had been the pride of the regiment. I deserved it, however; but after a while I was changed to another station, and profiting by my serious lesson, managed to get on much better with my brother officers there.

"Harry sold out and went into indigo planting; but, although his friends of the——th Lancers never forgave me for the injury I had done him, he and I were, ever after, the best of friends, and I count him as such now."

Digitized by Google

AN ANCESTOR TO BE PROUD OF.

WHEN the bigotry of the last James compelled his subjects to take up arms against him, Sir John Cochrane was one of the most formidable enemies to his dangerous usurpations, and one of the most prominent actors in Argyle's rebellion. For ages a destructive doom seemed to have hung over the house of Campbell, uniting in a common ruin all who joined their fortunes to the cause of its chief. Sir John Cochrane was no exception.

He was surrounded by the king's troops, and, after a long and desperate resistance, he was taken prisoner and was tried and condemned to die upon the scaffold. He had but a few days to live, and his jailer awaited only the arrival of the death-warrant to lead him to execution. His friends had visited him and exchanged the last farewells—all but one; his daughter Grizel, the pride of his house, his dearest treasure, she alone had not come to receive his last blessing.

Night had fallen on the prison, and the father sat with his head pressed against the cold, damp walls of his cell, longing for a last look of his favourite child, when the door opened and the keeper entered, followed by a young and beautiful girl. Her person was tall and commanding, her eyes dark, bright, and tearless, with a sorrow too deep to be wept away. The unhappy prisoner raised his head.

"My child! My own Grizel!" he exclaimed, as he pressed her to his heart.

"My father! My dear father!" sobbed the miserable maiden.

"Your interview must be short—very short," said the jailer, as he closed the door and left them together.

"Heaven help and comfort thee, my precious child!" said Sir John. "I had feared that I should die without bestowing my blessing on the head of my daughter, and that stung me more than death. But thou art come, my love—thou art come; and the last blessing of thy wretched father——"

"Nay, father, forbear!" she exclaimed; "not thy last blessing—not thy last! My father shall not die!"

"Be calm, be calm, my child!" he said. "Would to heaven that I could comfort thee, my own. There is no hope; within three days thou and all my little ones will be——" fatherless he would have said, but the word died upon his lips.

"Three days," she repeated, raising her head from his breast, but eagerly pressing his hand; "three days! then there is hope—my father shall live. Is not my grandfather the friend of Father Petre, the confessor and master of the king? From him he shall beg the life of his son, and my father shall not die."

"Nay, nay, my Grizel," he returned, "be not deceived; there is no hope. Already my doom is sealed. Already the king has signed the order for my execution, and the messenger of death is now on his way."

"Yet my father shall not—shall not die!" she repeated emphatically, and clasping her hands. "Heaven speed a daughter's purpose," she exclaimed; and, turning to her father, said calmly, "we part now, but we shall meet again."

"What do you mean, my child?" he inquired eagerly, gazing anxiously on her face.

"Ask not now," she replied, "my father, ask not now. Pray for me, and bless me, but not with thy last blessing."

He again pressed her to his heart, and wept upon her neck. In a few moments the jailer entered, and the door was closed between the father and daughter.

On the evening of the second day after this interview, a wayfaring man crossed the drawbridge at Berwick from the north, and, proceeding along Marygate, sat down to rest upon a bench, by the door of an inn on the south side of the street, nearly fronting the spot where what was called the "main guard" then stood. He did not enter the inn, for it was above his apparent condition, being that which Oliver Cromwell had made his headquarters a few years before, and where, at a somewhat earlier period, James VI. of Scotland had taken up his residence, when on his way to England.

The traveller wore a coarse jerkin, fastened round his waist by a leathern girdle, and over it a short cloak of plain material. He was evidently a young man, but his beaver was drawn down so as to almost conceal his features. In one hand he carried a small bundle, and in the other a staff. Having called for a glass of wine, he took a crust of bread from his bundle, and, after resting a short time, rose to depart. Night was coming on, and a storm threatening. The heavens grew dark; the clouds rushed from the sea; sudden gusts of wind moaned through the streets, accompanied by heavy drops of rain, and the face of the Tweed was troubled.

"Heaven help thee if thou intendest to travel far in such a night as this!" said the sentinel at the English gate, as the traveller passed him to cross the bridge.

In a few moments he was upon the wide and desolate moor of Tweedmouth, which for miles presented a desert of furze, fern, and stunted heath, with here and there a copse of thick brushwood. He slowly toiled over the steep hill, braving the storm, which now raged with the wildest fury. The rain fell in torrents, and the wind howled like a legion of famished wolves, hurling its doleful echoes over the heath. Still the stranger pushed onward, until two or three miles from Berwick, when, as if unable to brave the storm, he sought shelter amidst some bushes by the wayside.

Nearly an hour had passed since he sought this imperfect refuge, and the darkness of the night and the storm had increased together, when the sound of a horse's feet was heard hurriedly plashing along the road. The rider bent his head to the blast. Suddenly his horse was grasped by the bridle; the rider raised his head, and the stranger stood before him holding a pistol to his breast. "Dismount!" cried the stranger, sternly.

The horseman, benumbed and fear-stricken, made an effort to reach his arms; but instantly the hand of the robber, quitting the bridle, grasped the breast of the rider, and dragged him to the ground. He fell heavily on his face, and for several minutes was senseless. The stranger seized the leather bag which contained the mail for the north, and, flinging it over his shoulder, rushed across the heath.

Early on the following morning the inhabitants of Berwick were seen hurrying in groups to the spot where the robbery had been committed, but no trace of the robber could be obtained.

Three days passed, and Sir John Cochrane still lived. The mail which contained his death-warrant had been robbed, and before another order for his execution could be given, the intercession of his father, the Earl of Dundonald, with the king's confessor might be successful. Grizel now became the almost constant companion of her father. Nearly a fortnight had passed since the robbery of the mail, and protracted hope in the bosom of the prisoner became more bitter than his first despair. But even that hope, bitter as it was, perished. The intercession of his father had been unsuccessful; and a second time King James signed the death-warrant. Within little more than another day that warrant would reach the prison.

"The will of heaven be done!" groaned the captive.

"Amen!" responded Grizel, with wild vehemence. "Yet my father shall not die!"

Again the rider with the mail had reached the moor of Tweedmouth, and a second time he bore the doom of Sir John Cochrane. He spurred his horse to its utmost speed—he looked cautiously before, behind, and around, and in his right hand he carried a pistol ready to defend himself. The moon shed a ghostly light across the heath. He was turning the angle of a straggling copse when his horse reared at the report of a pistol, the fire of which seemed to flash into its very eyes. At the same moment his own pistol went off, and, his horse again rearing, he was thrown from the saddle. In a moment the robber, with his foot upon the breast of the messenger, was bending over him and brandishing a short dagger, saying—

Digitized by Google

"Give me thine arms, or die!"

The heart of the king's servant failed him, and, without venturing a reply, he did as he was commanded.

"Now, go thy way," said the robber sternly, "but leave me thy horse and the mail, lest a worse thing come upon thee."

The man arose, and returned to Berwick, and the robber, mounting the horse, rode rapidly across the heath.

Preparations were making for the execution of Sir John Cochrane, and the officers of the law waited only for the arrival of the mail with the second death warrant, when the news arrived that the mail had again been robbed. For fourteen days the prisoner's life would be prolonged. Putting his arms about his daughter, he said, "It is good. The hand of heaven is in this!"

"Said I not," replied his child, and for the first time she wept, "said I not that my father should not die?"

The fourteen days were not past when the prison door flew open, and the Earl of Dundonald rushed to the arms of his son. His intercession with the confessor had been successful, and, after twice signing the warrant for the execution of Sir John, the king had sealed his pardon.

He hurried with his father from the prison to his own house; his family were clinging around him, shedding tears of joy. Grizel alone was absent. They were marvelling with gratitude at the mysterious providence that had twice intercepted the mail, and saved his life, when a stranger craved an audience. Sir John desired him to be admitted, and the quondam robber entered; he was dressed in a coarse cloak, and coarser jerkin, but his bearing seemed beyond his condition. On entering, he slightly touched his beaver, but did not remove it.

"When you have read these," said he, taking two papers from his bosom, "cast them into the fire."

Sir John glanced them over—started, and became pale. They were his death warrants.

"My deliverer," he exclaimed; "how—how shall I thank thee—how repay the saviour of my life? My father—my children—thank him for me!"

The old earl grasped the hand of the stranger—the children embraced his knees. He pressed his hand to his face and burst into tears.

"By what name," eagerly inquired Sir John, "shall I thank my deliverer?"

The stranger wept aloud, and raising his beaver, the raven tresses of Grizel Cochrane fell over the coarse cloak.

"Gracious heavens!" exclaimed the astonished and enraptured father, "my own child—my own Grizel!"

It is unnecessary to add more. The reader can supply the rest, and we have only to add that Grizel Cochrane, whose heroism we have briefly sketched, was the grandmother of the late Sir John Stewart, of Allendank, in Berwickshire, and the great-grandmother of Mr. Coutts, the celebrated banker. Consequently she was the great-great-great-grandmother of Baroness Burdett-Coutts.

THE HOLE OF SALVATION.

A TRUE STORY OF A WONDERFUL ESCAPE.

FRANCESCO RISO, a fontaniere of Palermo, with eighty-eight other citizens, began the Rebellion of 1860. On the evening of April 3rd they concealed themselves in the Gancia, intending to sally forth at dawn and take possession of the public buildings—the Zecca and Finanze—in that quarter. At the same time, acting in concert, their friends without were to rise and carry other important points in the town. The bell of the Gancia was to be the signal, the tricolour their badge, and their watchword "Viva l'Italia et la Liberta!"

It was a well-laid plan, and should have succeeded. But while the patriots were in hiding, a traitor had gone to Maniscalco, the Director of Police, and revealed the entire plot—time, signal, names, everything. Speedily troops filled the Piazza Marina, cannon were placed fronting the Gancia, guards were stationed at the rear; and so far as the eighty-nine popolani were concerned, the revolution was over before it had begun. In the face of their certain doom, however, they fought like heroes; and, entrenched in the Gancia, maintained themselves almost two hours. Then, many being killed, and Riso himself mortally wounded, the survivors sought such safety as they could.

The majority, against the advice of Gaspare Bivona who was next in authority to Riso, took refuge among the rafters, between the ceiling and roof of the church, where they were soon found. Some sprang down among the soldiers and tried to cut their way through; many were killed, hardly one escaped. Those who surrendered were taken to Porta San Giorgio, a few days later, and shot, among them, old Giovanni, father of Francesco Riso. The latter, mortally wounded, was removed to the hospital, and died there from his injuries.

Meanwhile, Filippo Patti had joined his fate to Bivona's, and their escape is in great part due to the latter's astuteness and steady nerve. First of all, they fled over the roofs to the Campanile, but seeing that the convent was surrounded and safe descent would be impossible, they clambered down to the roof. There, looking through a skylight, they perceived two of on their knees, below, praying. Their rap upon the glass instantly directed toward them two frightened faces, but for some time they could get no answer to their signs, the priests evidently fearing that they were spies.

At last, however, they were told, by signs, of course, that if the window were open, it was possible to climb down, by means of the cornice and woodwork. With a blow of his fist, Bivona broke the glass. The blood spurted out from a severed vein in his wrist, but twisting a handkerchief about it like a vice, he tied the knot with one hand and his teeth, and then managed to swing himself down, followed by Patti.

By the time they were down, the monks had vanished, but were found in one of the side chapels, praying to all the saints for safety. The fugitives made it clear they were not spies, although to be friends—in this crisis—was almost fatal. But they were brothers in misery, and there was no longer any fear of betrayal. From the body of the church they fled to a small room at the opposite end from the high altar, full of chairs, which were stored here when not in use. A lane was hastily opened in the mass, and they crawled in, twisting themselves here, there, anywhere, so as to be out of sight, and as far from the front as possible. Then the monks replaced the wooden files above and in front of them, shut the door and went back to their praying.

It was well they had made haste, for in less than half an hour the soldiers entered. Little of the church escaped search; even among these chairs they plunged and pried with their bayonets, but luckily hit no one, and after several trials went away.

In this cramped and painful confinement, the fugitives remained until the third day. At the close of the second, the Gancia, now supposed to be empty, was locked up, although still strictly guarded without. Half dead from hunger, thirst and cramp, but somewhat reassured by the silence, this small remnant of Francesco Riso's troop emerged from its retirement, and entered the church. The first thing the men saw was the holy water font—as good luck would have it, half full; and they drained it, to the last drop. "Never was water more truly blessed," said Bivona; "Aqua benedetta, sicuro!"

Digitized by Google

Now, in their long hiding among the chairs, he had been considering what better refuge there might be, and had remembered a vault below the church, next the street, which opened by a trap door into a room used as a vestry. Here the conventual dead were laid away, each on his shelf, but otherwise uncoffined; and the probabilities were that no one would seek the living in such companionship. So the semi-dead prized open the ponderous, iron-shod door, and entrusted themselves to those who were dead.

Just below the ceiling of the vault were several small, heavily-barred windows; and, as the sound of life and the fresh spring air came pouring in, the captives were roused to new exertions. They must die of hunger if they stayed; they could no more than die, if discovered, and they decided to take their chances. They were feeble; still they managed to pile the good brothers of the Gancia, one above the other, until, from this standpoint of mortality, they could reach a window.

The first who looked out promptly dodged; sentinels were pacing up and down before the building; and at the corner, where two streets crossed, was stationed a large guard. But, watching their chance as the sentinels passed, they made signs to a woman in an opposite café. They were seen, they were understood, and all were eager to help. Their first, most pressing need was food, and this was conveyed to them most adroitly by a cab-driver, brother to Patti.

As though by chance, he stopped his cab close to the window; again, as by chance, several people stopped in front of the cab, talking busily together; and thus screened, he thrust in at the grating a roll of bread and a short, pointed iron bar. When they had a hole, he hurriedly told them, they must signal; then the people would get up a quarrel to call off the guards and favour the escape.

Patti was overcome at first with weakness and despondency, and wept bitterly. As to Bivona, the greater the peril, the more wiry and tensely strung he became. He cheered up his companion, and, strengthened by the bread, they set to work, aiding the slow chisel with their hands, until, on the fifth day of their imprisonment, the outermost stone lay loose in its socket. They rested a few seconds, then signalled that they were ready.

The street had been quite peaceful up to now, but suddenly two women began to quarrel, their friends joined in, and a great hubbub arose. An officer passing by stopped a moment close to the window, and Bivona heard him say to a friend: "If there was a conspiracy, you may be sure these accursed women would be in it, they are always ready for a row." On he passed, little dreaming that conspiracy was actually there; and Bivona, despite the peril, could not restrain a chuckle.

In almost the same moment, at the crossing where the guard was stationed, several carts, loaded with straw, managed to run into each other. The wildest confusion ensued. The drivers cursed, threatened, came to blows; the bystanders rushed in, and, sympathetically, began to fight; those "accursed women" joined the fray, screaming loudest of all; in fact, as Bivona said, they had "a devil of a time."

Guard and sentinel gathered in haste to separate the combatants and clear the streets; such a throng was not safe, it might lead to insurrection; and while the friends of order were thus laudably engaged at one end of the Gancia, at the other appeared, feet foremost, Filippo Patti! Halfway out of the hole he stuck, and urged Bivona to help him back. "No," said the latter, "return is death to both of us; out you must go, even if in pieces."

With all his might he pushed him, while those without pulled; and in this manner, although badly scarified, Patti reached at last the street.

Then came Bivona, who, being of slender build, and going head first, emerged safely. The women covered them, as they appeared, with their clothes, hustled them behind and through the crowd, across the street, and from one friendly house to another, until they could reach the open country.

So adroitly was the affair managed that the soldiers had not even a suspicion. No sooner, however, were the fugitives safe, than—to quote a Palermitan writer—"there ceased, as if by magic, the confusion of the carts." The drivers recovered their temper as unexpectedly as they had lost it: the bystanders grew amicable and jolly; the horses trotted on; the sentries resumed their march. All was as before, with one exception. In the stone wall of the Gancia—like an eye looking out from its vaults—was a small, irregular opening.

How had it come there? Strange to say, no one knew anything about it! The people gathered around as astonished as the sentinels. "Most holy Virgin! what could they know about it? They had been watching the straw carts. A piece must have fallen out of the wall while they were not looking! Diavolo! Dio Santissimo!" (thus invoking the two strongest authorities) "Nobody had seen anything!"

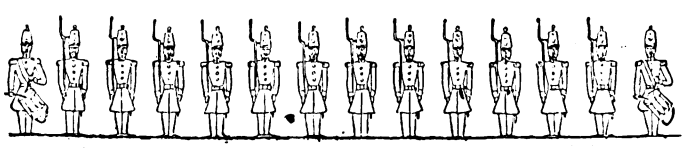
The most rigid cross-questioning and search failed to elicit more than this. There had been an escape; so much was certain; and since Bivona and Patti had not been found before, it was argued, rightly, that they were the fugitives. Bivona's wife and children were treated with much harshness; but as the poor woman said, "We only knew that he was gone; we could only pray that he was safe."

So matters went, until, on the 11th of May, not quite a month from that sad struggle in the Gancia, there landed at Marsala, Garibaldi and his thousand. On the 16th they were at Calatifimi, the 17th at Aleamo, the 18th Partinico. By the 25th they had reached Misilmeri, the 26th Gibilrossa, and the 27th saw their triumphant entry into Palermo. Before November of this year the campaign was ended—Italy was free!

And Bivona! He had joined Garibaldi, of course; and fought with him bravely, as you may suppose. But, after a while, some chronic ailment disabled him for active service, and he was voted a small pension. Small as it was, it soon ceased to be paid; and for the last ten years he struggled hard with illness, poverty, and the care of a large family. This, says Signor Salvo, is the way one's country pays its debts!

Yet something may be urged for poor, debt-oppressed Italy. She "pays thus," often, because she is unable to do otherwise.

And, in spite of his barren pension, Bivona can still say, with all the fire of patriotism that first led him to rebel, "Viva Italia! Viva la Liberta."



Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

CHAPTER XIX.

GRANDFATHER came with a carriage to take Katherine and Justina to the station, and while Aunt Marg got ready to walk with me, I went down to say good-bye to Liz. The good soul was sitting in the kitchen her apron over her face, sobbing.

"Good-bye," I said. "If I have been horrid to you lately, I am sorry; I have tried to be better than I used to be."

"Yo' allus blessed child; I told Miss Margaret so this mornin', an' ef ebber I scold yo', Miss Vi'let, I eat ebbry word, I do."

"The scoldings were never very bad, Liz; and now you must be doubly kind to Aunt Marg and grandfather; they think so much of you. You were going to lose me anyway, when I was——." But I choked then. I could not say "John's wife."

"Sometimes I think the old house would have been happier, more peaceful, if wilful Letty Lombard had never crossed its threshold."

"Doan yo' tear a pusson's heart all ter pieces, Vi'let, an' yo' know well nuff a house 'thout young folks es jes' a graveyard. De Lawd bless yo' and keep yo'! I'll see yo' married 'fore I die, I suah ob dat, sartin suah."

"Aunt Marg," I said, as we walked across the beach to the town, "I would give him to you if I could."

"He would not be given," she smiled, something like her old self once more; "what a brave child you are, and I begin to think you have chosen the best way. It was the real Letty after all, and we almost missed knowing her. Poor little pilgrim! What a dreary journey lies before you. Don't hope for much from her. I can tell you now, and you will soon see it, her nature will never change; yours will be a thankless task. Thank God, there is between you and your sister Katherine not one trait in common, and there never will be."

We passed the market place.

We parted near the town, and how much more I would have said, how much more loving I would have been, had I dreamed it was my last farewell to Aunt Margaret! How well she read my sister Katherine. There never was any liking between us, nor did she give me any gratitude, but I made her last hours easier, and that repaid me.

Grandfather tried not to cry when he said "Good-bye." He was very cold and distant to Katherine, but he came back the second time to bless me and give me comforting words.

"Let the old sailor blood tell in ye, Letty. The Lombards were a brave lot, no storm or sea ever drove them from their duty." Then he wrung my hand and hobbled off, looking, oh, so old and bowed; for this last trial had been hardest of all his many sorrows to bear.

At last, in San Antonio, in the city of the Alamo! Through quaint narrow streets, paved with cobble-stones, by walled houses with small, shuttered windows and wide porches; by fine old mansions bowered in trees; over bridges, so many of them, crossing the winding little river that kisses many shores and ripples under the home walls and by the gardens, so friendly to the folks there, one might fancy it a household spirit of goodwill.

Then leaving Katherine at the hotel with Justina, I went out to see the man grandfather had told me to find. A telegram had been sent, and he had engaged a house for us, the very one where I lived with Justina five years of my life. He was friendly and kind, but seemed to have a horror of meeting my sister; so I told him there was nothing more he could do, and that he had made everything easy for me. I remembered him instantly as one of the judges at the Hotel Gilbert.

I got a carriage, and then Katherine, Justina, and I drove out to our dwelling-house. We passed the market-place, with its busy throng of Mexicans, with their wares, tables spread out with Mexican dainties, stalls with luscious fruit and vegetables, carts loaded with mesquite and corn-husks, drawn by lean oxen with those great sharp horns, or shambling, queer-jointed horses in rope harnesses; past the cathedral of San Fernando, where Justina crossed herself, muttering prayers; out through tree-bordered, quiet streets to a wide country road, by green fields and ploughed land, past ranches and pastures, past adobe huts, where black-eyed, olive-skinned children played in the sun, where their swarthy mothers gossiped by shady doors, smoking cigarettes, and men lolling by the gates, chatting with neighbourly idlers. A sunshiny, pleasant race, enjoying time as colder-blooded, busy people never do.

"It's odd to say good-bye," muttered Katherine; "that Mexican there does not know I have looked upon him for the last time. He isn't aware I've looked at all. It isn't often one rides in one's own funeral procession, keenly interested in the passing panorama. Adieu, San Antonio, and a certain quaint river-kissed house, where I lived in hiding, in the enemy's very camp, six happy weeks. You knew me then, you Mexican crone. Was I not beautiful?"

"Dios, so beautiful," cried Justina, "and you gave me gold too."

"You never betrayed me, either, and Dean feared you might."

"She was paid," I said crossly; "Justina likes gold."

Justina laughed wickedly. "Chica a wise old child."

I began to respect Justina a little, for she never told Katherine I knew anything of the past, and never a word of John.

"Tell me how I looked that day?" Katherine asked, with feverish eagerness; the saddest thing in her sickness was that clinging to her past.

"I was in the forest, the gnarled old trees planted by the good fathers near the Mission Concepcion," said Justina, crossing herself reverently; "I carried Chica—she was so strong too in her legs, she could walk in a year—and a lady rode up on a big horse; she wore a green habit, a sombrero with a plume and shining stones, such beautiful ones; and her eyes were so big and bright. 'Is that Mary Lombard's child?' she asks; she gave me three shining gold pieces, and I told her 'yes,' and then I knew her to be Chica's sister. My cousin had told me of her, so beautiful! so wicked! I put holy water on her gold, but it brought me no harm, though I feared it. She asked me about Señor Scott, and I told her they were all gone into Mexico. Then Chica cried for the horse, and I lifted her up, and she clung so brave to the creature's mane—she was never afraid, my baby. Then the Colonel"——Justina hesitated.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Miss Prim knows I ran away with Dean; I told her," Katherine said carelessly.

"The Colonel had no eyes for Chica; he was afraid; so they went away, paying me well." I told you Señor Scott wept big tears because he thought you dead, and you laughed, you were so gay."

"Yes, and now I am so cold, so barely alive, and yet it's unchanged here. It mocks one to come back. Give me my brandy, Prim, I'll shut my eyes." She lay back in the carriage, so exhausted we had to carry her into the house. She was dreadfully light for such a tall woman.

Oh, that dark house, its low-studded rooms, its narrow-shuttered windows, its white walls shining in the sun, its damp, earthy odour, and the shadow of the Mission that shut out our daylight like some tall mountain peak. How, as time went on, that crumbling ruin drew me into its past, of days that were and are no more; of death and decay; of falling walls and ruined arches; of a mossy turret and a ghostly bell that clanged when the wind blew, as if rung by some priestly hand, calling those dusky converts from labour to prayer.

A year of my life I lived in its shadow, such a time as the prisoner of Chillon endured, each hour marked by the light on his prison walls, each night period by the clanking of his chain following his lagged steps.

I would not have complained, in all that weary time, had Katherine been kind, but she met all my advances with an icy wall of indifference. To-day was nothing to her; she lived in her past, talked of her beauty, her power; pictured strange scenes in Europe; people that made her world, and all the gaudy, unreal pleasures of a life such as hers had been, until sometimes, with smarting eyes and burning cheeks, I stole away unseen, trying to keep from shuddering, or showing that disgust I felt that would have made her hate me more.

What dreadful nights I spent trying to ease her pain, lifting her weary head to my breast, holding her in my arms, fanning her, doing all that human power could do to help her, and she, fighting her disease with fierce defiance of death, rising at midnight to sit by the open window, to look at the stars and feel the cool air across her dry lips, or to be carried to the shadow of the Mission, there to lie the long day through and think; ah, what tainted and wicked thoughts!

Not a word of regret or remorse, not a sigh for the future, only a fight against the present. She liked Justina, and I was so glad of that. Even in Katherine's worst days she would chatter Spanish with my nurse, and try to smoke a cigarette, and delight in stories that Justina told of her Mexican cousins and their many love affairs.

She would play monte with her and quarrel over her gains; but me she only called Prim, bore with me in a tolerant way, and let me wait on her. She never thanked me or called me sister, and for her sake I had given up my best beloved. Some days the thought of him and Mexico would come to me, and in agony I would go away from the house to the Mission to fight my battle there.

I went under the arched doorway, its façade gorgeous with niched saints, some headless, some niches bare, and some perfect apostle, saved from vandal hand; and, nearest heaven, chubby baby faces smiling from the grim old place. Then into the ruined chapel, its beautiful dome fallen in, domed by high heaven now; its solid marvellous masonry, the product of such patient unskilled labour made perfect by slow degrees; then on to a long corridor, with ruined arched windows lining on either side.

Here there was no floor, and many of the arches were shattered, but how graceful and pleasing they were; and at nights from my window I imagined the slow moving procession of black-robed figures, clouds of incense floating on the fragrant air, soft echoes of Latin hymns borne over the listening fields upward to the sky. I saw dark, solemn faces, prayerfully clasped hands, and bowed, reverent heads. I fancied a shrinking throng of converts listening to the strange words, half comprehending, but wholly awed and pious-minded.

With them I, too, have cried, "Teach me Thy wondrous comfort, O God; give me the stern repression of self of those righteous men—their faith, their steadfast purpose."

Beneath that arched corridor I wandered in mouldy underground cells where those fathers must have slept or kept their lonely vigils. Did they never fear, when they laid down to rest, that some bronze-faced savage would forget their teachings, and, from some word of offence, some unwillingly performed command, would creep, knife in hand, to murder them in their helplessness?

Like the panther and all coward things springing upon slumbering prey, and then fleeing with blood-dripping blade to rouse, with the half-forgotten war-cry, all that dusky throng, to set the red torch and by the blazing light send all those good men to their last account, and leave the smouldering ruins to tell the tale?

And yet, as time went on, that quiet desolate place taught me patience. At first I saw only death and decay, its history was not written, the memory of its good men had vanished like a cloud of dust from the sun-dried road. Its teaching had fallen into barren ground, gone from those savage tribes, not even a tradition left. It gave me no hope for better things. It mocked my sacrifice.

But then, one day, I dreamed, a good deed is never forgotten, it lives in men's lives, it is written strength for the future. One Christ life has lived through all the centuries; men have died for Him, and these Mission fathers gave their learning, their years to Him; the power of faith and love that brought them here outlives those mouldering walls, outlives all time.

To write of a year is only to pen a few brief lines, but to live a year like that is such a dreary period, for like Justina's beads, its days must be counted one at a time. I never left Katherine when she wanted me. I sang to her, played the games she taught me, read to her, and when she was too weak to talk of her past, told her the brightest pictures in mine.

She would listen, her great eyes on the Mission, half-heeding, but if I ceased she would tell me pettishly to go on. I grew to have a horror of the house, almost of her, but Justina comforted me. She was always cheerful and gay, smoking interminable cigarettes, lying in the sun.

I . . . . climb the belfry stairs.

I like to think, as time went on, I never reckoned the days, nor hoped for any release. I only prayed that Katherine would change and be better, but she never did. I grew old and careworn. Justina said I was a girl no longer. I gave my youth to my sister Katherine.

Mrs. Scott sent me things for Katherine every week, dainties she would eat, fruit and flowers from the garden.

"What a good woman she is," Katherine said one day, "and so rare in this life, a good woman who can forgive." She made me dress her in the pretty gowns sent, and arrange her hair a dozen different ways, when she was so weak she could hardly lift her head. Once she said:

Digitized by Google

"What a spiritless thing you are, Prim! Margaret made you like herself."

"Chica was so gay once," put in loyal Justina.

"Gay? That Puritan!" sneered Katherine; "I wish you could have seen me before I lost my grip on life."

One morning Justina persuaded a priest to come and see Katherine. She used to go to the Mission Concepcion, where services were held once in a while. Katherine was pleased to see a stranger, but I fancy he found his errand fruitless. They chatted in Spanish quite a while. He was a pleasant-faced old man, with very shrewd eyes. Outside the house he talked with me, saying that she was very near the end. "Justina has told me all about you," he said in such a friendly way that I broke down and told him about my sorrow that Katherine would not change; and then I described the Mission, and what it was to me.

"I go in that little door and climb the belfry stairs, and up there—on the crumbling roof, among the tiny flowers that grow in the crevices, and the harmless creeping things that bask in the sunshine—I talk with some old father. I tell him all my troubles, and, though he says nothing, I go away comforted. I wonder if some good soul does not wander back there to that loved place; it cost them such sacrifice and labour, I should think they could not forget."

He smiled at me very gently. "One cannot gather grapes from thistles," he said, in his soft Spanish; "your sister will not change. You can only soothe her physical sorrows, her mental ones are with God." After kindly, comforting words, he rode away, and left me feeling happier than for many days.

He was our only visitor save the doctor, a gruff-voiced, kind-hearted old man from the city, who always left, declaring Katherine was so insolent that he would not come again, but insisting on looking at my tongue, and giving me directions for my own health.

She had been up all day. She would not lie down, and old Justina and I had carried her to the Mission and back, and then I had taken her in my arms, on our favourite couch by the window, and Justina had quietly sent our messenger, a ragged Mexican, for the doctor. As night came on, and she wanted me to talk, she being too weak to speak, I went on and told her of my childhood.

I pictured the old house by the sea, the shining sand, the foam-crested waves, curling under the sunlight. I showed her myself, a little lonely child, running with flying hair along the shore, gathering shells, and talking to the sea-fairies I loved and thought could hear me. I told her how I flung the tiny shell creatures into the sea that they might live, and after a storm I always went out to fetch them back, that they need not suffer, when the cruel waves had stranded them.

My sister Katherine was dead.

I told her of happy, innocent days, and then as the darkness came on, and a single star shone over the ruin so near, I told her of the Mission, and all my fancies.

"I almost see those good men," she gasped. Darkness fell on us in that silent room, and I held her close. If sometimes, my tears dropped on her hair, I think she did not notice them, but if a sob choked my words she told me querulously to go on. Outside, Justina chatted with a neighbour in the soft patois of her race, and afterwards she sat on the door-step, and I heard her telling her beads.

Later, the sound of hoofs woke Katherine from a gentle sleep, and she cried sharply: "Who is that?"

"Perhaps the doctor was passing," I said evasively; "he always comes in when he is out this way."

"You sent for him," she cried; "am I so bad?" Even then the death dew was on her forehead, but she pushed me from her. "You would hurry me into my grave." She staggered to the door. "I will not die," she muttered to the doctor, as he stopped there and looked at her with tenderest pity; "I will not go into the dark, I am young, I shall live. The air revives me, I have suffered this way so often." Then that dreadful cough, and she fell forward. He lifted her on to the bed, but in a moment she sprang up with a cry.

"Letty, if they put me there I shall die. Hold me higher on your shoulder; is the window open? How close it is in this little house! Like a coffin. It smells of the grave. It is the grave."

The doctor lit the lamp.

She moved uneasily, clasped my hand, tried to speak; I think she would have said some word of love, I know she would, but only from her lips came one word, "Letty," stifled and far away. She grew so still after that, her head so heavy on my breast. Suddenly all the world was lost to her, who had done so much to add to the burdens of humanity, so few good deeds to come like flowers from her grave.

The doctor and Justina lifted her gently on the bed, my arms were empty, something had gone from my present never to come again. The long year, with all its pain and weariness, its futility of aid to good, its bitter, bitter heartbreak, was blotted from my life; my sister Katherine was dead!

She staggered to the door

(To be concluded next week.)

Digitized by Google

ROSE.

JOHN GANT drew himself behind a pillar of the verandah and pulled his slouch hat further over his eyes, as he felt the gaze of a passer by the little country inn, rest curiously upon his disfigured face. He had not yet become accustomed to being stared at.

The fresh spring morning had no charm for him, for he felt that his life was ruined. He looked over at the tiny vine-trellised cottage with a bitter sigh and a rebellious spirit. He had come from the hospital to his old home and for a whole week had been so near to Rose that twenty steps would have carried him to her side; and yet he had kept his room until this, the morning of his departure, fearing by chance to meet her.

He had sent coldly polite notes of thanks for the many gifts of flowers and books which had come to him from her kind hands; and though his heart cried out in bitter protest he resolved that he would never see her again. He would rather die than see her shrink from him in disgust.

Moodily he smoked his cigar and reviewed the past—the long years of toil and study in distant London, his admission to the bar, his first speech before a jury—a speech that had won the plaudits and bright predictions of his colleagues. How full of promise life had seemed! But everything bright had come to an end on the day of the accident.

The explosion of a gun in his own hands had robbed his right eye of its sight, torn his cheek frightfully, and left his mouth so twisted and scarred that he started in horror when he first saw its reflection in the mirror. The publicity of the court would be intolerable to him now. He must work at something away from the eyes of men.

Suddenly a sweet young voice rang out in a merry song, behind the tall hawthorn hedge, and in an instant the man was on his feet.

It was Rose. The desire to see her once more overpowered him. His cigar and resolution were alike forgotten. He ran down the steps and sprang through a gap into a little flower garden, where a slender brown-haired girl on her knees was searching among the wet leaves for violets.

"Good-morning, John," she said, quietly. "See! I have quite a nice little bunch. Papa had his yesterday morning; these are for you. Kneel down here while I pin them on."

And the young fellow knelt at her side and shut his teeth tightly together, while with dew-wet fingers she pinned the fragrant cluster on his coat.

How sweet she was! how dangerously kind and oblivious!

He must not stay; he could not trust himself longer.

They both rose, she blushing a little at her nonsense.

"I have come to bid you good-bye, Rose," he said, almost curtly. "I have sufficiently recovered, I think, to go back to work, and I leave for London within an hour. Rose, I want you to know how deeply grateful I am for your many acts of kindness. I have seemed cold and unappreciative, but I have not been indifferent. Heaven knows I have not! I shrunk so from meeting you; but I believe you will understand it all."

The girl looked at him with an aching heart. Yes, she understood. Oh, the pity of it all! That stalwart figure, so suggestive of power and strength; that noble heart, cherishing only kindness for every living creature; that bright mind, sharpened and cultivated by closest study; that indomitable will, which had overcome all sorts of obstacles and won success at last; all these attributes of a grand character to be shadowed by an external flaw!

She looked at the red scarred face, and could have cried aloud in her anguish for him.

"Rose," he continued, "I had something I meant to tell you soon, but it will never be told now. God bless you, little friend, the thought of you will always be my sweetest pleasure and safeguard."

He wrung her hand in farewell, and turned to go.

"John!"

He wheeled and came back a step.

"What was it you had meant to tell me?"

"I cannot tell you now," he said, desperately; "it would not be right; you do not understand——"

"But I want to know, John," persisted the girl, staring at the violet bed with glowing cheeks.

"Don't torture me, Rose. You must have known that ever since you were a little girl and I carried your books to the old tumble-down school over there, I have worshipped the ground you walked on. I meant to have asked you to be my wife; but now——"

"I know what you would say, John. Listen. Almost since I can remember you have been my champion, my adviser, my hero. I revere your strong pure nature. I have watched with pride your success in the busy world. I shall feel honoured, John, to become the wife of so good and true a man."

"Rose!" ejaculated the young fellow, seizing her hands and looking at her in mingled doubt and delight; "you do not mean it, dear. You do not comprehend what you are saying."

"It is you who fail to comprehend, John. God looks at the heart, not the outward appearance, and a good woman's love is akin to God. I learned long ago to love the sweet unselfish soul within you. And do you suppose that this 'blemish' of the face will change one iota of that affection?

"Oh, John, how little you understand a woman's heart! Wait!" she cried, as he attempted to draw her into his arms.

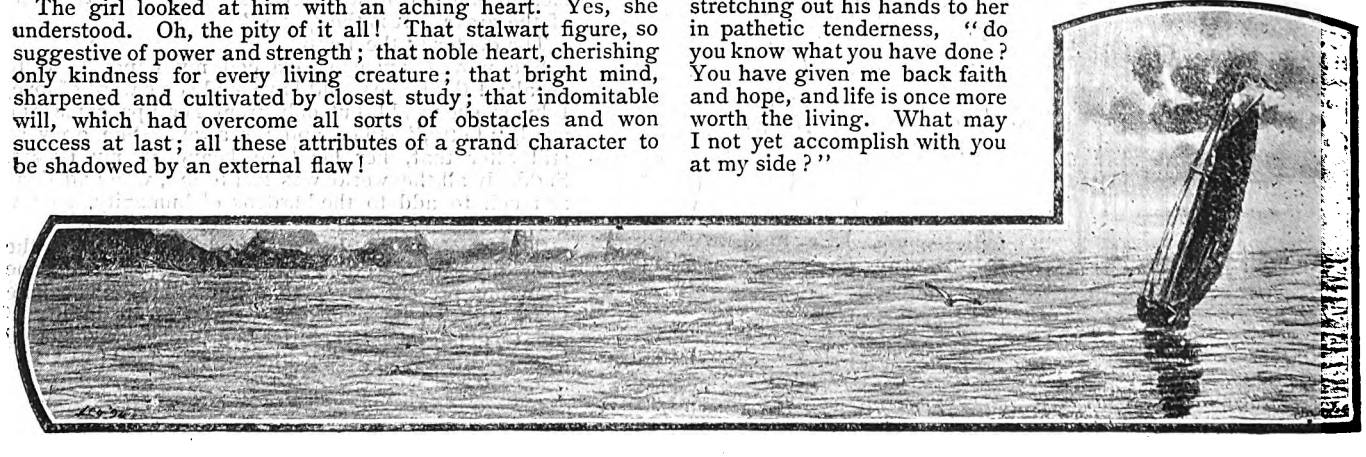
"I am going to say something that will hurt you. You were a very handsome man, and you were very vain. Do you know that personal vanity is one of the weakest of weak things in a man? I deplored it in you, for it was the one flaw in your character.

"Forgive me, John. Your beauty of face is gone for ever, but your beauty of character is untouched, and may be enhanced if you will but bear your affliction in a manly, patient spirit. Where is your faith, John? You taught me long ago to trust in God's wisdom and goodness. Do you not see that he is dealing with you in love, and that all these things will work together for your good?"

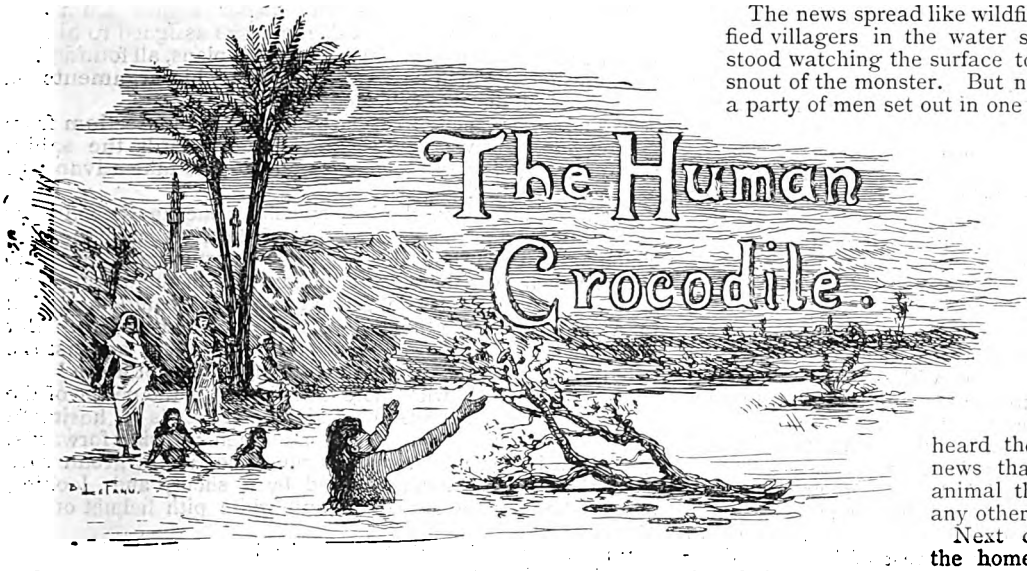
"Rose, my love, my little comfort!" cried the man in broken tones.

"Yes, I see, I see! God is good. He has given me youth and health and your best love. I will never doubt Him again. Oh, Rose, the scales have fallen from my eyes and my duty seems clear. How weak I have been! I will not give up my beloved profession, but will rise superior to this morbid sensitiveness which is but a species of the vanity you have spoken of and with God's help, will yet make an honoured name for us both.

"Oh, Rose," he cried, stretching out his hands to her in pathetic tenderness, "do you know what you have done? You have given me back faith and hope, and life is once more worth the living. What may I not yet accomplish with you at my side?"



Digitized by Google



THE power of the big yellow sun that had burned fiercely and relentlessly all day long upon the parched vegetation and lethargic natives round about the town of Kurki, up near the Siwalik Hills, began to wane as he sank unwillingly behind the rugged summits of the Kumaons, shooting his dying rays with unwonted brightness across the wooded landscape.

All day long he had poured his heat down, causing the earth to harden and crack, and the Hindoos to seek shelter as best they could beneath the roofs of their huts. It had been as if the copper-coloured sky were the bottom of a gigantic furnace, and the sun a hole in it.

The sluggish waters of the Ganges moved along inertly, as if the exertion to race were too great; the leaves of the mangoes that shadowed its surface in places remained unmoved the whole day long; an unwary, bright-plumaged bird started to chirp, but he gave it up; a snake rustled quietly in the long grass, then, coiling itself, fell asleep.

Scarcely a sound had broken the silence throughout the day; but as the short twilight overshadowed the broad fields and the jungle, a gentle murmur arose, gradually swelling into a hubbub, as the natives came out of their homes and trooped to the riverside, there to enjoy the tepid waters, and to disport themselves before the inky darkness, indigent to the climate, fell upon the land.

On a slight eminence, on the outskirts of the village, stood the house of a wealthy Hindoo, and from one of the doors several young girls came out and made their way, laughing and talking, to the banks of the Holy River, at some distance from the spot where the people of a lower caste were bathing.

Each girl was clad in a light gauzy robe, and her dusky arms and ankles were encircled with heavy gold rings that clanked and jingled as she walked. One of them, more stately and less given to frivolity than the remainder, led the way. She was Soron, the daughter of the house.

Flinging their garments aside they plunged into the stream, splashing each other, shouting and laughing, almost mad with delight, screaming like children at play.

One, more venturesome than the rest, waded out to the centre of the river, to a floating bough, daring the other girls to follow her, and as they made their way out after her, she threw up her arms with a faint cry of despair and sank beneath the bubbling waters.

Immediately the remainder gave themselves up to wild screams and ran towards the bank. Soron's favourite maid, Mitti, had been seized by a crocodile! There was no hope of saving her now, for the reptile had doubtless finished his horrid feast. But he would have to be caught and killed by the men of the village, otherwise the place would be absolutely unsafe for future bathing purposes; and so the girls hurried back to the home and raised the alarm; but there was an end of Mitti, without a doubt.

The news spread like wildfire, and the disturbed and terrified villagers in the water scrambled for the shores, and stood watching the surface to see if it were broken by the snout of the monster. But nothing at all was seen, and a party of men set out in one of those queer little boats that you see on the Ganges, armed with spears and old muskets and torches, and searched for the crocodile.

They hurled their spears and fired their guns at random into the water, they shouted themselves hoarse, they splashed the water with their paddles. But the women, standing on the banks, saw the glare of their torches as they came back up the stream again, and heard the unsatisfactory and vexing news that there was no sign of the animal they were looking for, or of any other.

Next day a couple of men from the home of Soron were told off by her father to watch the spot where the accident had taken place, which they did, armed with muskets, which they never had occasion to fire, because all through the day not a ripple broke the tranquillity of the stream, except where the branches of the overhanging trees pierced its surface.

At the end of a week confidence returned, and the people—thirsting for a cooling dip at twilight—ventured into the river. And Soron went also with her maids, after her wary father had sent a couple of damsels from the village to bathe in the fatal spot before his daughter went; and nothing further occurred to alarm them until one evening Bandri, who had found the favour her mistress used to bestow on the unfortunate Mitti—anxious to exhibit her pluck—waded out in mid-stream after a glittering bracelet that she saw clinging to a floating branch, and shared the fate of her former companion.

They had all been watching her as she slowly made her way nearer and nearer towards the branch, and then they saw her throw up her arms and disappear when she was within a yard of her goal. When the scare that seized the people abated, and no signs of a crocodile could be discovered by the men who went out in boats to search, Hissar, Soron's father, propounded a theory that there was a pool of some sort or other in mid-stream into which both the unhappy girls must have stepped.

This theory, however, was knocked on the head by the village fakir, who argued that if this were so the bodies would be washed ashore, if not just at that spot, within a reasonable distance.

Hissar, Soron's father, thought it wasn't worth while to hunt about on the off chance of finding the bodies, and after a week or two gave his daughter permission to resume her bathing, provided that she avoided the place where the other girls had gone.

For several nights peace was restored in the place, and the evening sport was resumed without fear of interruption; in fact most of them had forgotten all about the incidents until one night, when Soron's eyes caught sight of a gold bangle encircling the branch of a tree floating over the fatal spot.

She called the attention of her maids to it, and commanded one of them to fetch it for her, as she wanted it. The girl, however, grew frightened and went out on to the bank, followed by her companions, in spite of the threats of their mistress, whose covetousness filled her with a wild desire to obtain what she might have seen was obviously impossible to obtain without the loss of a life.

Wading ashore and seizing her long robe, she tied a stone in the end of it and made her way out again, while the girls watched breathlessly from the banks. Slowly she went towards the coveted treasure, until she was within a couple of yards; then pausing, she swung the gauze, lasso fashion, over her head, and threw it out, intending to catch the twig and drag it towards her.

Digitized by Google

Three times she threw, three times she failed; and in a paroxysm of rage, she cast aside her weapon and forced herself through the water, reaching out her hand, and grasping the bauble with a shout of glee. But, as she turned to come back, she fell forward on her face, screaming with fright, and disappeared, a few bubbles floating softly over the spot where, a second before, she had stood in exultant triumph.

Immediately a wild howl rose from the banks. The women sank on the ground, beating their breasts and tearing their hair. None dared venture to break the news to their master, who would have them every one killed, and so they sat and howled until the people from the village came to their aid, only to guess by the absence of Soron what had really happened.

That night, until the first streaks of the breaking dawn tinted the western sky, Hissar hovered about the spot where his daughter had gone, in a boat with half-a-dozen men, alternately firing his gun into the stream, shouting, tearing his hair, and swearing at the cowed villagers.

But, by the time the sun was well up in the heavens, he had returned to his home to find solace in sleep.

The wildest excitement lasted in the village until the next evening, when the arrival of an English hunter supplied them with a fresh source of interest. He was on his way to Saharanpur, some miles to the north-west of Kurki, and he readily accepted the hospitality of the bereaved Hissar, and stopped at his house the night.

He exhibited an immense amount of interest in the story of the mysterious spot in the Ganges, so much, in fact, that he arranged with his carriers to remain a few days in order to do his best towards lifting the veil that shrouded the unhappy occurrences.

"Your theory as regards the pool is more reasonable than that of the crocodile," he said to Hissar. "And for the very simple reason that as we passed along the banks of the stream at Kankhal, some miles down the river, we found the body of a young woman. This may have been your daughter, or one of the other women."

"Alas! sahib!" moaned Hissar, looking very miserable, and trying to suppress the tone of anxiety that he very obviously felt. "And her bangles, her rings, what have you done with those?"

"There were none on her, so far as I remember," said the Englishman.

Hissar looked incredulous, and wondered how he could best get a confession out of his guest, for the sorrow he had exhibited and felt was more for his lost jewels than for his unhappy daughter, whose love of pomp and display had resulted in her habitually wearing ornaments of considerable value.

"There were none on the body, I'm certain of that," continued the Englishman after a long pause, between the puffs of his pipe; "but," another pause, "I think I can get them back for you, or, if not, at least tell you where they have probably gone."

With this more or less reassuring piece of news Hissar became more calm, although he was convinced that the Englishman had appropriated the valuables for his own use, and, therefore, resolved to question the carriers who had come with him.

First of all, the Englishman instructed him to cause the rumour to be spread through the village that nothing more was to be feared from the pool, which he had rendered perfectly harmless, and that the women might bathe with perfect ease in that particular spot if they wished, and that they would be able to secure the luring armlet if it ever appeared again, a statement that produced a calm on the troubled spirits of the ignorant and superstitious Hindoos.

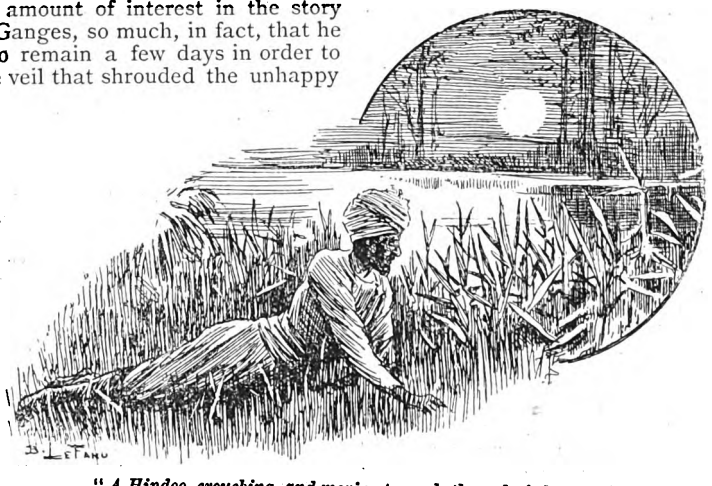
All next day the Englishman found shelter from the sweltering heat in the comfortable quarters assigned to him by Hissar, and arranged and rearranged his plans, all founded on a conclusion at which he arrived by basing his arguments on a terribly frail piece of evidence.

The news that they might bathe in safety and freedom from danger filled the villagers with gratitude towards the sahib, and, as twilight approached, they prepared to take advantage of the opportunity.

Shouting, laughing, playfully splashing one another, a bevy of girls romped in the warm waters of the river near the spot which had proved so fatal to the three unfortunate women who had lost their lives there; and the last rays of the setting sun, shooting across the stream, glinted on a bright bangle attached to a mango branch floating placidly in mid-stream. But although the water flowed gently along, rippling against the pebbly shores, the branch with the bangle did not move!

One young girl, with more confidence in the power of the Englishman than her friends, waded out towards it, hesitated a moment within a few yards, and then pressing forwards, grasped it in her hands, while at the same time a groan rose from the opposite bank followed by a shout, and, looking across she saw the light suit and white pith helmet of the Englishman.

"It was the fact that the twig had appeared on three occasions without floating down the stream that aroused my suspicions as to the truth," said the Englishman that evening as he related his experiences to Hissar. "I knew that there must have been some trick about the thing, and the fact that the body we found was stripped of its valuables, led me to suppose that there was more likelihood of there being a connection between the two circumstances, than that they had been removed by some wandering native on the banks of the river at the place where we found it.



"A Hindoo, crouching, and moving towards the end of the rope."

"I went across to-night half-a-mile down the stream in a boat I borrowed unknown, and I got opposite the spot which has been so fatal to your people. I went there noiselessly, and watched from behind a mango tree, and saw a weighted rope tied to a stake leading into the water.

"The women came into the water, and one of them, as I had wished, made her way towards the branch which I saw floating in mid-stream. I heard a rustling close to my left side, and there appeared the figure of a man, a Hindoo, crouching, and moving towards the end of the rope. The girl came closer and closer to the bait, and the man laid his hand on the rope, gripping it and making ready to pull.

"Then I stepped out and knocked him on the head.

"I made an examination of the rope afterwards, and found that it was weighted, and had a noose at one end, which was evidently laid during the night on the bed of the stream under the branch on which hung the bangle, so that as the women grasped the object, the fellow pulled the rope, which tightened round their ankles, and drew them under water.

"It was a very clever idea, and he must have made a good thing out of the gold bangles, but, no doubt, you will get them back, for he has probably buried them somewhere."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

NEW FASHIONABLE SHAPE FOR SPRING, 1894.

A complete revolution in the cost of garments for Ladies' wear, being supplied Direct from the Manufacturer to the Wearer by means of the Parcel Post, at less than half ordinary prices.

Almost every paper in the United Kingdom has bestowed unlimited praise on these remarkable Costumes, which are made from The John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete, as illustration, for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Packed in Box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Colours: Navy, Brown, Grenat, Myrtle, Reseda, Black, or the fashionable shade of Tan.

THIS SKETCH illustrates the latest improvements that have been made in the Ladies' Half-Guinea Costume, which now consists of the Wide Bell Skirt and improved Blouse Bodice. It is well made throughout, no slop work whatever being allowed. The Bodice is pleated back and front, has full fashionable sleeves, bound seams, and belt; the saddle and sleeves are well lined, and it can be worn inside or outside the skirt, which measures 40 ins. long. The lower part of the skirt, and the cuffs, collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed with rows of narrow Black Russia Braid, the whole thus forming one of the neatest and most serviceable costumes ever introduced for Ladies' wear.

The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 inches round the bust under arms. Larger or special sizes made to order at a cost of 1s. 6d. extra.

☞ Don't make any mistake. John Noble's price, 10/6, is not for the mere Dress Length, but for the Complete Costume made up and ready for immediate use.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD
RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.
A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
Write privately to—
Mrs. S. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.
G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s.6d.
BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.
LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD.
LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,
1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.
Valuable Book on the Skin free, from
THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms.

Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

MELVILLE'S NEW UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, Charing Cross Road, London.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM :—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland :—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 296.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 1, 1894. [Price One Penny.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS LIVER COMPLAINTS
SICK HEADACHE DYSPEPSIA A Splendid Tonic and Gentle Aperient.

MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.

Sold in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each, by all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BEETHAM'S
WORLD FAMED
CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,
M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists,
CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

THREE HALF CROWNS

IT IS A STARTLING FACT

that Three Half-Crowns (7/6) will purchase a beautiful SERGE DRESS LENGTH in any of the following colours:—Black, Blue, Brown, Green, Claret, Nut Brown, Chestnut, Mulberry, Ruby, Red, Moss, Olive, Myrtle, Bronze, &c., also several very pretty and effective mixtures.

Full Dress Length (Carriage Paid) FOR 7/6

Money returned if not approved.

20,000 Sets of Patterns now ready, write at once. Patterns are sent Post Free and need not be returned.

These beautiful Serges are specially manufactured for Autumn and Winter wear, elegant in appearance and are not heavy as most Serges are. They will not spot with rain or wear threadbare.

£5,000 to be Given Away in Presents to Purchasers.

Thousands of Testimonials from all parts of the World.

Cloth Table Covers, 2 yds. square, 4s. 9d. each, in Crimson, Claret, Tan, or Emerald. Remnant Bundles of Serge, 5s. and 10s. each, carriage paid. Write to-day for Patterns of Dress Materials, post free to any address.

(Dept 21)

LUTAS LEATHLEY & CO., The Dress Warehouse, Armley, Leeds.

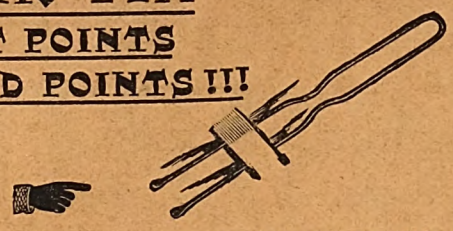
PREVENTS COLDS AND CHILLS

BOVRIL

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST STOCK FOR SOUP.

Digitized by Google

A HAIR PIN
WITHOUT POINTS
HAS GOOD POINTS !!!
SEE THE POINT ?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

MELVILLE'S NEW UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. It has all the latest improvements. Price 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

30 YEARS SUCCESS AMONG THE DEAF.

The Rev. E. J. SILVERTON, Specialist, of Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London, will be happy to send his book on the Ear, "How to Cure without the Use of Instruments, or Operation." Price 6d.

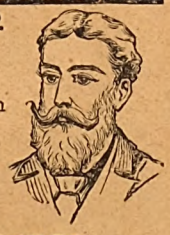
Sufferers from Deafness, Noises, or Discharges in the Ears should obtain this work, or consult E. J. S. by letter or personally. Hours, Monday and Tuesday, 11 to 4 other days 11 to 12 only. Wonderful cases:—A person cured after 40 years' deafness, and one of the age of 90. A gentleman after 17 years' deafness cured. A remarkable case of a lady at Grimsby substantiated by a Clergyman. Addresses on application. All communications as above.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES, &c.

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

Write to-day for our 200 page Illustrated Lists. Post Free, containing 5,000 Testimonials, and particulars of over 1,000 New and Second-hand PNEUMATIC, CUSHION, and SOLID TYRE SAFETIES, TRICYCLES and BICYCLES.

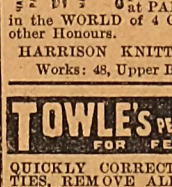
CYCLES MACHINES SENT CARRIAGE PAID

Prices, £4 to £30. Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Large cash Discount. Cycles bought, sold, and exchanged. Tuition Free in our London and Liverpool Schools. Non-purchasers, perfect riding, 10s.6d. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO. LIVERPOOL: 45 EVERTON ROAD. LONDON: 42 HIGH STREET, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to DR. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER



Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

PALACE STEAMERS.—SEASON CLOSES END of SEPTEMBER or BEGINNING of OCTOBER. Weather and other circumstances permitting.

LA MARGUERITE. FASTEST STEAMER in the WORLD.

BOULOGNE and BACK DAILY (Tuesdays excepted), for 10s. 6d. (3rd. rail and fore cabin); 3rd. rail and saloon, 12s. 6d.

Returns available three days, or for season for 2s. excess.

PARIS AND BACK, SATURDAY to MONDAY, for 21s.

Other Days, 26s. return. Return Tickets available third day of issue. Special Train when the numbers warrant it.

MARGATE and BACK, DAILY (Tuesdays excepted).

SIX HOURS ASHORE AT MARGATE for 5s. 6d. by LA MARGUERITE.

From Fenchurch-street Station for Tilbury, weekdays, 8.33 and 8.38; and Sundays, 8.45 and 8.55 a.m.

All passengers disembark at Tilbury on return journey, and travel by train to Fenchurch Street, arriving about 9.50 p.m.

Passengers may obtain tickets beforehand for rail and boat at 33, King William-Street.

Cook's Hotel Coupon Tickets for all places.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN, DAILY, at 9.30 a.m. (except Fridays, on which day La Marguerite will run as usual from Tilbury), from OLD SWAN PIER (London Bridge), calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch Street Station 10.28 a.m. in connection. Tender steamer Greenwich 9.25 a.m., Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Margate Passengers can return by La Marguerite, but if they hold London Bridge tickets they must exchange same at Purser's Office on ship for rail tickets, and pay 6d., third-class train.

GLEN ROSA will leave RAMSGATE at 11.0 a.m. NEXT SATURDAY and the following Saturday for Margate, Tilbury, Woolwich, Blackwall, Greenwich, and London.

YARMOUTH and LOWESTOFT by Palace Steamer VICTORIA, from Harwich DAILY (Fridays excepted), at 3.0 p.m., in connection with the Koh-i-Noor, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.10 a.m. Return tickets available for season except as above.

Offices—33, KING WILLIAM STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

VICTORIA STEAMERS.—SEASON CLOSES END of SEPTEMBER or BEGINNING of OCTOBER. Weather and other circumstances permitting.

CLACTON, HARWICH, and BACK in the Day. YARMOUTH, Lowestoft, Ipswich, and Felixstowe. DAILY (Fridays excepted), when the Lord of the Isles will run to Clacton, by KOH-I-NOOR, from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at Woolwich (South) and Tilbury. Tender Steamer from Greenwich 9.25, and Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Special Train from Fenchurch-street Station at 9.45 and 10.15 a.m., to meet the Koh-i-Noor at Tilbury.

SALOON STEAMER LORD OF THE ISLES, from OLD SWAN, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and THURSDAYS, for ROSHERVILLE, GRAVESEND, SOUTHEND, and SHEERNESS, at 11 a.m. FRIDAYS, CLACTON, SOUTHEND, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 9.10 a.m.

SATURDAYS, HUSBANDS' BOAT to MARGATE, and BACK, at 1.30 p.m. Train, Fenchurch-street Station 2.54 p.m., in connection.

SUNDAYS, ROUND NORE LIGHT, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 2.45 p.m.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND DAILY (Fridays excepted) by MERMAID, 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m, from OLD SWAN PIER, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and Woolwich

GRAVESEND REGATTA and ILLUMINATED FETE NEXT WEDNESDAY.

KOH-I-NOOR 9.10 a.m., ROYAL SOVEREIGN 9.30 a.m., as above; MERMAID, 10.0 a.m. and 6.0 p.m.; SALOON STEAMER, 3.0 p.m.; KAISER, 5.0; DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE, 5.15; H. M. STANLEY, 5.30; SHAW, 5.45. All the above vessels will be brilliantly illuminated, and take part in the firework display. Fares: same as usual to Rosherville and Gravesend. Return tickets, including admission to Terrace Pier and Grounds, 2s. 6d. and 3s.

HAMPTON COURT, RICHMOND, or KINGSTON, from OLD SWAN PIER at 10.0 a.m. DAILY by CARDINAL WOLSEY, calling at all piers.

KEW GARDENS, GREENWICH and BATTERSEA PARKS frequently.

Cheap Through Tickets to and from Stations on District Railway.

Offices—VICTORIA HOUSE, LAURENCE POUNTNEY LANE, E.C.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND, 1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from
THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 296.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 1, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

The Final Shot.

PART I.

WE were in garrison at the little town of Marska. You know what the daily life of an officer of a line regiment is; in the morning a company drill and riding; in the afternoon dinner with the commandant or in a Jewish restaurant; in the evening cards and punch—that is the daily routine. In Marska there was not a single family who kept open house, not one marriageable young lady. We passed our time in quarters, and only saw men in uniform.

One civilian, to be sure, was among us. He might have been thirty-five years of age, and yet we looked upon him as an old man. His remarkable attainments assured for him great respect in our eyes; besides, his habitual silence, his haughty nature, and his keen, sarcastic speech, exercised a great influence over our youthful imaginations. His past was surrounded by a certain mysterious vagueness. He appeared to be a Russian, and yet he bore a foreign name.

He had formerly served with the Huzzars, and been fortunate in promotion. No one knew why he had left the service and taken up his abode in that wretched village, where he lived frugally, yet was free with his money. He always went on foot, and invariably wore an old black great coat.

Nevertheless, his house was always open to the officers of our regiment. To be sure, his dinners consisted of only two or three dishes, prepared by an old pensioner-soldier; but there was always plenty of the best wine. No one knew anything of his circumstances, or of his source of income. He possessed some books, principally upon military subjects, and a few novels, which he gladly lent us. He never demanded their return, and, on the other hand, never gave back those which he himself borrowed.

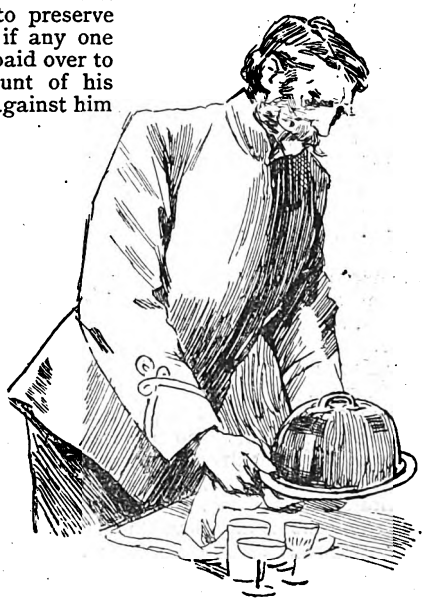
His chief occupation was shooting with the pistol. The walls of his room were honeycombed with bullet holes. A splendid collection of pistols was almost the only thing of value the poor hut in which he lived contained beside the books. His skill with this weapon was truly incredible; and, had he asked it, I believe no one of us would have hesitated a moment in letting him shoot an apple from his head.

All Rights Reserved.

Sometimes the conversation turned upon duelling, and in this case Silvio—so we will call him—inevitably became silent, and gave only the briefest replies to questions put to him. It was evident that the subject was unpleasant to him. We concluded that the recollection of some victim of his deadly skill troubled him.

An unexpected occurrence astonished us all greatly.

One day ten officers of our regiment were at Silvio's house. After dinner, at which, as usual, we drank a great deal of wine, the cards were brought out. Silvio acted as banker. It was his custom at cards to preserve perfect silence, and if any one made a mistake he paid over to the banker the amount of his bet or it was entered against him on the board. This took place without a word. But on this occasion there was a young officer in the party, who had just entered our regiment.



Prepared by an old pensioner soldier.

In play he accidentally made a mistake, which threw him out of the game. Silvio took the chalk and noted the amount as usual. The officer thought an error had been made, and said so. Silvio went on with his dealing in silence. The officer lost his patience and angrily wiped out the score. Silvio calmly wrote it over again. Then, incensed beyond measure by the supposed insult and the laughter of his fellow-officers, the man snatched up a candlestick and hurled it at Silvio, who quickly threw his head on one side and let it pass. Then he rose to his feet, white with rage, and, turning his gleaming eyes on the young officer, said:

Digitized by Google

"Sir, leave this house at once, and thank God that this has happened under my roof."

None of us doubted the consequences of this occurrence, and we already looked upon our new comrade as a dead man. But the next day as we met in the messroom and wondered if the lieutenant were still alive, he came in himself. He had received no message from Silvio. We were astonished. So several days passed.

It appeared that Silvio did not intend to challenge the lieutenant. A superficial explanation was made, and peace again established. Such a course of action at once lowered him in the estimation of the younger officers, but, as the weeks passed, the event was almost forgotten, and Silvio again enjoyed his old influence and respect. But for myself I could not become reconciled.

On Tuesdays and Fridays, the regiment office was filled with officers, collected to receive their letters. Silvio's letters were put in the post bag of our regiment, so that he usually came in on post days. One day a letter was handed him, which he hurriedly tore open. His eyes sparkled while he ran it over.

"Gentlemen," said Silvio, "important business compels me to depart at once; I leave to-night. I hope you will not refuse to dine with me this evening for the last time." He turned to me and added, "I count upon your presence."

It was late when we rose from the table that night, for the wine had flowed more freely than ever. As the guests departed one by one, we bade Silvio good-bye. When I stepped up to shake hands he said to me in a low voice:

"I want to say a few words to you."

I remained behind after the others had departed. We sat down opposite each other, and began to smoke in silence. Silvio appeared troubled. His pale face, his gleaming eyes, and the clouds of smoke which surrounded him, gave him a truly demoniac appearance. Several moments passed, then he broke the silence:

"Perhaps we will never see each other again, and before I go I wish to correct the false opinion you have of me. You thought it strange that I did not demand satisfaction from that drunken lieutenant. You will admit that his life was in my power. If, however, I could have punished him for his insolence without endangering my own life, I would have done so."

I looked at him in astonishment. Such a confession was dumfounding.

"Unhappily I had not the right to place myself in danger. Six years ago a man insulted me, and he still lives.

"Yes, I challenged him," Silvio continued, answering my probable question, "and here is a memento of the duel."

He took down a little red gold-striped cap, in which, about an inch above the vizor, was a bullet hole.

"You are aware that I was with the Huzzars at Stanow. You know my character. I am accustomed to be at the head of everything, and in my younger days this was a passion with me. Duels were of daily occurrence in our regiment, and I had a hand in many, either as principal or second. My comrades adored me, and the heads of my regiment regarded me as an unavoidable evil.

"Just at that time a young man of rich, aristocratic family joined us. Never in my life have I seen such a fellow, so richly endowed by fate and nature. He was young, handsome, witty, jovial, of good name, and had plenty of money. You can imagine that my supremacy received a shock. At first, dazzled by my reputation, he sought to make friends with me. But I was very cool to him, and he turned away without the least apparent regret at my reception. I began to hate him.

"His success in the regiment and with the ladies drove me to desperation. I tried to find some occasion for strife, but his wit turned my assaults of words into laughter. Finally, at a ball on a Polish county estate, where he charmed even the hostess, who, I thought, was partial to me, I said some unsuitable words to him. He flared up in an instant and struck me. We were separated, and the same night set off for a place appointed for the meeting.

"I arrived just at day-break. My opponent came a little later, leisurely, on foot, in his shirt sleeves, and coolly eating cherries from his cap, which he had filled on the way.

"It was agreed that we should toss up for the first shot. With his usual good luck he won. He fired, and the bullet passed through my cap. At last his life was in my hands. I looked at him closely, to detect any signs of uneasiness in his face. No, he stood unconcernedly eating cherries from his cap, and throwing his stones toward me. Now and then they rolled almost to my feet. Then an evil thought came into my head. I lowered my pistol.

"'It appears,' I said, 'that at present you are not in a mood for dying. You prefer to breakfast. I will not disturb you.'

"'You are not disturbing me in the least,' he coolly replied; 'I beg of you to fire. Or, if it pleases you, the shot remains yours, and I am always at your service.'

"I told the seconds accordingly that I would reserve my shot, and so the meeting ended.

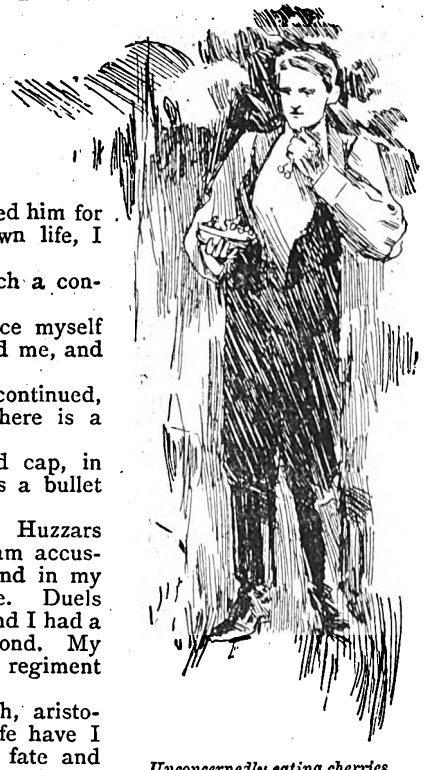
"I left the service, and came back here into the country. But no day has passed in which I have not thought of my revenge. Now my time has come."

Silvio drew from his pocket the letter he had received. It informed him that a certain person was about to marry a young and beautiful girl.

"I am going to Moscow," said Silvio. "We will see whether he will look death so coolly in the face before the wedding as he did then with his cherries."

With these words he rose, and throwing his cap on the floor, strode up and down the room like a tiger in his cage. Strange, opposing feelings overcame me as I watched him.

His servant came in and announced that the horses were ready, he pressed my hand warmly, then rushed out, jumped into the droschka, and in another minute was gone into the night.



Unconcernedly eating cherries from his cap.

PART II.

Several years passed, and circumstances compelled me to take up my abode in the regions of Stanow. I had but few neighbours, and, though busy with the superintendence of my estate, I led a rather lonely life.

About four versts away was the beautiful country seat of Countess Zaronski, which was in charge of her agent. But the spring following my arrival in the country I heard that the Countess and her husband were to pass the summer at their abode. The news was very welcome to me, and soon after their arrival I took the liberty, as the nearest neighbour and only other considerable landowner in that region, to call upon them.

A servant led me into the Count's reception-room, and went to announce my presence. The room was large, and furnished with all possible luxury. On the walls were cases well filled with books in elegant bindings, and rugs, bronzes, and pictures gave the place a comfortable and attractive appearance.

Digitized by Google

The door opened, and a handsome man of, perhaps, thirty-five entered. The Count received me in a most friendly and hearty manner, and, even before I could announce myself, welcomed me as a neighbour. His frank, easy manner soon banished the embarrassment I had at first felt. The Countess came in, and I was presented to her. She was, indeed, a beautiful woman, and in her presence I felt my first feeling of awkwardness and timidity returning. But they treated me so informally, so like an old acquaintance, that I felt once more reassured.

Meanwhile I looked at some of the books and pictures, and told them how welcome to my eyes were such things, for my house was but barely furnished, and a mansion had never been built on the place. One picture especially attracted my attention. It was a Swiss landscape, but it was not the painting itself that struck my eye, but rather the fact that right in the middle of the canvas were two bullet holes, one precisely above the other.

"A capital shot!" I remarked, turning to the Count.

"Yes," he said, "a very remarkable one. Do you care for shooting?"

"Well, I think I would not miss a card at thirty paces," I replied, glad a subject had been hit upon that was familiar to me. "Of course, with pistols you mean?"

"Really?" said the Countess, with a look of interest, and, turning to her husband, "And you, my dear, could you hit a card at that distance?"

"We will try it some day," answered the Count. "In my time I was not a bad shot, but I've not handled a pistol for four years."

"Well, in that case," I remarked, "I will venture that you will miss at twenty paces. Pistol shooting demands daily practice. I know that from experience. No, believe me, Count, a man must practice constantly or he becomes rusty. The best shot I ever knew never let a day pass without using his pistols—and generally took a few practice shots before each meal."

"And what sort of a marksman was he?" asked the Count.

"Well, for example, when he saw a fly on the wall he called out, 'Hullo, Knako, my pistols.' Knako brought him a loaded pistol. Piff, and the fly was smashed to bits."

"Remarkable skill," exclaimed the Count, "and what was his name?"

"Silvio, Count."

"Silvio," cried he, springing to his feet. "Did you know Silvio?"

"Know him! We were intimate friends. He was looked upon as one of our regiment. But I have not heard of him for five years. Then you, too, have known him?"

"Yes, I knew him—knew him well. Did he ever, perhaps, tell you of a strange occurrence——?"

"Do you mean of the blow a young fellow gave him at a ball——?"

"Did he tell you the name of this young fellow?"

"No—but, Count," I cried, suspecting the truth, "I beg your pardon—I did not know that you were the person."

"Yes, myself," answered the Count, somewhat confused. "The bullet holes in that picture painting are the mementoes of our last meeting."

"Please, dear," said the Countess, "don't speak of that. I shudder when I hear that story."

"No," answered the Count, "I must tell the gentleman all about it. It is but right that he should know how Silvio was avenged."

Mascha threw herself about my neck.

We sat down, and I listened with intense interest to the following narrative:—

"Five years ago we were married, and passed our honeymoon upon this estate. One evening, as we returned from a ride, I saw a travelling carriage at the door, and I was informed that a gentleman was waiting to see me. He had refused to give his name, and only said that he had business of importance to transact with me. I came to this reception-room and saw before me a man with dust-covered clothes and a long beard, standing by the chimney. I went up to him, but failed to recognise the features.

"'You do not know me, Count,' he said, with trembling voice.

"'Silvio,' I exclaimed, and I must confess that I felt my hair stand on end.

"'Yes, it is I,' he continued. 'I have one shot still to my credit and I have come to take it. Are you ready?'

"From a side pocket I saw the handle of a pistol protruding. I measured off twelve paces—the original distance—and stood in the corner over there. I begged him to shoot quickly, before my wife came in. He hesitated and demanded a light, as it was growing dark. Candles were brought. I closed the door and ordered that no one be admitted, and then again requested him to fire. He raised his pistol and aimed—I counted the seconds. I thought of her—a terrible moment passed—Silvio lowered his pistol.

"'I am sorry,' said he, 'but my pistol is not loaded with cherry stones—the ball is so heavy; but it occurs to me that this seems more like a murder than a duel. I am not accustomed to shooting unarmed men. We will begin again, and draw lots to see who shall shoot first.'

"My head swam—I believe I rejected the proposal—but finally a second pistol was loaded. We placed two pieces of paper in his cap—the one I had put a bullet through—and drew. I won a second time.

"'You have confounded good luck, Count,' said he with a smile which I shall never forget.

"I know not how it happened, nor through what means he compelled me to it, but I fired and hit this picture here."

The Count pointed to the landscape. His face was fiery red, but that of the Countess as white as a sheet.

"At any rate," continued the Count, "I shot, and missed, thank God! Then Silvio took aim (at that moment he looked almost like a fiend). Suddenly the door opened, and Mascha ran in and threw herself about my neck.

"Silvio let his pistol fall, and then raised it and took aim again.

"'No, I will not fire,' said Silvio. 'I am satisfied. I only wished to see you in pain and confusion. I compelled you to shoot at me. I am satisfied. You will remember me. I leave you alone with your conscience.'

"He took one step towards the door, but stopped at the threshold, cast one glance at the painting my ball had struck, and then fired at it almost without aiming, as he went out.

"My wife fainted. The servants did not dare to stop him, and looked after him in terror. He went down the steps, called to the coachman, and, before I could gain my presence of mind, was gone!"

The Count was silent.

So it was that I learned the end of a story, the beginning of which had greatly interested me. I have never seen the hero of it since. It is said that Silvio led a division of the revolutionists during the uprising of Alexander Ypsilenti, and fell at the battle of Shullein.

Digitized by Google

MY NEIGHBOUR.

A FATIGUING journey up six long, winding flights of stairs carried me to the room I occupied in Lambert Street. Here I lived, in enjoyment of no end of fresh air, especially in winter, and a brilliant prospect up and down the street and over the roofs of the houses across the way.

I was studying painting at that time—learning to paint the landscapes and figure-pieces which I produce with so much ease and dispose of with so much difficulty.

At the head of the last flight of stairs in my lodging-house was a narrow passage-way, in which I was obliged to stop and recover my breath, after finishing the one hundred and thirty-nine steps that led to my paradise, before I could get my key into its lock; and into this passage-way open two doors, one of which, of course, belonged to my own room, and the other one to someone else's. But who this someone else was I was unable to find out. Was it a man or a woman? I was persuaded that it must be a woman, and as a woman I always used to think of her and speak of her to myself—and I thought and spoke of her often enough.

Of course I could have settled the question at once by knocking at her door and asking for a match, or by inquiring of my landlord, who occasionally honoured me with a friendly call; but I scorned resorting to such methods.

Every time I heard her door shut, I resolved she should not go out again without my seeing her, and I nearly fell into the street as I frantically attempted to reach far enough out of my window to see her as she came out of the street door.

The only communication I ever had with people in the house was an occasional conversation with the dust-coloured old woman who cleaned the windows and swept the halls.

A day came for cleaning my windows when it rained heavily, and I could not give the old woman a clear space by going out for a couple of hours, but told her to clean away and be as quick as she could, while I sat there and painted.

She had an eye for character, though, and told me the peculiarities of some of the lodgers, in a quaint way, nailing her sentences, now and then, with odd hard words, independently of the general text.

"Gentleman who's under you keeps 'imself quite to 'imself," she said. "Plants out queer herbs in boxes all the time, an' some of 'em on the balcony itself. P'r'aps 'e makes a kinder tea of 'em, or root-drink. Decoctifies."

"And who is in the room below that?" I inquired, more to make her talk than to satisfy any curiosity I had on the subject.

"Empty now. Two dark little gentlemen 'ad it for a fortnight—Jews, I fancy—an' as like one another as two spots o' dirt on this 'ere pane o' glass. Spoke a hard-biled kind o' tongue an' was furriners, most likely Polyanders."

I might have asked her about my next door neighbour, but refrained for fear my pretty romance would be destroyed by a description of a middle-aged spinster who wore glasses and wrought green roses in crewel-work.

When she had finished the windows and gathered up her cloths and pail, she paused an instant to give a backward glance at her completed task. The sun had broken through the clouds and rested tenderly on the stooping figure of the old woman in her faded rags.

"What a picture!" I thought involuntarily; then aloud I said, "Will you come some time and let me paint you, Maggie?"

"Me!" she cried, startled.

"Yes, just as you are now, cleaning rags and all. Will you come?" I cried, my enthusiasm rising.

"Law! Why d'ye want to paint an old woman like me, Mister Carroll, with a face wrinkled like a monkey's? Why don't you paint a pretty girl? Old women are painted though sometimes, but only to make 'emselves look young agen. Ha, ha!"

It was useless to argue the point with her, so I only said:

"Yes, but I want you, Maggie. Will you come?"

"Law, if you really wanter 'ave me, I'll come, sir, 'cause you've been very good to old Maggie."

The sittings began the next day, and I derived much amusement from the old woman's conversation, while I painted away, with might and main, resolved that this picture should be hung at the Academy; and my imagination even went so far as to speculate on the most suitable style of frame.

At first it was only of the other lodgers that old Maggie gossiped, but one day, when she was looking very tired, I questioned her kindly about herself, and she finally told me her story.

The old woman had evidently taken a great fancy to me, and I wish I could remember the quaint words in which she told me of her girlhood in London, and her courtship by a man, poor like herself, though much above her in station—a newspaper writer, she said he was.

"When we was first married, we took a little country 'ouse that made me think of a biled dinner, for 'twas painted in red, an' green, an' deep yeller—jest like that paint yer mixin' up now—carrotty. Then the baby came."

Her whole voice and manner changed, and during the rest of the story she dropped the abrupt witticisms for a tremulous eagerness.

"Did ye know I 'ad a son, Mister Carroll?"

"No," I answered, intent on my work; "where is he now?"

"E's a rich man, an' a gentleman," she said proudly, and yet with a wistfulness that made me glance quickly at her face.

"If I could only get that expression," I thought; and went to work with perfect frenzy on the face.

"How is it that you are not a fine lady then, Maggie?" I asked.

"That's what 'e'd make me—me, d'ye 'ear?—who's scrubbed floors for thirty years! But I'd only shame 'im, an' folks 'd say, 'Dear, dear, an' d'ye know 'is mother is a charwoman!' An' then 'e'd only be ashamed o' me. No, no, no, I couldn't stand that, an' I tol' 'im so."

There was an awkward pause, in which I could think of nothing to say to the poor thing, so glanced at her compassionately, and thoughtfully mixed some sepia on my palette.

"Ye see, sir, 'twas this way," Maggie went on, after a while. "After Joe died we 'ad nothin'—not a penny to buy bread, so I sent the boy to the 'ome for poor children an' began scrubbin' floors. It was 'ard to let Dick go, but I tried not to sorrer over it, for I knew I couldn't keep 'im. I didn't see 'im for quite a while then, not till 'e was five year, for they wouldn't let visitors in on Sunday, an' I was workin' all the other days.

"I went up there with my scrubbin' things, an' 'e didn't know me, sir! 'E ran away an' 'id when I tried to kiss 'im. Well, after that, I went up whenever I could get away after my work was done at night, though I was awful tired, an' 'e got kinder uster me, an' liked to build tents by puttin' up my broom an' mops, an' wrappin' my shawl round 'em. 'E uster call my mop 'Doctor,' 'cause 'e said the end was like Doctor Dick's whiskers. Doctor Dick was the regular doctor at the 'ome, an' 'e'd took a fancy to my little Dick.

"One day, I was washin' windows in an office in Turner Street, an' in walks Doctor Dick. Well, we 'ad a talk, an' the end of it was 'e took my Dick to fetch up for 'is son. 'E was a nice, kind gentleman, an' I knew he thought a sight o' Dick, but it was 'ard for me, for I 'ad to promise not to see Dick after 'e left the 'ome. But I'd no money to fetch 'im up on, an' Doctor Dick 'd make a gentleman out of 'im, an' I couldn't stand in the boy's way; 'e'd soon forget me, though it nearly killed me when I thought of it.

"That must a-been near thirty year ago, but somethin' hurts 'ere," touching her heart, "when I think of the day I said good-bye."

There was another pause, in which I painted furiously.

"What day's to-day? The thirteenth, isn't it? Well, 'twas just five years ago that Dick found me out, an' I was still scrubbin'. I didn't seem to 'ave no 'art to get anything better to do after I let Dick go. What was the use?

"Doctor Dick was dead, an' 'ad left my Dick lots o' money an' a letter that told 'im about me; so 'e'd come to look me up an' take me to live with 'im. 'E was good, but awful cold an' still-like, an' wore kid gloves, an' finer close nor Joe ever 'ad. But I ought not 'er say that, for 'e allers is very good to me, jest as if I was a lady; but you see 'e was different, an' I never could love 'im like little Dick.

Digitized by Google

"So I told 'im 'e must leave me where I was, for I couldn't be 'appy in a big 'ouse with fine close, an' would only shame 'im before folks—an old woman like me. I was too old to change. I'd scrubbed all my life, an' was goin' to scrub to the end. 'An',' said I, 'ye musn't come to see me on week-days when I'm workin' either, 'cause 'twouldn't do no good, an' folks 'd only wonder.'

"'E got a little angry at that, but I fancy he was glad at bottom. I said 'e could come on Sundays, an' we'd spend that day together if 'e wanted to.

"So now 'e comes every Sunday, an' takes me to church, an' I rig out in the fine shawl an' bunnit an' things 'e keeps givin' me, and try to be like a great rich lady.

"It's hard sometimes to think 'e's really my boy, for 'e don't talk like me or seem to belong to me somehow; but I s'pose it's all right, and 'e's a real fine gentleman is Dick," she finished, with pride, which poorly concealed the aching mother-heart beneath.

"Poor Maggie," I said softly, under my breath.

"Why do you say that?" she cried, almost fiercely, "I ain't sorry 'bout anything, an' Dick's as good to me as 'e can be. Mighty few women's got such a son!"

After that we neither spoke till the clock struck six, and I stepped back to view my work.

It was truly the best thing I had ever done, and another hour's work would have finished it, but the light was going fast, so I began to put away my paints and brushes, and Maggie gathered up her things to leave.

"I wish there was something I could do for you," said I, as I slipped a coin into the old woman's hard palm. I felt more sympathetic now that my work was done, and her story seemed more to me than when I was wondering whether to use grey or brown for her faded eyes.

Her face brightened at the words.

"Sometime," she faltered slowly, "if you could paint Dick—jest a little thing for me——"

"Gladly," I answered, "but when and where can I see him?"

"Why, 'e——" she stopped. "Sometime, p'haps, you'll see my Dick, an' I 'ope you'll like 'im. I should like to 'ave you know my son, Mister Carroll. Good-night, sir."

And she was gone.

I had just got back from dinner, when there was a knock at my door, and Doctor Davis came in unceremoniously. I was used to having him drop in about that time in the day, and rather enjoyed a chat with my gentlemanly landlord, for, though outwardly grave, almost to sadness, he displayed at times a grim humour that was vastly entertaining, and he was, moreover, a man of education and refined tastes. He rarely spoke of himself and kept his cloak of reserve well buttoned up to his chin—sometimes I even thought he turned the collar up to ward off all personal questions. But I knew him to be a physician with a limited practice, and a fine house in G——— Street, besides the row of lodging-houses from 115 to 121, West Lambert Street.

"How are you, Davis?" I said, without changing my position.

"As well as this beastly weather permits anyone to be," he replied, taking the only vacant chair. "The fog is so thick outside you could drill holes in it and blast it with gunpowder."

But his attention was attracted just then to my easel.

"What's this?" he cried, and moved the lamp to get a better view.

I had my back to him; so after a long silence, I wheeled around to say, rather impatiently I fear, as I did not understand his hesitation:

"Well, how do you like it?"

"It's truly fine, Carroll. I never dreamed you would do anything like this. Why, my dear fellow, your reputation will be made."

I felt very much gratified, for Davis was something of a critic and his opinion worth having, but it wouldn't be manly for me to show my pleasure, so I only said indifferently:

"You think it will go, then?"

"Go! Now, look here, Carroll, I want this. Name your own price, but I must have it."

"You've seen Maggie, of course, haven't you—the old woman who cleans the halls here?"

"Yes, often," he answered slowly.

"Do you think it is like her?"

"Very like—and yet older and sadder-looking someway. Don't you think so?"

"No. She looked just like that to-day. She's to pose again to-morrow, for, as you see, it's not quite done yet. This hand needs touching, and the dress should be worked up a little more."

"Yes; but I wouldn't touch it, if I were you. It's just perfect now, and you might do too much, you know."

"Nonsense," I said, rather vexed at his tone.

"I must go along now," he said, buttoning up his coat. "I've some business in the next house—119."

I noticed for the first time that he looked ill, and tried to make him take some brandy before he went out, but he seemed in a hurry and couldn't stop.

"Good-bye," he said, "and remember the picture is mine." It was a hot, clammy night, and after Davis left I threw the windows open as far as they were made to be thrown, and got as far out of one of them as I safely could, by tilting my chair back, and extending my legs out into that undefined everywhere called the wide, wide world.

So Davis had bought my picture and I was to name the price. Well, he was a rich man, I thought complacently, and my price grew in size the longer I thought about it. It did not occur to me that a receipted bill for three months rent, due last week, might be justly considered as a part payment. I would make the sum large enough to cover my expenses to Paris and back next summer; and then——

I was startled by hearing the door to the next room shut gently. I had not indulged in many dreams of my fair neighbour lately; in fact, my new interest in art had locked the door on my curiosity, and someway now I cared little about finding the key.

I nearly jumped out of my chair, however, when I heard a distinct groan from the next room; and, as I sprang to my feet, there was the sound of a heavy fall. I rushed into the hall. This was no time for knocking, and I swiftly turned the handle of the door which had so baffled me in my desire to know more of the occupant of the room behind it.

The room was totally dark.

"What's the matter? Can I be of any assistance?" I called, peering into the blackness.

The room was larger than mine, and handsomely furnished, evidently by a person of taste, I had time to think to myself before my eyes fell on a dark figure lying, face downwards, on the floor beside the table.

I quickly put the lamp down, lifted her gently on to the bed, and bent over her to see if she were conscious.

To my surprise it was old Maggie, and she was quite, quite dead!

I was so stunned that I could not think for a minute. Then I went out, closed the door softly and reverently, and ran downstairs.

So this was my neighbour, and I never knew!

On the second floor I met one of the housemaids carrying a lamp, which I took out of her hands.

"Go quickly," said I, "to 119, and tell Doctor Davis that Maggie is dead."

The girl looked frightened, but obeyed without a word.

Then I suddenly thought of her son—Dick, she called him. He must know. I was about to go in search of someone else, when I met Davis on the landing in the dimly-lighted hall.

"Davis," said I, "we must send for her son. Do you know where he lives?"

I could see even in the semi-darkness that his face was working convulsively, but, without answering, he strode on to Maggie's room, I following.

Two of the maids were in the room now, one of them weeping noisily, for Maggie had been kind to her last winter when she was ill.

But Davis did not notice them. He went quickly over to the bed, dropped on his knees by its side, and taking the poor, stiff, wrinkled hands in his, he covered them with kisses.

When he rose and turned toward me, I saw the great tears rolling down his face.

"Carroll," he said gently, "leave us together. Her son is here."

Digitized by Google

THE SHATTERED IDOL.

NELLY'S father was firm on that point.

"No," he said deliberately, "she is yet too young to even listen to a suggestion of marriage, Gordon; and, high as you undoubtedly stand in my estimation, I assure you it would be exceedingly bad policy on my part if I were to give my consent to your immediate union. The girl is only eighteen, and at that age it is not to be expected that her judgment and discretion should be mature, more especially where the passions of the heart are concerned.

"I do not for one moment doubt the absolute sincerity of your affection; but, at the same time, you must remember that you are the only man she has ever loved, simply because you are the only man with whom she has had an opportunity of becoming at all intimate.

"It is well to allow her to have ample opportunities for making a fresh choice in other directions if she is so inclined. During the next couple of years I promise you she shall have a chance of doing this; and if, at the end of that time, her disposition towards you is the same as it is now, then you shall have her, my lad, with my blessing."

Stared hard across the water.

Gordon gently tapped the floor of the hotel verandah with his foot and stared hard across the water at the white roofs of St. Kilda, that fringed the shore of Port Phillip Bay. The elder man, a bronzed type of an Australian sheep farmer, lay back in an easy-chair, and regarded the suitor for his daughter's hand with an expression of commingled pity and affection.

He was fond of Gordon; he would have chosen him among a hundred others as a son-in-law; but he was a wise father, and his daughter's ultimate happiness was at stake and turned upon his words. His arguments, to himself, were reasonable and well-chosen, but to Gordon, madly in love as he was with Nelly, they seemed absurd and unnecessary. Still, he knew that there was not one grain of ill-feeling in the motives that actuated Mr. Anson's refusal, and when the first flush of bitterness that rose unbidden to his compressed lips had died away, he held out his hand and, swallowing his disappointment, said that he was content to abide by his future father-in-law's decision.

"I can't possibly stay in Melbourne, though," he said, huskily, "unless I make myself perfectly objectionable to any fellows you want to get Nelly to know. I don't want to have a bad name in the city, and I know that if I remain here Nelly won't find many opportunities of making fresh male acquaintances. So I shall go up country for a few months at a time, and come and see you and dear little Nell when I am in the city. In two years from now, then, I may have her, mayn't I?"

Mr. Anson nodded solemnly, and Gordon went away.

That evening he sat with Nelly on the verandah, and told her what had passed at the interview, and at what decision her father had arrived.

"How absurd," she said, petulantly tossing her head. "How very absurd of father. But I suppose it is useless to argue with him. I really fail to see that his course of action is at all necessary in my case, because," her voice fell to a soft whisper as she bent closer to him, "you know, you dear old boy, how much you are to me."

Gordon pressed her hand affectionately. An elopement and clandestine marriage suggested itself to his mind for a moment as he looked on the little girl by his side and thought of the two long years that would have to elapse before he might call her his own. But his sturdy Scotch nature drowned the thought, and with a big sigh he answered:

"I know, dear. And I also know that my little Nelly will come out of the ordeal which her father has mapped out for her absolutely immaculate, and with an augmented love for the man who, even now, has a right to call her his own."

A week afterwards he had gone up country.

. . . . . .

Less than a year later, Gordon lay panting in the gloom of the North of Queensland bush. For three days no moisture had touched his lips, now blackened and disfigured beyond all semblance of those which had once pressed kisses on the mouth of Nelly Anson. For three days he had struggled on, now under the fierce glare of the unmerciful Australian sun, now ill-sheltered by the shade of the tall gums.

A couple of months' tramping had led him into the camp of a gang of bushrangers, to whom he fell an easy prey. They were brutal, insulting fellows, the whole lot of them, with never so much as the common feelings of respect towards themselves or towards others with whom they came in contact. He had got a large amount of hard cash and notes about his person at the time, and they took care of it for him.

Not only that, they made known to him their intention of keeping him a captive until they found an opportunity of making more money out of him. They sent a note from him to the nearest white squatter demanding a goodly sum as a ransom, which, on his release, he would pay with interest; and, when the messenger came back with their money, they put it in their belts and moved on to the next station, repeating the operation.

He was perfectly helpless in their hands—they took good care of that. He had made several attempts to escape, but each one had proved futile. They kept him in good health, and already he had lost his ears and three fingers of the left hand by refusing to indite further supplications for ransoms, and he was further once tortured for attempting to smuggle a line begging for aid and revealing their true motives on a slip of paper wrapped up in the fraudulent message.

At the end of a few months, however, he became of no further use to them on account of the fact that the trick had been played on all the squatters within a reasonable radius with unqualified success, and his presence among them became a constant source of anxiety. Dead men tell no tales, and it would be all the better for their personal safety if he told none. A breach in their opinions, resulting from a few of the more sensible of the ruffians not wanting the blood of a fellow-creature wittingly on their hands, led to his being turned adrift in the bush, unarmed, unprovided with food, and, to their certain knowledge, with no water hole within a radius of twenty miles.

Digitized by Google

The knowledge that he was at length free aroused the deepest emotions of his heart, and, childlike, he ran and laughed at the very conviction of it.

Three days later he was a helpless, dying unit of humanity, lying beneath the shadow of a eucalyptus, and on the verge of insanity and of the grave.

The quivering vapour rises from the undergrowth where the burning rays of the sun pierce the mass of foliage above. The heat is stifling. The air is thick, like that of a large oven, and indrawn breath scorches the lungs. Everything is silent as the vault, not even the welcome rustle of a dead leaf or the chirp of a lazy insect can be heard.

Gordon is half lying, half sitting, with his back propped against the smooth trunk of the tree that rises fifty feet above his head. His head droops forward on his chest, and reason is slowly ebbing from his mind.

His arms are covered with lacerations from which he has drawn his life's blood to ameliorate the fearful pangs of thirst that have tormented him for so long. This constant draining of his life has rendered his hands and face a sickly yellow, and the repulsiveness of his countenance is enhanced by the tortures he has undergone.

But there is vitality in his frame yet, for, with an effort, he reaches for a sharp stone and inflicts a deep gash on the back of his hand which he presses to his swollen lips. His eyes gleam wildly as he sucks at the wound, and then he drops his hand.

With the other arm he feebly draws a tattered photograph from his belt, pressing it to his bloodstained lips, and kissing it as he had done a thousand times since he left her away back in the hotel at Melbourne.

In a bewildered manner, he wonders how long she will survive him if he never goes back; if, that is, for an unreasoning instinct tells him that, before the sun has set, help will come to him and he will be saved.

A strange emotion cheers him as he has never been cheered for months past, and he strains his blunted sense of hearing for some sound that shall bring the glad tidings of release from this misery.

When this assistance comes, he will recover, and then he will make his way joyfully back to his darling, and claim her as his own, after these years of agonising waiting. They will, after that, never part again; and her father will regret the time when he ordained that their union should be postponed.

Round the nucleus of his affection, which had been formed in Melbourne, has grown a powerful, undying, passionate love, augmented by an unwilling and involuntary absence.

He gazes wistfully at the picture for a short time, and then the overpowering heat, combined with the open wound in his hand, causes him to drop it, and he instinctively pushes it in his belt, as he rolls over in a faint.

When the parched lids slowly uncover his glassy eyes, he sees men about him and feels a cool moisture trickling down his throat. It is almost dark, and these good fellows who are tending him are on their way to a station not ten miles off. They lift him tenderly on one of their horses, and, as he proceeds, the cool night air, in combination with the frequent small draughts of water carefully administered, revive him so that he can talk to them at times reasonably.

He tells them about those three days of agony, and then wanders off, in an almost inaudible whisper, on to the subject of the little girl in Melbourne, who so patiently awaits his return, and he asks them if he may not go back to that city at once. They soothe him with vain promises, and then he comes back to his senses, and wants to know if they will let him head a party to hunt down the men in whose hands he has been helpless for so long.

When they come up to the station he is insensible with the exertion, and they place him in a comfortable bed and administer to his wants. One of them stays by the bedside all night. He is the owner of the station, a young man with a kind, honest face, and whose eyes are moist as he listens to the mutterings and meaningless talk of the sufferer.

At daybreak Gordon opens his eyes. His face is flushed and his head throbs and burns. The stranger is still at his side, and talks kindly to him, smoothing his forehead and moistening his lips with brandy and water. Then, when he is quieter, he sees the man go out of the room, and shortly after a girl comes in.

He does not see her until she is close by his side, and when he turns his pain-drawn face towards her he cries, in a weak voice:

"Nelly! My darling!"

She looks sorrowfully at him—she cannot understand. There is no resemblance between this pale, sickly looking man and anyone she has known sufficiently intimately to warrant their addressing her by her maiden name.

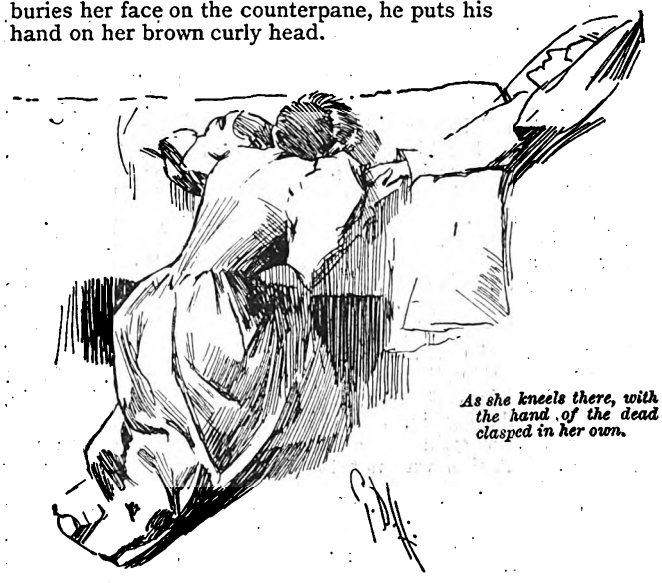
She takes his yellow hand in hers and smooths it softly, and as she does so he covers hers with his other fingers.

"I knew that I should see you again, Nelly," he whispers, a faint smile playing about his lips. "I knew that God would never ordain that—we—should—part for—ever." His breath comes in gasps now.

Still her contracted brows indicate her continued perplexity, as to who he is. Why should he call her Nelly?

"The two years are gone—dear; you—are my little—girl now."

She bends forward eagerly and looks into his face. Her cheeks are very white. Then she knows. But he does not, thank God. As she falls on her knees by the bedside and buries her face on the counterpane, he puts his hand on her brown curly head.



As she kneels there, with the hand of the dead clasped in her own.

"You are so—so glad to see me—back that you—cry?"

There is a glad ring in his weak, broken voice.

She nods her head almost imperceptibly.

"We will—get married as—as soon as I am able to get—up."

A heavy sob breaks from her in reply.

After a long pause he opens his eyes slowly.

"Nelly—darling little girl—do you—remember—that night—when we parted—you said that—you—would write me—by every mail. They took me—and I never got—your letters—dear—that is why—I did not write. I—was——"

The struggle to explain his seeming negligence of her faithfulness has sapped what little breath remained in his frame, and he closes his eyes in sheer exhaustion.

His lips move, and she reaches to hear the sounds that escape from them.

"Kiss me—darling—before—I go to sleep. I—am weary. To-morrow——"

She presses a passionate kiss on that poor contorted mouth, and then, as he falls into the long, deep sleep which knows no waking, she sinks on her knees and sobs as though her heart would burst.

And as she kneels there, with the hand of the dead clasped in her own, her husband comes into the room.

Digitized by Google

MY FIANCÉE.

I HAD been telegraphic operator at "B Station" some six or eight months, and had held communication of a purely business character only with the operator at "D," when there came a change. Death silently removed the man who had been in charge there for so long, and a new operator was installed.

A message spun along the line one February morning in this wise: "Good morning, B."

I responded:

"Good morning, D."

Then came the information: "The old man died last night, and I have taken his place."

"What is your name?" I asked.

"Nellie Merton. What is yours?"

A spirit of devilry prompted my reply: "Ned Clayborn."

"Thank you," was the concise response. Then a message in real earnest came along the lines, and we were obliged to attend to business.

Every day I bade my unseen acquaintance, "Good morning," and never closed up at night without a farewell message. A twinge of conscience racked me at times, and a "still, small voice" whispered its warning; but the temptation was too great, and it was not long before I was sending sly messages, containing a good deal "atween the lines," to the unseen Nellie. The replies to these messages were guarded, but hopeful, and I grew bolder. It was no end of fun.

She told me her history. She had run away from home, because her parents insisted upon marrying her to a man she detested (and the last word came clicking viciously from my end of the line). She would never marry him—never. I advised her not to, and hinted at an affection deeper and truer than any the presuming "detested fellow" could offer.

Well, the outcome of it all was that I asked the unseen Nellie to be my wife, and even described the little home that was lonesomely awaiting her coming. I was floundering in deep water, and could but trust to a kind providence to pull me out. My "fun" was becoming dead earnest. How I wished the wires stretching between us were telephonic, instead of telegraphic, that I could perchance hear some exclamation, or gain some token of how my message was received. But this was not to be, and I had to possess my soul in patience.

That virtue was almost exhausted, when the well known call fell upon my ear. I flew to the instrument. It was concise, and not very complimentary: "Rather than marry that brute, I will risk it."

I was in for it now, and must perforce flounder still deeper by sending rapturous messages over the wires. I, Delia Brown, was engaged to be married to a young lady I had never seen. This was forcing the question of woman's rights.

I carried the "fun" on for over three months, and every day it grew decidedly less "funny," until I began to brood over the predicament into which I had giddily led my feet. The time was rapidly approaching when I would have to claim the bride I had won in this novel and romantic manner, and my blood ran cold at the thought of how easy it would be for her to learn of my perfidy, and from all I had seen of her temper, I felt sure she would not deal lightly with anyone who dared to play tricks upon her.

At last I could bear it no longer, and one day, just three weeks before I was to travel to "D" and claim my bride, I got into the train with altogether another motive. It was to "kiss and make up," after I had begged her with tears to forgive me, etc., etc.

I found a little house, with a little sign in blue and white swinging in the breeze, similar to the little house and the little sign at "B." It was occupied at the time by a young man reading a paper. I looked at him, without speaking, and he returned the compliment in kind.

"I wish to see Miss Nellie Merton," I said, and, as he did not speak, I went on to explain. "I am the operator at 'B,' and have an important message, which must be delivered to her at once. A moment's delay means——" I paused for a word, and he spoke for the first time.

"So you are the operator at 'B,' and desire to see Miss Merton? I am sorry to disappoint you; but you see Miss Merton is at home at the present time, while I take her place. The fact is, she is going to be married, and is preparing for the great event. She cannot be seen personally, but if you will entrust the message to me, I will deliver it immediately, if you will be kind enough to take my place while I run round to her house."

His coolness nearly distracted me.

"I must see her!" I exclaimed excitedly.

"But you cannot," he said coolly. "I have strict orders not to let anyone know her whereabouts for a day or two, until these preparations are well under way."

I was on the verge of tears, and, with a choke in my voice, I cried out, sinking into a chair, and holding up my hands deprecatingly:

"Don't say another word! You will set me wild. If you will not tell me where to find Nellie," I went on, in desperation, "will you please tell her this? I have been a bad, wicked girl, and—and—and—there is no such person as Ned Clayborn. It started in fun, and—and—and—please let me go to her. She will understand me so much better than you can explain it."

"No such person as Ned Clayborn! My dear young lady, I must beg leave to differ with you. That is the name of the young man who, in three short weeks, is to marry Miss Merton. Surely he is not dead?" he added in consternation.

"Oh, will you not understand? It was all a joke at first. I thought it would be great fun, and so I—well, I am Ned Clayborn, and after a time we became engaged—all in fun, too" (here I laughed hysterically); "I tried to stop, but I was so wicked I could not, and now poor Nellie will break her heart, and—and—and——" and I broke down and began to cry in a miserable way.

Unlike most men, my companion was not in the least disconcerted at the sight of my tears, but simply laughed, loud and long.

Presently the laughter ceased; then I heard uneasy movements in the chair occupied by my companion; then he got up and paced about restlessly. Pretty soon a light touch fell upon my arm, and his voice, very gentle and kind, said: "Nellie is here to receive your confession and forgiveness." I dried my eyes and looked up, but saw no one but the tall young man, who was looking at me very earnestly.

"Where is she?" I asked, ready to cry again.

"Here," he said, holding out his hand. Instinctively I put mine into it, and it closed over it firmly.

"I also have a confession to make," he said earnestly. "I thought you were another young fellow like myself, and, wishing to relieve the tedium of these long, monotonous days, struck up a flirtation. I intended some day to meet the young man and have it out with him, when you came with your strange confession. In short," he ended abruptly, "I am Nellie Merton. And you are Ned Clayborn? Come, dry your eyes, Ned; your Nellie is not heartbroken at the turn of affairs."

After staring at him in silent amazement for the space of five seconds, the truth of the whole matter began to dawn upon my confused brain. My face grew hot with indignation. I snatched my hand from his and sprang to my feet.

"You are a contemptible fellow!" I cried. He did not reply, but stood looking down at me from his superior height.

"It was a hundred times meaner in you, because your object was a woman. I will never forgive you, if I live to be a thousand."

"Isn't that rather paradoxical, considering the fact that you thought I was a woman, and you were enacting the rôle of the sterner sex?" he asked.

Digitized by Google

"You might have known," I answered severely.

"But I did not," he said.

"Here is my train," I said shortly.

"Good-bye," he replied, assisting me on to the train, despite my independence, and lifting his hat as it pulled out.

I travelled back to "B" a sadder but a wiser woman.

"You are a fool," said I to reflection in the little mirror as I removed my hat.

A year rolled by. I had entirely recovered from my chagrin, and buried in the darkest chamber of my memory was every thought of the tall young operator at "D Station."

One morning I was arranging and copying some night-messages, when a long shadow fell across my papers. A glance upward told me who it was. The door of that secret and darkened chamber of my memory flew open, and I knew that the tall young man at "D Station" was not as yet quite consigned to oblivion. Standing with hat in hand, and without any preface of any kind, he said:

"Over a year ago you asked me to marry you, and I consented. I have come to-day to ask, Will you come? Or shall I enter suit for breach of promise?"

What could I do? And, after all, perhaps he would not have made me a better husband had I met him in the old, conventional way, and waited for him to propose to me.

A SAILOR OF THE "SARACEN."

My life as a cabin boy on board of the Saracen was a hard one. The Saracen was a fine steam-packet of the early days, which carried the mail between Liverpool and New York. She took first and second cabin passengers, emigrants, and a general cargo. It was my first experience as a sailor, and I confess that it did not come up to my expectations. A sailor's life had figured in my imagination as one of the greatest independence.

I found it more like slavery than anything else. Every one seemed to take the greatest pleasure in abusing me and making my life miserable generally. I was kicked and ordered about from morning until night. Every menial service that could be thought of I was made to do. I was thoroughly disheartened and discouraged before many days, for there was not one person in the whole ship who gave me a kind word or look. My greatest tormentor was the second mate, a man named Douglas. He was a good sailor, but by nature he was a brute and a bully.

One of the crew was a man named Savage, who was a big, broad, powerful fellow, with an honest, upright face that attracted everybody who met him. Somehow he took a fancy to me, and, after that, nobody but the second mate ever abused me, and by dint of caution I managed to avoid him very successfully.

We had an ordinary, uneventful passage until we arrived off the Grand Banks, where we ran into a dense fog, and the weather became colder. The fog was so thick that it seemed as though we were sailing in the clouds, and the moisture dropped from aloft like rain. Every noise had an uncanny sound, and the whistle, which was blown frequently, as a warning of our approach, sounded as though it came from half-a-dozen different places at once.

A restless and oppressive feeling seemed to fill the air, and the passengers and crew paced silently up and down the decks, pausing every now and then, as if they had heard some strange sound. They seldom spoke to each other, and when they did it was always in whispers, and with cautious glances over their shoulders. Why we should have been so affected is more than I can explain.

I was standing on deck, and Savage was passing me, when he stopped and said, "I think there are bergs around. Don't you feel it getting colder?"

I had felt it, and was asking him questions about bergs, when the look-outs both cried, "Starboard, sir! Ice ahead!"

Before the ship could answer her helm, I saw an immense shape of white, towering high above us, and the next minute we crashed into a solid mass of ice, which looked like a mountain. The shock was terrific, and dislodged a huge fragment, which fell, crashing through our decks, and we heard the rush of the water, as the vessel began to fill and sink with incredible rapidity.

As soon as they could collect themselves, everyone rushed to the boats. Savage and I managed to crowd into the second cutter. She was soon lowered away, and we shoved off, and lay to a little distance from the ship. We were packed so tightly that it was next to impossible to even turn round, and the gunwales were barely awash. I found that Mr. Douglas had charge of the boat, and my heart sank with fear.

We saw two other boats get away before the Saracen, throwing her stern high into the air, and amidst a great rush of water, sank from our sight. One of the other boats was caught in the vortex and swamped, throwing the occupants into the water. The suction drew our boat in amongst them. Those who could grasped our gunwales, and endeavoured to climb aboard; but Mr. Douglas drove them back with blows from the tiller, and, cursing us for our clumsiness, bade us get out the oars.

The boat was so greatly crowded that this was difficult to accomplish, but after a good deal of trouble we managed to ship them, and had already taken a stroke when the gunwale was grasped by a woman holding a child in her arms. Mr. Douglas, with an oath, hit her with the tiller, but although she groaned from the pain she still hung on with a grip like death. He raised the tiller to hit her again, when Savage stood up from his oar, saying, "Hold on, sir; she can have my place," and without another word he slid overboard, and had shoved the woman in among us before we had recovered from our astonishment.

As he swam away I called to him to come back, but he only turned and waved his hand, and while we were gazing after him he disappeared in the fog.

The sea remained calm, and the next morning we were picked up by the bark Mohasset, and landed in Philadelphia.

Savage was never heard of again. He must have perished, but he died a hero, and, like many others who have performed the noblest deeds that man can do, he is utterly unknown.

In the next issue of Short Stories a thrilling serial story entitled "The Outlaws of the Air," by George Griffith, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," and "The Syren of the Skies," will be commenced. Many novel features will be introduced, and the story will be profusely illustrated by E. S. Hope.

Digitized by Google

A RACE FOR LIFE.

In some countries—even in many of the Southern States of America—convicted criminals are not kept confined in prisons, but are either employed on public works or "farmed out" to contractors, who employ them in digging canals, building railways, or other such enterprises requiring manual labour.

The system has certain advantages and many disadvantages. There is always a likelihood that the prisoners will escape in spite of the vigilance of guards who have constantly to watch them while at their work.

In conversation with a veteran engine-driver a few days since, on the various perils to which an engine-driver's life is exposed, he related a thrilling incident of his stay on the other side of the Atlantic a few years ago, which I will attempt to reproduce.

"The most dangerous run I ever made was down the Blue Ridge, where the railway crosses the mountain at a grade of 1 in 26. Throughout the long ascent up the Ridge it winds about the mountain sides in spiral curves, often quite sharp, and actually in one place passes the same point three times at different elevations as it works upwards.

"Near the top is the famous 'mud-cutting,' which has so puzzled all the railway engineers. Soft mud is being continually forced up by the pressure of the strata on each side, so that a 'ballast train' and gang of labourers are constantly required to keep the way clear. For this service the company has for some time employed State convicts.

"I was at this time in charge of the 'bank' engine, which assists the train to climb the heavy mountain grade, and on the eventful day I had pushed up the morning mineral train as usual, and gone into a siding to allow the early passenger train to pass on its way to Ashville.

"From this elevated situation a wide view is opened out down the mountains, and already the smoke from the passenger engine could be seen in the distance as it slowly ascended the spiral grades up the side of the main ridge.

"Meanwhile the ballast train, with its gang of men, was still on the main line, and the convicts were busily engaged in throwing the soft mud upon the waggons. The engine-driver had for some cause left his post for a few minutes, when one of the convicts, unobserved by the guards, stealthily withdrew the coupling pin behind the tender. The fireman was near the cylinders, oiling the bearings.

"Seizing his chance, the convict suddenly sprang upon the engine from the opposite side, and before either of the guards realised what was happening he had pulled the throttle valve wide open. In an instant the engine was moving off rapidly under full head of steam.

"The fireman's shout was the first intimation that anything was really wrong. The guards realised it when too late. Bang! bang! went the rifles all round, but the bullets were too tardy for the desperate rogue. He ducked nimbly down behind the tender, and the balls rattled harmlessly against the sides of the engine.

"Had they hit or killed the reckless fugitive the condition of affairs would hardly have been improved, for the locomotive was puffing away and rattling down the mountain side towards the approaching train. Evidently the convict intended to jump off when at a safe distance, and escape during the confusion of the wreck. The heavy ballast-engine would naturally crash into the other train like a cannon-ball.

"The officials and guards stood staring after the receding engine as though paralysed.

"What, indeed, could they do? Then the thought flashed to my mind. Could I give chase with my own engine and catch the runaway?

"It was the only chance to save the passenger train from the horrors of a collision, and, desperate as the chance looked, it must be taken instantly.

"'Open the points!' I shouted, as I threw the lever over.

"As my engine came up, one of the guards scrambled on beside me, and my stoker jumped on as we dashed past.

"In a moment we were out on the main line, and gathering headway under full pressure of steam.

"But the ballast-engine had the start, and was the heavier of the two engines, though mine had higher wheels. On this latter circumstance alone rested my chance of overtaking the ballast-engine, and it seemed a doubtful chance at best. It is a reckless business to give an engine full steam on a down grade. But all depended on the first few minutes, and I bade Henry, my fireman, shovel in coal with all his might.

"In half a minute we were going at thirty miles an hour, which rapidly increased to fifty, then sixty.

"The rocky crags and ledges beside the line flew behind us in streaks, and the trees below seemed blended into a confused patch of green as we were hurried towards them.

"Instinctively I closed the throttle-valve, for no engine could carry steam down such a grade and live. Ahead was a sharp curve. We swayed round it like lightning, and then caught sight of the forward engine, still a long way ahead. But we were gaining—I could see we were lessening the distance. Could we overtake it in time? The passenger train could hardly be more than three or four miles away.

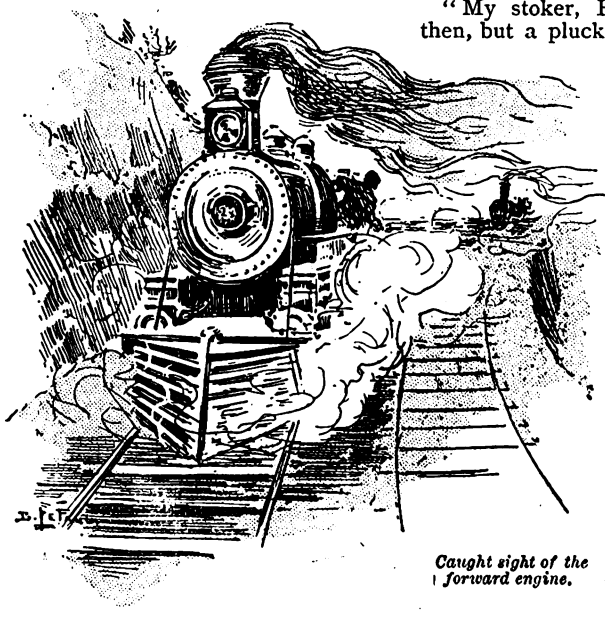
"Catching sight of us bearing down upon him, I saw the convict run out of the tender and look about as if trying to see a smooth spot to jump upon; but the engine had acquired such a terrific speed that he was evidently afraid to leap.

"'Point your rifle at him and call him to stop!' I shouted to the guard; but the guard, terrified at the rate we were running, dropped his carbine on the coal heap, and was crouching and holding on with all his might, the most abject picture of fear I ever saw.

"My stoker, Henry, was a mere slip of a boy then, but a pluckier lad never opened a fire door. Bidding him hold the lever, I caught the rifle, and getting on the tender, pointed the weapon at the scoundrel on the ballast-engine, motioning to him at the same time to reverse the lever. Evidently misunderstanding my meaning, or frightened by the terrific speed, he jumped off the tender the moment he saw the rifle, and was instantly hurled headlong over the ledges—down the steep mountain side. I caught a glimpse of him, whirling head over heels, as we passed by.

"He had left his engine running free, and I now knew that I must myself stop it, if it was to be stopped at all.

"We were gaining upon it but slowly, and I scarcely dared to give my engine more steam. I could not tell how far down the passenger train was. If our high wheels would but keep the track!



Caught sight of the forward engine.

Digitized by Google

"The engine careered from side to side as we darted round the sharp curves. Every moment I expected to feel it plunge into the gorge below, and there was no hope that the low-wheeled ballast-engine would leave the rails. I must catch it, or the passengers would be lost. Several times I opened my whistle, hoping the passenger-engine driver might possibly hear me. The trouble was that owing to the curves the latter could not see us at all, and the rattle and roar of his own train would most probably prevent his hearing.

"'Give it her, Henry!' I shouted, for I knew now that what we did must be done inside another minute and a half; and in my desperation I determined that if there must be a collision, it should be in an effort to overtake the runaway. The locomotive now scarcely touched the rails as she bounded forward under the fresh pressure of steam.

"We were now within thirty yards of the ballast, and we could catch up to it in half a minute more if my engine could keep the rails.

"At this point a rocky cliff rose on one side of the line, and on the other the steep mountain dropped abruptly into a gorge hundreds of feet below.

"Looking down across the ravine, we seemed to be literally flying in mid-air.

"Meanwhile I had run forward ready to leap upon the ballast-engine the instant we came close enough. Then for an instant the runaway disappeared, as both engines plunged into a cloud bank that lay piled against the mountain side.

"For a moment or two nothing was visible. But for the roar of the wheels as they spun along the narrow shelf I should have thought we had jumped from the hill and were plunging down into the valley.

"When, a second later, we emerged from the fog, the tender of the ballast-engine was only a few feet before me. I dared wait no longer. Even now I fancied that I could hear the roar of the passenger train from below. Measuring the distance well with my eye, I stepped back, and straining every muscle for the dangerous leap sprang across the intervening space, caught upon the rear of the tender, hung for a moment, then, with might and main struggled to get aboard it—a feat that could not have been accomplished had not the engines had the same relative speed and motion.

The body of the convict was found on the rocks.

"Truly that was a spring for life! Not for my own life merely, but for many others on the coming train.

"Had the distance been a foot more I should have missed, and been instantly ground to pieces.

"It required but an instant now to scramble hurriedly over the coal, thrust back the lever, reverse, and open the sand boxes.

"Henry had at once done the same for our own engine.

"We had scarcely brought the two to a standstill when, puffing heavily round the next curve below, we saw the engine coming unconsciously on to a certain destruction had we not caught the runaway just as we did.

"It was an easy matter for the up-coming train to stop, and in half a minute more all three engines were moving quietly up hill. Very little was said, and to this day I suppose the passengers do not know why that abrupt halt was made on the mountain side, or how fearfully near they all were to death that forenoon.

"The body of the convict was found on the rocks, several hundred feet below, so mutilated that, but for the striped clothes, no one could have identified it."

THE MINER'S LOVE.

ROWDY! It was no word for it—too genteel by half. We were as wicked a set at our diggings as New South Wales could show—no slight thing. If the world's kettle had been set on the boil we'd have come to the top as prime scum—truth, mate.

But among us was a man dubbed "the squire," because, although he lived and dressed just as we did, there was that in him which stamped him as of a different breed. I never came upon his double before or since, and swells out of luck are plenty in Australia. Rumour went that he was an English baronet, but had been forced to cut and run; so he tried New South Wales and the gold diggings, bent on succeeding.

He did not live alone; his daughter was with him, though how and when she reached him no one knew. They lived in a small shanty in the midst of pines, far apart from the other huts, a queer frame for such a grand picture of a woman—a lady with a superior bearing visible in her father.

I'd walked that way with the squire once, and she ran out to meet him. The sight of her struck me all of a heap, so unexpected in a lonely spot where there was no other company than the birds, no sound but the wind in the trees. She was tall; the colour of wild roses in her cheek; heaven's blue in her eyes. Her dress was dark, and had none of the flashy ornaments that women such as we take up with cram on; her hair, coiled smooth about her head, shone like black satin.

"This is one of my—chums, my dear," said "the squire," with his soft voice and his hard smile.

Since then I had often hung about the log-house after work. I fetched water and sticks, and did such odd jobs as were not fit for her, saying no word; but she found me out in a brace of shakes, and was thankful for such help as I could give, knowing that I meant no harm, though I startled her at first—a great giant of a chap in my rough gear.

Once I came across her watching in the gloaming. How eerie it was under the trees: the wind soughed through the branches, bringing a dash of rain; a deluge was in the black clouds sweeping across the sky.

"I am anxious about my father," she said, and she looked like a tall white lily that had been shoved into the wrong spot, and touching my big, earth-stained fingers with her fine, slim hand, "I am always anxious about him, though, since knowing you I have not felt so absolutely distressed, for I am glad to recollect that you are within his call. You will stand between him and harm, I think."

"Why, yes, miss; make your mind easy on that score; 'twould be done with a will. But what harm is like to come that you need worry yourself?"

"Ned," she cried, stopping suddenly—her father always called me so—"I had such a curious dream last night. I dreamed that I went down into the valley beyond the wood, and there I saw my father lying upon the grass sound asleep —so sound that I could not wake him, while the clusters of wild flowers sprang up so high that they hid him, and I heard the pines in the distance chanting a solemn kind of litany. I was crying when I awoke."

Digitized by Google

"You are too much alone, miss, and grow nervous."

"My father has been very fortunate lately, has he not?" she asked.

"He has had some good finds, miss; and to-day he got hold of two jolly big nuggets."

"I am glad. Will he bring them home this evening? What's that?"

She sprang to the door, flinging it open, the shine of the lamp behind her.

"Dearest father," she cried, "is it you?"

But she broke off, alarm in her voice. "Ned! Ned!" for no father was there, but two of the worst of our lot—scamps for whom hemp was growing; the one a blackguard sailor, the other a smartish, slim chap, thin, dark, lying. His name was Phil Dawlish.

I remembered now, as I saw him by the flash of the light, that he, as well as I, had been near when "the squire" held up the two great nuggets; and it struck me—I'm quick at conclusions—that both scoundrels had not intended to come up to the house, but were just lurking about. What for?

Miss Helen—I only knew her by her Christian name—faced them steadily, though she had called me to her, and asked what they wanted.

"Why, nothin' in special, miss," stammered Dawlish, lifting his ragged straw hat with swell-mob politeness, and a leer that made me tingle to kick him; "only, is the old boss at home? I—I mean your pa, miss," he translated.

"No," she replied, nodding her head high, to show that she was not frightened, but I, being close to her, could hear her heart thudding like a hammer, while the blood flamed to her brows, under the foul gaze roving over her. "Why do you ask?"

"Just this, mum. Will you be so good as to tell him that me and my pal's off to Hulton's Ranch for a short spell, and if he'd like to tramp over—why, 'tis a mighty 'andsome part of the country, and he'd be welcome, that's all."

She shut the door upon them, drawing a stout bar across it.

"Are those the men he works with?" she cried, flinging up her hands. "Heaven help us!"

I was casting about for another job when she stopped me by asking if I would go and meet her father.

"But you——."

"Nay, I do not mind. The little house is secure. Why," with a wistful smile, "I am always alone from daybreak until dark."

I knew it was the fact; so, bidding her open to none until she heard me or "the squire," I started on my errand.

Not very far had I to go, for I met him in that same little ravine of which his daughter had dreamed; it skirted the pine woods. His pick was over his shoulder, his right hand in his pocket—feeling the nuggets, perhaps. He was singing a song in some foreign lingo, Italian or Spanish. He looked more content than I had seen him—more at rest, nodding to me in his patronising fashion.

After a few stray words, I related what had happened, advising him to be on his guard.

"Thanks, I will," he replied haughtily, much amused at the scamps asking him to pay a visit in their company. "But I've a secret to tell you, Ned," he added. "I have done with Green Valley Creek and shaken off its crew. Luck has favoured me beyond my hopes. I can afford to turn my back upon it. I shall take my daughter to Melbourne. I have thought of settling there."

As he spoke the little tie of comradeship between us was shattered; in a moment we were sundered as the poles, so quietly he brushed it away.

No rest was mine that night; evil was in the air. So, as I could not sleep, I got up and went out. Not being a fool, I knew I must keep my misery to myself; but my life was empty!—empty! You see, I was hard hit, mate, like the donkeys. What was Miss Helen to me—could she ever have been to me—a lumbering, vagabond chap, not worthy to kiss the dust she trod on?

But I must go back and watch the house that covered her for this last night, so I returned to the ravine. In it were many little dells swarming with the wild flowers of the grand Australian spring. Now, in one of these same dells what do you think I saw? A dead man's face. Yes, I knew at once that he was dead, but so easily "the squire" rested on the wet moss that the song I had heard him singing might still be on his lips. His pockets, turned lining outward, were empty. Snatching up his pick, I tore on to the log-house, knowing well whom I should find there. My long sharp knife was in my belt. I raced round to the back; the little kitchen door was undone; the friends were in the squire's bed-room, making free with some whiskey which he had kept in a cupboard. Where was Miss Helen?

I found her in the sitting room, tied in her chair, her lips bleeding over her white teeth. The cursed hounds had struck her.

"There are three of them," she whispered, "those two who came and another man. They watched for my father and murdered him—they told me so. Hark! they are coming. Ned, they have pistols, and will shoot you where you stand. Go away this instant—only—kill me first;" and then she lifted her white pillar of a throat.

"Now, my beauty," roared a drunken voice through the thin partition, "we're bringing you a sup o' whiskey to drink our 'ealths in. Ain't you longin' for us to make love to ye? We'll stow away the rhino first, and then—you shall have your turn."

"Be quiet," I whispered back to her, hacking at the cords with my knife, and in a few seconds I had her out of the chair, and we dashed out of the house together.

On and on and on until the last tree was at our backs. Then we made for a lane which led to Johnson's tavern, leaving the yells faint in the distance. There we stopped, and there she told her tale.

News spreads quickly at the diggings, and Judge Lynch is for immediate action. Before noon the stolen gold—including the two big nuggets—had been recovered, and a couple of figures dangled from an oak by the wayside.

As soon as it was possible Miss Helen started for Melbourne, whence she was to sail for England, where she would join her mother's relatives—very heavy swells indeed, I believe. And I followed her in secret every inch of the way, though she knew it not until I stood by her on the deck of the steamer, after I had helped to stow her boxes safely in the hold. Then I blurted out that I hoped she would not be offended at my coming, but——and then I shut up.

"Ned," she cried; "brave Ned! dear, kind, good Ned! There are debts which can never be repaid, and I am your debtor always—always, Ned!" and holding out her hands to me she bowed her head upon my big brown fists and sobbed.

"You are welcome, Miss Helen," I spoke with a quiet voice. "I wish—I could have been a gentleman for just a little while, so that I might have served you better."

"A gentleman!" she cried, lifting her face and looking full at me, and then she raised these hard fists of mine to her soft lips and kissed them. Yes, she kissed them—and I!—how was I to help it!—the touch of those lips broke me down smash. Yet she was not angry—not offended. She put out her little hands to me again, meaning—I knew it—both to silence and comfort me. She did not speak—for what could she have said—what could any stately lady such as she have said? Besides, the steamer's engines were puffing, and time was up. She laid her head down on my arm a moment, and then left me with a rain of pitying tears.

When the vessel had passed completely out of sight, and its long smoke line had died out from the sky, I hurried back to Green Valley Greek, and took up my work again. Hard work is the best friend life has for us, sometimes.

But I have never forgotten Miss Helen—I never shall forget her; and I have trudged to the old spot often and stood before the empty house.

That's my story, old chap; we've each our own, of one sort or another.

Digitized by Google

THE MAN MY SISTER MARRIED.

CHAPTER XX.

KATHERINE was buried at San Antonio, for she had expressed to me once her horror at being carried by rail elsewhere after death. I wrote to grandfather after her death and begged him to let me stay at the Mission longer, unless they needed me at home. He had sent me word that all were well, and wrote long letters, full of kindly criticism.

From Aunt Marg I seldom heard. She never liked writing, and fancied, dear heart, her education had not been thorough enough to express herself well. I speak of this because it explains why I did not suspect the truth.

The little house had grown pleasant to me. I had no horror of its loneliness, nor even of the room where Katherine died. As for the Mission, not one of those priestly men loved it more than I. If I thought of John at all during those days, it was with a feeling of repulsion. I would not have summoned him for the world.

One day, when Katherine had been dead a month, I went up to the roof of the Mission, where I used to hold ghostly communication with my spirit-priest, or thought I did. There was a tiny door at the foot of the tower, then a spiral staircase made of tree-trunks, that will last another hundred years, yet was worn lightly by the passing of those vanished feet; and one could dream of the men who mounted the stair, of the times so troublous, of the days so monotonous, until it was easy to feel that spirits were in the air and all about one.

A little round window led out on the ruined roof of the chapel, and here, on a low wall edging the roof, I used to sit. Above me the belfry tower, the mossy bell, with no duty now of calling to prayers or vespers, to herald the dawning day, or to sound the solemn midnight hour. Over the crumbling walls grasses and flowers grew, and tiny green lizards crawled in the sun; far round me were green fields and forests, the blue and silvery gleam of a river, and the lazy curling smoke in the soft summer air from homes in the cultivated lands.

I saw a stranger come cantering along the road.

A little village of houses had grown up round the Mission, and at the doors were idle Mexican crones, merry children, men smoking and gossiping, and Justina visiting among them, the worst gossip of the lot. In the shadow of the Mission, before the door, watched by those sculptured saints on the façade, some of the Mexicans have buried their dead. I thought it a pathetic and pretty idea, and one old woman has an altar in a room in the Mission, and goes there to pray.

As I sat there on my house-top, I saw a stranger come cantering along the road from town, then disappear in the shadow of the Mission. I had been waiting for a messenger every day, hoping he would come, and each horseman that passed our way set my heart beating wildly, until I saw that he was not the one expected. I heard Justina call, "Chica, are you up there?" and then she must have seen me, for, before I answered, I heard the click of the turret door.

Someone came slowly up the stairs, out of the window to the roof, a tall, slight young man, whom I did not recognise for a moment—James Gregory. I met him with outstretched hand. I had forgiven him that past long ago.

"I've been back to Galveston on business for John," he said awkwardly. "I've always been sorry about that—our past, Letty. Will you forgive me?"

"From my heart," I answered. He sat down by me on the wall.

"I was such a cad once, Letty; I hate myself when I think of it. John is such a fine fellow, so good to mother and to me, and my brother Dean is a scoundrel. I found it out too late."

He went on then to tell me how well he was doing, and, with some shyness, showed me the photograph of the pretty girl he was to marry. He said the home folks were well, and that my grandfather had treated him very civilly. He seemed to dislike being questioned about them, so we talked of other things, and I pointed out the home where Katherine died.

"How could you bear it? There can't be any of the old Letty left in you, living here a year, in the shadow of this old ruin. I feel like taking my hat off to a saint. Don't frown, but you are so different, so pale and sad looking, as though you'd frozen into a calm. You used to be such a lively girl."

"I am still so weary, I don't feel merry, but some day I mean to be as I used to. It's no comfort to people who love you to be always sad."

When he started to go, he stopped by the window, and said nervously, "Haven't you some message for John, Letty? He does not know I came here. It was my idea to see you, and start square in life when I marry. But I tell you few girls are ever loved as he loves you."

I gave him the bunch of violets at my breast.

"Tell him to wait," I said; "only to wait."

I watched him ride away, without regret for the world beyond; I seemed somehow to have lost all interest in life. Two days later, grandfather came, and he saw the change in me the first thing.

"This old place has shadowed you," he said remorsefully; "you're not like a girl ought to be, light-hearted and merry. I don't think shut-in lives as you crack up those priests to hold is ever so wholesome for humanity as outside. It takes more Christianity to travel over the cobble-stones of the life you're born to, and helping your folks; though, of course, as you say, they were noble ones that came here and laboured with Indians."

I took him over all my familiar walks, to the pretty places in the neighbourhood, and all over the Mission, into each mouldy cell, and to the roof. Up there he sat down panting. "Heaven does seem nigher up here," he said; "you wouldn't wish a good soul back from there, would you?"

In that warm summer day, I felt a sudden chill. Something had happened. I noticed grandfather had not looked so neat as formerly, pathetic evidences of want of care were evidenced in his linen, and the buttons of his coat were loose.

"Is Aunt Marg ill?" I asked, trembling. "She used to be so careful of you. You are not the same, and every time I ask you of her you put me off. In my selfishness, I have forgotten her. I stayed here to grieve over my silly self, when I might have been making her happy."

He drew me down to the wall beside him, then holding my hand tight, he said solemnly: "She is happy beyond our making or marring. She died two months ago. Cry on, pretty dear, it will ease your poor little heart. You must not blame me," as I broke into passionate reproaches, "it was her command that you should not be told. She went so suddenly there was no time to send for you; 'heart trouble,' the doctor said, and it was, but not as he thought—a whole life of heart-ache.

Digitized by Google

"She said her work was done when the baby she had saved had grown to a noble womanhood. She was so glad you were caring for Katherine, and doing the best you could to make her repent. She said your sacrifice would be repaid in a happy future. That past, with all its misery, was ended. John could love and be as other men.

"The case was over, Letty. The criminals sentenced and executed, the jury dismissed, and the only witness gone to her last home. Think what she bore, shut out from woman's happiness, a husband's affection, little children to love her, all her life. She, who was so gentle and kind, to be an instrument of death and vengeance.

"Cry on, dear. It's better than those dry, wide eyes, that white, set face. How thin you've grown. Your hand lies like a snow-flake in my brown palm. She wrote you a letter. I'm to give it you a year after her death. She said you must not wish her back; she was so glad to go. I miss her most, Letty—a part of my home, the best and noblest woman, the most unfortunate as ever blessed a man's home, and gave him hope of a hereafter."

Back to my old home on the beach, where the whispering waves seemed at night like the rustle of the trees about my Mission—and, oddly, that word has two meanings now. It was a mission to care for Katherine. I made myself cheerful and gay. I would not let the past trouble me, and someone was needed to make light in the quiet house, to cheer poor lonely Liz, and grandfather, patient and uncomplaining, but grown so old and sad.

I tried to fill her place; my Aunt Margaret's. If I failed, my very efforts cheered them and made my own days brighter. There were little neighbourly kindnesses to do, and so much work for the poor that I realised what a life of ministering and hidden charity hers had been. In her good deeds she lived in many hearts, and all that I could find of her charities, reading by sick beds, helping weary mothers clothe their little ones, I did; and I think her blessing followed me, for people grew to like me—those proud, shy folk, who are so quick to take offence at the best-meant efforts to help.

Justina and I took many walks, but never near the big house, and Bruce, who brought me flowers often, said the folks were all up North.

One night at supper, grandfather complained of my gown. Why didn't I wear white, like I used to, and pretty ribbons. It was no compliment to him, wearing sombre clothes. He

"This place ain't a dispensary, nor a hospital."

I looked up, and there stood John Scott.

supposed I thought he was in his second childhood, too old to notice anyone.

"Don't ye scold the child," put in Liz, bringing in the cakes.

"You talk too much," growled grandfather, and the good soul, who hardly ever speaks now, departed to the kitchen in high dudgeon.

To please him, I went up and put on my best white gown, a soft creamy woollen, with white ribbons, one my Aunt Margaret made for me years ago; and I thought then how much of the beauty and luxury of my life had been due to her.

"That's more promisin'," said grandfather, when I came down in the porch in my finery, and he went and picked me a bunch of his best roses. "I always have roses here, when there isn't one in Galveston," he chuckled.

Just then a shabby, wan-eyed woman came up the walk. Mrs. Smith, one of my pensioners.

"Now look here," said grandfather crossly, "this place isn't a dispensary, nor a hospital, and Miss Vi'let hasn't the time to waste on you; takes half her day now sewing for your family. What did you have so many for, when you knew you might be a widder, and have to go out by the day?"

"Don't mind him," I laughed; "you know he likes to talk."

"Don't I know him?" she said gratefully. "He's got my Danny to the Market, doing so well, and gives us fish often. La, Cap'n Lombard is knowed all over town; but, Miss Vi'let, it's only about a sleeve, the bastin' come out, an' I couldn't fix it, an' my Nell's set her heart on goin' to school. After washin' all day, my hands gits so stiff an' clumsy, I can't do much. Ma says you're one of God's angels, an' how comfortin' them books you read her is, to her that's bin bed-rid fifteen year. Think of her livin' an' Miss Collier gone! Oh, deerie me, it's a queer world!"

I took the little garment into the sitting-room and sat down by the lamp to mend the sleeve. Grandfather, smoking his pipe, looked in at the door.

"An all-night job, isn't it?" he growled.

"Only a few moments. Go to your garden," I said. Mrs. Smith, her shawl dropping off, her bonnet pushed back over her untidy grey hair, watched me with intense interest; she was so eager to learn, and so grateful for the little things I did for her.

"Grandfather, go away," I said crossly, as steps sounded in the porch; setting a sleeve is such bothersome work.

"La, Miss Letty, it's a strange gentleman," cried Mrs.

Digitized by Google

Smith. I looked up and there stood John. I put my hand across my eyes. Was I dreaming? Had he come at last, and must we meet in this queer way? "I—I am glad to see you," I stammered, giving him the hand with the thimble on it; "this is Mrs. Smith."

"I never knowed there was company expected," cried Mrs. Smith. "I kin finish, Miss Letty, it's easy now; the child was so set on it, or I'd never come in this world a worriting ye."

"I have only a few stitches," I said unsteadily. "Please do not go." I felt like clinging to her and begging her to stay. I could almost hear the beating of my heart. He sat down near her, and began to talk to her, remembering her husband, who had been a fisherman, asking her kindly questions, and saying he must get something better for her to do than going out by the day. She, on her part, grew reminiscent, then told him about me with so much praise that my face grew scarlet.

"It's done, Mrs. Smith," I interrupted; "you must not talk about me like that; only half is true. You see I've turned seamstress, Mr. Scott, instead of singer."

"She do sing butuful to mother, though," cried Mrs. Smith, folding the dress, "an' to the Sailor's Bethel, last Sunday, it were like an angel. Mebbe it ain't my business, but I think she's too pale an' sorrowful like, sir, an' a cheering up now an' then would do her good. Livin' 'mongst old folk is wearin'. I don't like to be advising my betters, but mother an' me hes talked it over many a time."

"Mrs. Smith," called grandfather, "here's a basket of things for you; its middlin' heavy. I'll see ye to the gate."

With many blessings she departed, in her worried way, much upset by having intruded. I put my needle and thimble away.

"What an old-maidish Letty," said John, and there was the old merry ring in his voice, "doing good to the widow and orphan; to all but one."

"It's a selfish charity to please children and mothers," I answered; "a little kindness goes a long way. Where can grandfather be?" I finished nervously.

John opened the window and looked out. "He is smoking his pipe at the gate. The widow and her burden are disappearing homeward. How soft the sea is to-night; like far-away music. I am going to live now on my Robinson-Crusoe-like island. I never had any home since I was a boy."

"Your mother will be so happy," I faltered.

"I hope my wife will," he said gently, and I began then to talk of Aunt Margaret's death, and he said he was with her when she died. As he talked, I looked at him shyly. He had grown quite grey, his face thinner, his eyes sad; but now, as he smiled, his face grew bright and young. Then he was silent, both of us thinking of that dear presence—the woman who had given us two such a high and holy love. Then I spoke of Jim's visit, and how changed he was.

"He will make a fairly good man," said John; "Aunt Ann is very happy with him, and quite fond of the bride to be. He gave me your message and some withered violets. Neither dismayed me. I waited. Violet, are your eyes weak that you keep them down? You have not looked at me once."

"I—I did not know that," I stammered; "I was a little upset, the surprise and all." I sat down in a dark corner, where he could not see my blushing face; but he came to me, knelt down, and took me in his arms.

"I have waited, Letty, and now I find you a sensible girl, as you used to be, not a suffering, morbid Letty, weary of the world. I have been at the house two whole weeks watching you. I have smoked a cigar nightly in the garden, under your window, and watched your light go out behind the white curtain.

"Sometimes I've seen you leaning out, watching the stars and thinking, and I have been so jealous of your thoughts. I have been patient. Ah, God, so patient! Give me the real Violet now. Here are the dead ones you sent. I have kept them until now." He flung the withered things across the room. "Come," he said, rising and lifting me to my feet.

"Where?" I cried.

"You did not see my fellow conspirator come down the stairs in that memorable blue coat, or know Liz and our family witch, Justina, have gone this ten minutes to town, or that the carriage is out there. My dear old mother has been tormenting the parson this hour, trying to explain that other wedding ceremony. I took her to the church on my way here."

I pushed him away. "I can't understand," I hesitated.

He took a tiny package from his breast pocket and held it out in his hand; my wedding ring.

"But this old gown," I stammered.

"It's the one you wore when you came to confess to me, years ago. I know that little bow on the left shoulder. Let's be odd and wear our old clothes. If you have not a wedding garment, you shall not be cast into outer darkness, dear."

"I almost fear to be happy again," I whispered.

"Dearest, no more of that dreadful past; forget all, even that grey morning when you went away. Be my little love again. Let me live as other men live, and you as other wives. Have we not suffered enough?"

"John," I cried, clinging to him, "the old Letty has come back. She will be trying and cross, not always good, perhaps, but she loves you so. I was not the dead, calm woman I thought. I only shut my soul in the prison-house for a time."

At the church, John helped me from the carriage and lightly kissed my hair. His mother ran out to welcome me, very tremulous and happy, and grandfather's beaming face seemed almost young again. Justina caught my hand.

"You won't forget poor old Justina," she sobbed.

"John," I said, "I must always love and care for her; she has been so good to me."

"Always, Chica," she smiled, and Justina had to say a dozen prayers to her patron saint at once. The church was dim and dark, only a flickering gas-jet; but I was glad of that, for, honestly, I should have liked a prettier wedding gown. How nervous the minister was, because he remembered that other marriage, I suppose; but I was quite calm.

"No one shall part us now, my wife," said John, when he kissed me, and I had no fear. With such solemnity he thanked my grandfather for saving him that day, when he said "Good night," that I realised how strong was the temptation and how nobly it had been overcome.

The old mansion was all alight, and the servants waited at the door to greet me. "Your home, my daughter," whispered Mrs. Scott, "and oh, how glad, how grateful I am to God its mistress has come at last—my son John's true wife!"

"Come into the rose garden," said John, "it is yours now, while we live. You have come into your own at last."

No more tangled paths or dark, dark ways. I wandered with him in the paradise of those who love and are loved. The flowers nodded an odorous welcome, the fountain tinkled a merry song, far off the sea chimed with the laughter of the rustling trees, overhead the stars twinkled and beamed upon my happiness. All the past faded away. I knew only the golden present. To few on earth are given such joy and love, such tender care and happiness as were given me when I entered that enchanted land, where I shall live till death calls one of us; and even then I know I shall not be waiting long. Not even the grave can separate my love and me!

The End.

Digitized by Google

A PAIR OF OLD SLIPPERS.

(FROM THE PERSIAN.)

THERE was at Bagdad a merchant, very notorious for his avarice, and his name was Abou-Cassem-Tambouri. Although he was enormously rich, his clothes were constantly in rags and tatters; his turban, made of coarse stuff, was so dirty that its colour could no longer be distinguished. Of all his garments, however, his slippers were the most remarkable; the soles were kept together by large clumsy nails, and the upper leathers were pieced in every direction. The famous ship Argo was not made up of a greater number of separate fragments.

During the ten years of their existence as slippers, the cleverest cobblers of Bagdad had exerted their utmost skill to tag together their remains, and had only succeeded by adding piece on piece, by which means they had become so heavy that they had passed into a proverb; and when anyone wished to describe something weighty, the slippers of Cassem were always the object of comparison.

One day, when the merchant was taking a walk in the great bazaar of the city, a proposal was made to him to buy a considerable quantity of glass bottles; he agreed to the offer, because it was an advantageous one; and having heard, a few days afterward, that a perfumer who had fallen into difficulties had nothing left but some rose-water, which he would, of course, be obliged to sell as speedily as possible, Cassem took advantage of the poor man's misfortune, and purchased it at less than half its value, and filled his bottles with it.

This successful stroke of business had put him into good humour, and, instead of giving a great feast, according to the custom of Eastern merchants when they have made an excellent bargain, he thought it better to take a bath, a luxury which he had not enjoyed for a long time.

While he was taking off his clothes, one of his friends, or at least one who pretended to be a friend—for it is a rare thing for a miser to have one—remarked to him that his slippers made him the laughing-stock of the whole city, and that he certainly ought to purchase a new pair.

"I have long thought of doing so," replied Cassem; "but my old ones are not so bad, and will last me for some time yet." While talking, he stripped off his clothes and entered the bath.

At this juncture the Cadi of Bagdad came also to take one. Cassem, having finished his bath before the judge, went into the first apartment, where he found his clothes, but not his slippers, which had disappeared, and in their place was a new pair, which our miser was convinced were a present from the man who had made him such a friendly remonstrance about them.

With that he made no more ado, but put the new pair on his own feet, thus sparing himself the pain of buying new ones, and left the bath overjoyed with his prize.

When the Cadi had finished his bath, his slaves looked about in vain for their master's slippers, and finding only a wretched pair, which were immediately recognised as Cassem's, the police ran after the supposed sharper, and brought him back with the stolen goods upon his feet. The Cadi, after having exchanged the slippers, sent Cassem to prison; and, as he was well known to be rich as well as avaricious, he was not allowed to come out of prison until he had paid a handsome fine.

On returning home, the afflicted Cassem threw his slippers in a rage into the Tigris, which flowed beneath his windows. A few days, after, some fishermen, drawing up a net heavier than usual, found in it Cassem's slippers. The nails with which they had been patched had broken the meshes of the net.

The fishermen, to spite Cassem and his slippers, threw them into his room by the open window, and in their passage they struck the bottles containing the rose-water, and, knocking them down, the bottles were broken, and the water totally lost.

The grief and wrath of Cassem on seeing this may easily be conceived. He cursed his slippers, and, tearing out the hair from his head, vowed that they should cause him no more mischief; and, so saying, he took a spade, and digging a hole in his garden, buried them there.

One of his neighbours, however, who had borne him a grudge for a long time, perceived him turning up the earth, and ran and told the governor that Cassem had dug up a treasure in his garden. This was enough to excite the cupidity of the officer, and he sent forthwith for Cassem. In vain our miser declared that he had not found money, that he was only employed in burying his slippers. The governor had calculated on his bribe, and the afflicted and slipper-haunted Cassem could only regain his liberty by paying down a second large sum.

Our friend, in an extremity of despair, anathematised his slippers, and went and threw them into an aqueduct at some distance from the city, thinking that this time he should hear no more of them. But, the slippers somehow found their way just to the very pipe of the aqueduct, by this means preventing the flowing of the water.

The persons who were responsible for the care of the aqueduct, having gone to ascertain the cause of the stoppage and to remove it, carried Cassem's slippers to the governor of the city, declaring them to be the cause of all the injury. Their unfortunate owner was thrown again into prison, and condemned to pay a larger fine than before.

The governor who had punished the offence, and who pretended to be indebted to no one for anything, returned Cassem's precious slippers to him again most faithfully; and Cassem, in order to free himself from all the evils which they had brought upon him, resolved to burn them. As they were saturated with water, he first of all put them out to dry in the sun on the terrace of his house. But Cassem's evil genius had not yet quite done with his tricks, and the last which he played him was the worst of all.

A neighbour's dog prowling along the terrace on the house-tops, spied out the slippers, and, darting at them, carried off one of them. As, however, the dog was playing with it, and tossing it about, he contrived to let it fall off the terrace on to the head of a woman who happened to be passing below.

The fright and the violence of the blow made the poor woman quite ill; and, her husband having carried his complaint before the Cadi, Cassem was condemned to pay a fine, proportionate to the misfortune of which he had been the cause.

Going home, he took up his slippers, and returned to the Cadi with them in his hands. "My lord," he exclaimed, with a vehemence which excited the judge's laughter; "my lord, look at the fatal cause of all my troubles.

"These slippers have now reduced me to poverty; be pleased now to issue a decree, in order that the misfortunes which they will, no doubt, still continue to occasion may not be imputed to me."

The Cadi could not refuse to comply with this request, and Cassem learned, at great expense, the danger there is in not changing one's slippers often enough.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Six Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

DESPISE NO MESSENGER.

IN a great monarchy no subject can tell what other man may or may not be a messenger from the king. Angels of mercy seldom carry harps and arrive amidst radiant light and a vast flapping of wings. It may be a little child who shall bring you the longed-for good news, or, as in the case of Mrs. Charlotte Davis, it may be a quiet old lady who drops in to make an ordinary friendly call.

And help was badly needed, as it always is when pain and illness crush these frail bodies of ours as the rushes bend and bow before the swollen stream. Referring to the old lady's call Mrs. Davis draws aside the curtain from an experience of the summer of 1878. She says: "I fell into a condition that was strange and new to me. I didn't know how to account for it, nor could I tell what it was going to lead to. I had always a bad taste in the mouth, and was constantly retching and spitting up a sour fluid. The sense and feeling of it were horrible. My appetite failed until food had no attraction for me. Even after taking the least morsel I had great pain at the chest and under the shoulder blades. But the complaint seemed to be seated more particularly in the stomach. There the pain was very keen and violent. Sometimes it felt like a knife cutting me asunder. I got no rest day or night, and was confined to my bed for weeks together. Inasmuch as I could take no solid nourishment I grew weaker and weaker as the weary time dragged by. Indeed my only food was milk and soda water."

[We may remark at this point that Mrs. Davis's entire digestive system was, at the time she speaks of, dangerously deranged. The failure of the appetite was a signal indicating that the presence of food in the stomach could not be tolerated. As it could not be digested it would only serve to aggravate the inflammation which was raging there. Such a state of things is bad as possible. The very source of all power and life was virtually paralysed. We must eat in order to live, and yet—in such a case—to eat is only to invite additional suffering and to bid for a more speedy death. Hence the terror of that ailment, which some silly people (who have never had it) speak of as "only an attack of indigestion and dyspepsia." Would they allude to an inhabited dwelling wrapped in flames as "Only a house on fire"?]

Mrs. Davis, and plenty of others whom we know, are able to rebuke that addlepated sort of talk.

She continues: "The doctor who attended me said I had inflammation, caused by gall stones."

[Very likely. Gall stones are composed of bile sand, which is carried into the gall bladder and then adheres until the larger stones or masses are formed. The bile has stagnated, owing to the poisons from the stomach acting on the liver, until this painful and dangerous complication results. In other words, gall stones mean biliousness, and biliousness means indigestion and dyspepsia.]

But let us listen again to the lady: "I lay in great agony," she says, "week after week, during which time I passed two gall stones. The doctor's treatment gave me no relief, and what I suffered for over a year is indescribable. One day an old lady called at my house, and seeing my condition, strongly urged me to take Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I said, 'Yes, of course, I'll take anything that will help me.' After the first bottle I passed a third stone, but this time without pain. I kept on with the Syrup and was soon as well as ever. Since that time, now fourteen years ago, I have kept in good health and perfectly free from my old ailment. I will answer inquiries from any sufferer. Yours, &c. (Signed) Charlotte Davis, 8, Edithna Street, Stockwell, London, September 27th, 1893."

"The first bringer of unwelcome news," says Shakespeare, "hath but a losing office." Quite true, but the messenger who tells of help and rescue wins a better place in our memory. Does he not? Yes, say all of us.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES

FOR
£1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 ft. frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Price 7s. 6d. for any Size up to 40 inches.

POST FREE U.K.

"MINNOW" LIFE BELT

Trade Mark.

FOR

LADIES, GENTLEMEN, and CHILDREN.

The Belt will support three men with their clothes on, can be inflated in a few seconds, and is so constructed that in the event of accidents the wearer is turned in a floating position, with the face well out of the water. It weighs a few ounces only, can be conveniently carried in the pocket, is made of the strongest material, nothing to get out of order, will bear a pressure of 2 to 300 lbs. and withstand any climate. Parents can with perfect confidence allow their children to bathe without fear of danger. Used by yachting and canoeing clubs, fishermen, and bathers all over the world. Worn as an ordinary belt. State size of waist. Cash to accompany all orders. Cheques and P.O.'s to be crossed "Bank of Liverpool."

The following, one of the many Testimonials received, speaks for itself:—

New Brighton Sailing Club, June 13, 1894.

Dear Sir,—It may interest you to know that we had practical illustration of the efficacy of your "Minnow" Life Belts last evening. We were struck by a heavy squall and upset whilst racing, but having, in accordance with our club rules, life belts on, in this case of your make, we suffered nothing but a little inconvenience, such as naturally arises from getting wet, and this even was partial, as your belts floated us so high, that, we were practically dry from a little above the waist up.

Yours truly, J. F. JELLICO, "Dever," N.B.S.C.

ADDRESS ORDERS TO

W. R. HARGREAVES, Waterloo, near Liverpool.

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I.O.F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 9 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; £600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW.

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL—"THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR"
(By the Author of "The Angel of the Revolution.")

SHORT STORIES

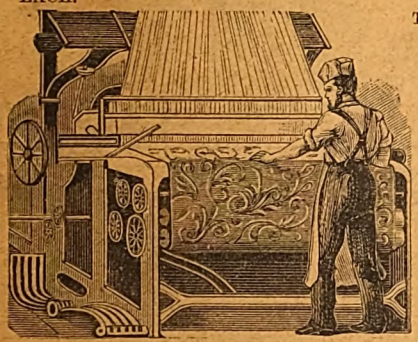
EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 297.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 8, 1894. [Price One Penny.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS

4/- EACH. LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. 4/- EACH.



THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of SHORT STORIES only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 Stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY SIZED ROOM. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.

GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says "Unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our customers.

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.

M. Lock writes:—"I received the Carpets. Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.

Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this Paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. HARGREAVES.

ESTABLISHED 1872.

Address—The British Carpet Weaving Company,
31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH AND LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.
MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.
Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each,
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.
Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S Strengthening SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from
THE INFANTINA COMPANY,
London, S.W.

BEETHAM'S WORLD FAMED CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,
M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists,
CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

PALACE STEAMERS.—SEASON CLOSES END of SEPTEMBER or BEGINNING of OCTOBER. Weather and other circumstances permitting.

LA MARGUERITE. FASTEST STEAMER in the WORLD. (Gr. Tonnage, 2,204.)

BOULOGNE and BACK DAILY (Tuesdays excepted), for 10s. 6d. (3rd. rail and fore cabin); 3rd. rail and saloon, 12s. 6d.

Returns available three days, or for season for 2s. excess.

PARIS AND BACK, SATURDAY to MONDAY, for 21s.

Other Days, 26s. return. Return Tickets available third day of issue. Special Train when the numbers warrant it.

MARGATE and BACK, DAILY (Tuesdays excepted).

SIX HOURS ASHORE AT MARGATE for 5s. 6d. by LA MARGUERITE.

From Fenchurch-street Station for Tilbury, weekdays, 8.33 and 8.38; and Sundays, 8.45 and 8.55 a.m.

All passengers disembark at Tilbury on return journey, and travel by train to Fenchurch Street, arriving about 9.50 p.m.

Passengers may obtain tickets beforehand for rail and boat at 33, King William-Street.

Cook's Hotel Coupon Tickets for all places.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN DAILY, at 9.30 a.m. (except Fridays, on which day LA MARGUERITE will run as usual from Tilbury) (but Royal Sovereign will run for Captain Fishenden's Benefit Next Friday), from OLD SWAN PIER (London Bridge), calling at S. Woolwich and Tilbury. Train Fenchurch-street Station 10.28 a.m. in connection. Tender steamer Greenwich 9.25, Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Margate Passengers can return by La Marguerite, but if they hold London Bridge tickets they must exchange same at Purser's Office on ship for rail tickets, and pay 6d., third-class train.

CAPTAIN FISHENDEN'S BENEFIT, FRIDAY NEXT.

MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back, by ROYAL SOVEREIGN, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.30 a.m., Greenwich, 10.0 a.m., Blackwall, 10.15 a.m., Woolwich, 10.30 a.m., Tilbury, about 11.30 a.m. Returning from Ramsgate at 4.0 p.m., Margate, 5.0 p.m. Margate passengers have about three hours ashore. Return fares: From London, 5s.; from Tilbury, 4s. Tickets on board, Company's offices, and piers.

GLEN ROSA will leave RAMSGATE at 11.0 a.m. NEXT SATURDAY for Margate, Tilbury, Woolwich, Blackwall, Greenwich, and London.

YARMOUTH and LOWESTOFT by Palace Steamer VICTORIA, from Harwich DAILY (Fridays excepted), at 3.0 p.m., in connection with the Koh-i-Noor, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.10 a.m. Return tickets available for season except as above.

Offices—33, KING WILLIAM STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

VICTORIA STEAMERS.—SEASON CLOSES END of SEPTEMBER or BEGINNING of OCTOBER. Weather and other circumstances permitting.

CLACTON, HARWICH, and BACK in the Day. YARMOUTH, Lowestoft, Ipswich, and Felixstowe. DAILY (Fridays excepted), when the Lord of the Isles will run to Clacton, by KOH-I-NOOR, from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at Woolwich (South) and Tilbury. Tender Steamer from Greenwich 9.25, and Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Special Train from Fenchurch-street Station at 9.45 and 10.15 a.m., to meet the Koh-i-Noor at Tilbury.

SALOON STEAMER LORD OF THE ISLES, from OLD SWAN, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich. MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and THURSDAYS, for ROSHERVILLE, GRAVESEND, SOUTHEND, and SHEERNESS, at 11 a.m. FRIDAYS, CLACTON, SOUTHEND, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 9.10 a.m.

SATURDAYS, HUSBANDS' BOAT to MARGATE, and BACK, at 1.30 p.m. Train, Fenchurch-street Station 2.54 p.m., in connection.

SUNDAYS, ROUND NORE LIGHT, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 2.45 p.m.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND DAILY (Fridays excepted) by MERMAID, 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m., from OLD SWAN PIER, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and Woolwich

HAMPTON COURT, RICHMOND, or KINGSTON, from OLD SWAN PIER at 10.0 a.m. DAILY by CARDINAL WOLSEY, calling at all piers.

KEW GARDENS, GREENWICH and BATTERSEA PARKS frequently.

Cheap Through Tickets to and from Stations on District Railway.

Offices—VICTORIA HOUSE, LAURENCE POUNTNEY LANE, E.C.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

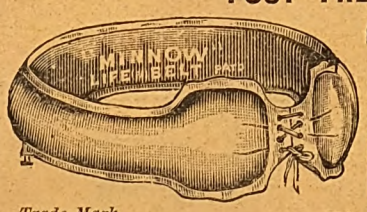
Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

Price 7s. 6d. for any Size up to 40 inches.

POST FREE U.K.



"MINNOW" LIFE BELT

Trade Mark.

FOR

LADIES, GENTLEMEN, and CHILDREN.

The Belt will support three men with their clothes on, can be inflated in a few seconds, and is so constructed that in the event of accidents the wearer is turned in a floating position, with the face well out of the water. It weighs a few ounces only, can be conveniently carried in the pocket, is made of the strongest material, nothing to get out of order, will bear a pressure of 2 to 300 lbs. and withstand any climate. Parents can with perfect confidence allow their children to bathe without fear of danger. Used by yachting and canoeing clubs, fishermen, and bathers all over the world. Worn as an ordinary belt. State size of waist. Cash to accompany all orders. Cheques and P.O.'s to be crossed "Bank of Liverpool."

The following, one of the many Testimonials received, speaks for itself:—

New Brighton Sailing Club, June 13, 1894.

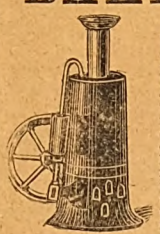
Dear Sir,—It may interest you to know that we had practical illustration of the efficacy of your "Minnow" Life Belts last evening. We were struck by a heavy squall and upset whilst racing, but having, in accordance with our club rules, life belts on, in this case of your make, we suffered nothing but a little inconvenience, such as naturally arises from getting wet, and this even was partial, as your belts floated us so high, that, we were practically dry from a little above the waist up.

Yours truly, J. F. JELLICO, "Dever," N.B.S.C.

ADDRESS ORDERS TO

W. R. HARGREAVES, Waterloo, near Liverpool.

BAKER'S NOVELTIES.



THE NEW "ECLIPSE" MODEL STEAM ENGINE.—The rage of the Season. These wonderful Engines work with a real oscillating cylinder (which if purchased by itself cost 1s.), strong metal boiler, funnel, large fly wheel, with pulley wheel attached for working other models, furnace, and filler complete. Carriage free 1s. 6d. Smaller size 1s.

Don't miss this grand opportunity.

THE MARVELLOUS "CHAMPION" SLIDE VALVE STEAM ENGINE.—As is no doubt well known, a slide valve cylinder is the most expensive kind made, and in fact our lowest for a slide valve cylinder itself is 7s., yet we now offer a large substantial Engine with powerful boiler, stand, furnace, fly wheel, pulley wheel, governors, metal supports, and slide valve cylinder, complete, 8s. 6d., with whistle, water tap, steam tap, very superior, 10s. 6d. These engines are sufficiently powerful to work all the models sold by us.

THE EXPRESS STEAM LOCOMOTIVE.—A beautifully japanned locomotive, with all brass fittings, dome, whistle, safety valve, starting lever, 6 wheels (all flanged), and two powerful cylinders. Only 10s. 6d., free 11s.

THE "IXION" LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE.—A splendid locomotive engine on four wheels with funnel, safety valve, dome handrails, starting lever, two powerful cylinders with furnace complete. The cheapest locomotive out. 5s., free 5s. 6d., or with whistle 5s. 6d., free 6s. Without name plate 4s. 6d., free 5s.

THE ECLIPSE ELECTRIC COIL.—We are offering the most wonderful value in Electric Coils for this Season, as special leading lines. Each one guaranteed to work, and to administer good strong shocks. No. 1 Coil is finished complete, and mounted on stand with handles and connecting wires. Price 1s., post free 1s. 3d. No. 2 Coil is a larger and more powerful ditto, better finished, and furnished with brass terminals, and is a very superior article, 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d. No. 3 Coil is equal to many charged 10s. 6d. for. This Coil has a regulating handle for increasing or decreasing the strength as required, and is fit for any Drawing Room, Bazaar, Lecture Hall, &c. Price 5s. 6d. post free 6s. No. 4, very handsome large Coil, with reversing motion, 10s. 6d. Any ordinary Bichromate Batteries will work these Coils, and as most people have batteries now-a-days, no further expense is incurred, but if needful, we supply a strong Bichromate Battery suitable for working No. 1 and 2 Coils for 1s. 3d., post free; or a larger ditto for the 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d. Coil, for 2s., post free 2s. 4½d. We now give a small Battery free with every Coil sold.

THE ELECTRICAL DANCING NIGGER.—A great curiosity and a wonderful working model. The climax of electrical ingenuity and skill. By means of a powerful Electro Motor and Battery the Nigger will dance on the platform for half-an-hour at a time. A capital window attraction. Nigger, Motor, Battery, Platform, Connecting Wires, and everything complete. Price 3s. 6d., carriage free 3s. 10d.

ELECTRIC MOTORS for working Models, Machinery, &c.—All guaranteed to work, and splendid value for money. A beautiful little Motor on stand complete, only 1s., free 1s. 3d. No. 2 size much larger ditto, better finished and more powerful, with fittings, 2s. 6d., free 2s. 9d. No. 3 size, a really superior and very powerful motor, on polished stand, with brass wheel, brass terminals, and fittings, 5s. 6d., free 6s. Any bichromate battery will work these, or we supply battery for Nos. 1 and 2 Motors for 1s., free 1s. 3d.; and a powerful ditto for No. 3 for 2s., free 2s. 4½d.

Grand Illustrated Novelty Catalogue, 64 pp., 1,000 Illustrations. 1d. stamp.

BAKER & COMPANY, 34, Beech Street, Barbican, London, E.C.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement partment, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 297.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 8, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

PROLOGUE.

IN THE CAMP OF ISHMAEL.

A FEW minutes before one a.m. on Sunday, the 1st of July, 1894, a man was walking with quick if somewhat irregular strides, as some men do walk when deeply absorbed in thought, up the Caledonian Road from King's Cross Station. By his dress he might either have belonged to the aristocracy of the craftsman class, or he might have been one of the poorer members of that class which is popularly considered to be above it.

But, whatever doubt there might have been as to his station in life, there could have been none as to the character of the face on which his slightly back-tilted black felt hat allowed the light of the gas lamps to fall as he walked with his thumbs in his waistcoat pockets, and his head thrown back just a shade from the perpendicular. It was a dark, clear-cut, clean-shaven face, with bright blue eyes contrasting strongly with the black straight brows above them; a slightly aquiline nose with thin sensitive nostrils; short upper lip, firm resolute mouth, square chin, and strong though not heavy lower jaw.

A single glance would have been enough to show that it was the face of a man in whom strong convictions were united with the will and the courage to translate them into action, no matter what difficulties or dangers might lie in the path marked out for him by what he considered to be his duty.

In stature, he was over the average, and but for a slight stoop of the shoulders which gave a suggestion of the student, borne out by the broad square forehead and two little perpendicular lines between the eyes, he would have stood very nearly six feet in the low-heeled walking shoes which he wore.

To the casual glance of the passer-by, there was nothing to differentiate him from any other young fellow of his apparent age and station; and, therefore, it was quite out of the question that the policeman who was beginning his night's work by flashing his bull's-eye into doorways, and trying door handles and shop shutters, should bestow more than a passing glance, quite devoid of interest, upon him as he strode by. He was sober and respectable, and seemingly making his way quietly home after a decently spent Saturday evening.

There was nothing to tell the guardian of the peace that the most dangerous man in Europe was passing within a few feet of him, or that if only he could have arrested him on some valid pretext that would have enabled him to lock him up for the rest of the night, and then hand him over to the Criminal Investigation Department at New Scotland Yard—the officers of which had been hunting for just such a man as he for the last twelve months—he would have prevented the commission of a crime which, within twenty-four hours, was to plunge a whole nation into panic and mourning and send a thrill of horror through Europe.

But he would have done far more than this, for by laying Max Renault, electrician and anarchist, by the heels just at that moment, he would have ensured the discovery of documentary evidence which would have procured his extradition to France, and subsequent proceedings which would have saved the world from a

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

The most dangerous man in Europe.

reign of terror and an epoch of carnage and destruction in comparison with which the worst that society had so far learnt to fear from anarchy would prove to be the merest trifle.

But how was that most unimaginative and matter-of-fact of mortals, a British policeman, to know that in his waistcoat pocket he carried a foreign telegram which, properly interpreted, conveyed the intelligence that Caserio Santo was on his way to Lyons to await there the order in obedience to which he would with one stroke of his knife send a shudder through the civilised world; or how was he to divine that in the brain behind that open honest-looking brow, there were thoughts working which ere long might set the world in a blaze?

In St. Petersburg, or even in Paris, such a man would have been shadowed, his every movement would have been watched, all his comings and goings noticed, and at any moment—such a one as this, for instance—he might have been pounced upon and searched as a suspicious person, and assuredly, if he had been, the toils of the law would have closed about him in such fashion that little but a miracle could have set him free again.

But here in London, the asylum of anarchy and the focus of the most dangerous forces in the world, he went on his way unquestioned and unsuspected, for, although the police were morally certain that such a man existed, they had no idea as to his personality, no notion that this smart, good-looking young fellow, whose name had never been heard in connection even with such anarchist clubs as were known to have their quarters in London, and much less, therefore, with any of the crimes that had been laid to the charge of anarchy, was in reality even a greater criminal than Vaillant or Henry, or even the infamous Ravachol himself.

These were only the blind if willing tools, the instruments of political murder, the visible hands that obeyed the unseen brain, those who did the work and paid the penalty. But Max Renault was the brain itself, the intellect which conceived the plans for the execution of which the meaner and cheaper disciples of the sanguinary brotherhood of the knife and the bomb died on the scaffold or wore out their lives in penal prisons or the mines of Siberia.

In a word, he was the moving spirit and directing intellect of what was soon to become the most dreaded body of men and women in the world, but which was now only known to the initiated as "Autonomie Group Number 7."

But the stroke which, if his true character had been known, would have cut short his career, whether by rope or axe, would have done more than paralyse the brain which had plotted half the crimes that had been committed in the name of anarchy during the previous five years, and others in which the red hand had never been seen. It would have stopped his career at the most important moment of his life, and prevented him acting as the connecting link between two sets of circumstances which, though naturally of the utmost antagonism to each other, would, when united in such a personality as his, produce an explosion which might shake the world.

A few hundred yards past the top of the hill, Max turned sharply to the left, walked along a side street, turned to the right at the end of this, and went into another. Three minutes' quick walking brought him to the side door of a house which had a small timber yard on one side of it, and on the other a deserted beer-house, which had lost its license, and remained unoccupied because the premises were fit for no other kind of business.

The house itself had a low shop front, with the lower half of its windows painted a dull green, and on the upper part was an arc of white letters making the legend: "Social Club and Eclectic Institute." A lamp over the shop door bore the same inscription in white letters on blue glass, but the lamp was out now, for it was one of the rules of the club that all members should leave the premises not later than twelve o'clock at night on week-days and half-past eleven on Sundays.

This rule, however, seemed only to apply to a certain section of the members. After Max had opened the side door with his latch-key and ascended the stairs at the end of the passage, with a familiarity that enabled him to dispense with a light in the absolute darkness, he knocked at the door of an upstairs room which he found without the slightest hesitation. It was opened, and he found himself in the presence of four men and three women sitting round a table on which were the remains of what had evidently been a substantial and even luxurious supper.

Renault's action on entering the room was one which more than bore out what has been said of his character and the desperate work that he was engaged in. He acknowledged with a brief curt nod the salutations of the company, and then, putting his back against the door, he pulled his right hand out of his trouser pocket, and said, in a quiet almost well-bred voice which had just the faintest trace of a foreign accent:

"Victor Berthauld, sit still!"

There was a small slender-barreled six-chambered Colt in

His body shrank together and collapsed in a huddled heap.

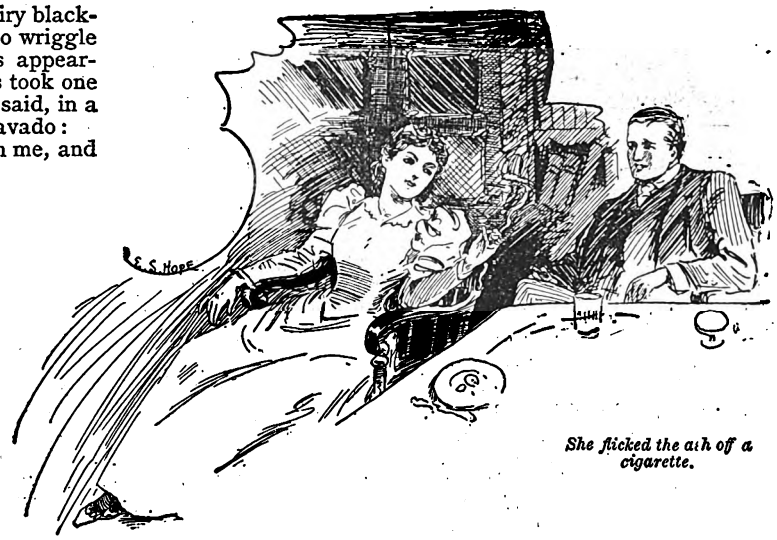
Digitized by Google

his hand, and the muzzle was pointed at a little lean wiry black-muzzled close-cropped Frenchman who had begun to wriggle uneasily in his seat the moment Max had made his appearance. His black eyes rolling in their deep sockets took one frightened glance from face to face, and then he said, in a voice to which he in vain tried to impart a tone of bravado:

"Well, Comrade Renault, what do you want with me, and what is that revolver drawn for?"

"Don't 'comrade' me, you little rat," said Max with a short savage laugh. "Tell me who tried to warn the Paris police that Carnot's life was in danger. Tell me who would have had Santo arrested at Marseilles if his telegram had only got into the hands it was intended for.

"Tell me who means to repeat the message to-morrow morning to Paris and Lyons, and who means to have this place raided by the English police at an inconvenient hour within the next week on the ground of unlawful gambling being permitted here. Tell me that, you dirty hound, and then I'll tell you, if you don't know, what we usually do with traitors."



She flicked the ash off a cigarette.

Berthauld sat for a moment speechless with fear. Then, with an imprecation on his lips, he leapt to his feet. Not a hand was moved to restrain him, but as he rose to his full height, Renault's arm straightened out, there was a crack and a flash, and a little puff of plaster reduced to dust, leapt out of the angle of the wall behind him; but before the bullet struck the wall it had passed through his forehead and out at the back of his head, his body shrank together and collapsed in a huddled heap in his chair, and Max, putting his pistol back into his pocket, said, just as quietly as before:

"It's a curious thing that even among eight of us we must have a traitor. I hope there aren't any more about. Take that thing down to the cellar, and then let us get to business; I've something important to tell you."

So saying, he walked round the table to a vacant arm-chair that stood at the end opposite the door, threw himself back in it, took out a cigar and lit it, and, with the same unshaken hand that a moment before had taken a fellow-creature's life, poured out a tumbler full of champagne from a bottle that stood half-empty beside him.

Meanwhile two of the men had risen from their seats. One of them tied a red handkerchief tightly round the dead man's skull, to stop what little bleeding there was from the two clean-cut wounds, and then the two picked him up, and without a word carried him out of the room.

"I hope I haven't shocked you by such a rough-and-ready administration of justice," said Max, half turning in his chair and addressing a girl who sat next to him on his right hand.

"No," said the girl. "It was obviously necessary. If half you charged him with is true he ought to have been crucified, let alone shot. I can't think what such vermin are made for."

And as she spoke she flicked the ash off a cigarette that she held between her fingers, put it between as dainty a pair of lips as ever were made for kissing, and sent a delicate little blue wreathing cloud up to mingle with the haze that filled the upper part of the room.

"And now, what is this interesting something that you have got to tell us, Monsieur Max?"

"All in good time, Ma'm'selle. I must ask you to wait until Casano and Rolland have come back; but meanwhile I will whet your curiosity by telling you I am thinking seriously of exiling myself for a couple of years or so."

As he said this he looked keenly from under his half lowered eyelashes into the girl's eyes, as if expecting or, perhaps, only half hoping for some sign of emotion.

Two dark fringed lids lifted suddenly for an instant, and then dropped again, and in that instant two liquid deep grey eyes, which before now he had seen grow almost black with passion, looked at him inquiringly. And that was all.

"That is news indeed," she said. "It must be something very important that takes Monsieur Max away from the scene of action at such a critical time as this."

"Yes," said Renault coldly, and with an almost imperceptible contraction of his brows, "it is important; so important, in fact, that I don't think I am exaggerating when I say that if I had not come back to-night, instead of to-morrow, and had given that fellow twelve hours more grace, the fate of the whole world would have been changed."

"What! The fate of the world!" said she half incredulously, while the others ceased their conversation and turned to listen to this strange passage of words.

"Yes," said Max, slightly raising his tone till it had a note of triumph in it, and at the same time bringing his hand down on hers, which was resting on the arm of her chair. The quick blood came to her cheeks and a flash of anger to her eyes, and she made an effort to withdraw it, but he held it fast, and, before she could speak, went on.

"Yes, Lea, if the venture that I am going to undertake turns out a success, I shall hold the fate of human society in my hand, just as I hold this pretty little hand of yours, only in a somewhat rougher grip, and then——."

"And then, Monsieur Max," interrupted the girl, snatching her hand away as the pressure of his relaxed for a moment. "I suppose you will have what you have not got now, the right to take what you want by the universal law of might."

"Yes," he said with another laugh, a somewhat more pleasant one this time. "And as I have the power so will I use it, whether in love or war. Are you agreed?"

Lea looked at him steadily for a moment, and then, with a swift flush overspreading as fair a face as ever man's eyes looked upon with love and longing, said in a low voice that had just a perceptible tremour in it:

"Yes, I suppose might is right after all, in love as well as war and nineteenth century society. He who can take can have; but, if you please, we will wait until you can take."

"Agreed!" he said. "That's a bargain—and now we'll get to business. Have you found Comrade Berthauld a quiet resting place?" he continued, addressing the two men who had just returned to the room.

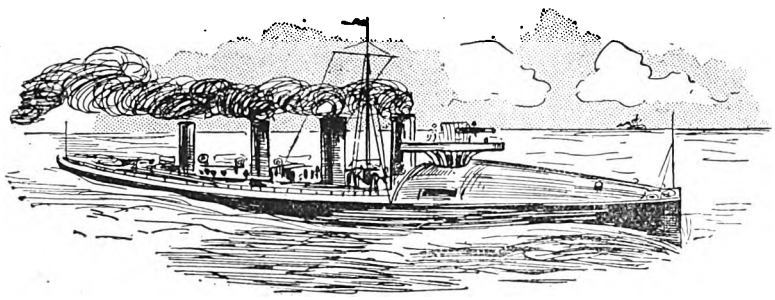
"Yes," said Casano in his pleasant Italian tenor. "Ve haf gifen him a bath. I don't sink zere vill be very mooch left of him or his clothes by ze morning."

"Very well," said Max, taking some papers out of the breast pocket of his jacket. "Now sit down and listen."

They obeyed in silence, Casano first bolting the door.

"First," said Max, looking up from his papers and giving a quick glance at the expectant faces round the table, "Comrade Caserio Santo of the Cette Group has been chosen by lot to execute the sentence passed by this Group on the 6th of February on Sadi Carnot in return for the lives which he refused to spare. Santo will be at Lyons soon after daybreak. If that rat Berthauld had got out of this room alive, Santo would have been arrested and Carnot would have escaped. I have the proofs of his treachery here if you wish to see them. As it is, is it agreed that I shall direct him to offer our congratulations to M. le President on his visit to Lyons?"

Digitized by Google



That gun-boat of yours.

He stopped and looked round the table again. The others nodded in silence, but Lea looked up with something like softness in her eyes, and said:

"What a pity! Poor Carnot is an excellent fellow in his bourgeois way, isn't he? Quite a model husband and father, incorruptible in politics and all that sort of thing. Wouldn't someone else do as well, say, Casimir-Pèrier or Dupuy? Incorruptible politicians are not so plentiful in France just now."

"The better the man the better the effect," said Max drily. "It is just as easy to strike high as a little lower. There are plenty of politicians in France, but only one President."

"Ja! dass is so," said a bright-faced, square-headed little German sitting opposite to Lea. "Strike high and hit hart. Dat is de way to make dese sheepsheads open dare mouths and stare when day reads de papers on Monday. Let Carnot go first, and den—well, den someone else. Dare are plenty of dem to spare."

A laugh followed this speech of Franz Hartog, who may as well be introduced here as elsewhere as the cleverest engineer in Europe and an anarchist heart and soul—if he had a soul, which some of his nearest acquaintances were very much inclined to doubt.

"Very well," said Lea. "I withdraw my objection, if, indeed, I ever had one."

The veto of one member, by the rules of the Group, would have been fatal to the execution of the proposal. As Lea withdrew hers she flicked some more ash off the end of her cigarette, and with it virtually fell the man whose death all Europe would be mourning within forty-eight hours.

"Then that is settled," said Max. "I will wire to Lyons the first thing in the morning. Now, Hartog, have you anything to tell us about this gun-boat of yours?"

"Ja, dot is all arranged. Her keel vill be laid on de slips next month. I have designed de engines mineself, and de speed contracted for by de firm with de Russian Government vill be thirty-five knots, and you can bet dat my engines vill make her do it. She vill make her private trial mit all her coal and arms and ammunition on board according to de contract, within eighteen monzs from now, and you can depend upon me to be on board her at de time with a suitable majority of de firemens and crew to do vat ve vants mit her.

"You can be sure, too, dat de oders vill have got someting inside dem that vill not make dem mooch good if we have to have a small scrimmage after all to get possession of de boat. Den ve vill rendezvous at the proper place, and den dere vill be some vild time on de Atlantic and de Cape routes ver dey bring de specie and de diamonds.

"Ja, you believe me, Monsieur Max and comrades, Franz Hartog vill make you de masters ov de sea, and you shall laugh at all de fleets of Europe ven dey try to catch you. Dat vill be anarchy vot vill be worth calling somdings. Ja, it is a great scheme and ve shall do it, you believe me."

The little German stopped and looked round the table rubbing his hands, and amidst the murmurs of approval that followed his speech, Max nodded laughingly to him and said:

"Yes, my friend, you are quite right. That is a great scheme, and if you can capture that little greyhound for us when she is built and armed you will have done more for anarchy and driven a bigger nail into the coffin of the tyranny of commercialism than ever any man did yet, and now I am going to tell you of a greater scheme than that."

"Greater as dot!" exclaimed the German, his steely blue eyes glittering through his spectacles with excitement. "How can any scheme be greater as dot?"

"Listen and you shall hear," said Max, "and I won't take very many words to tell you.

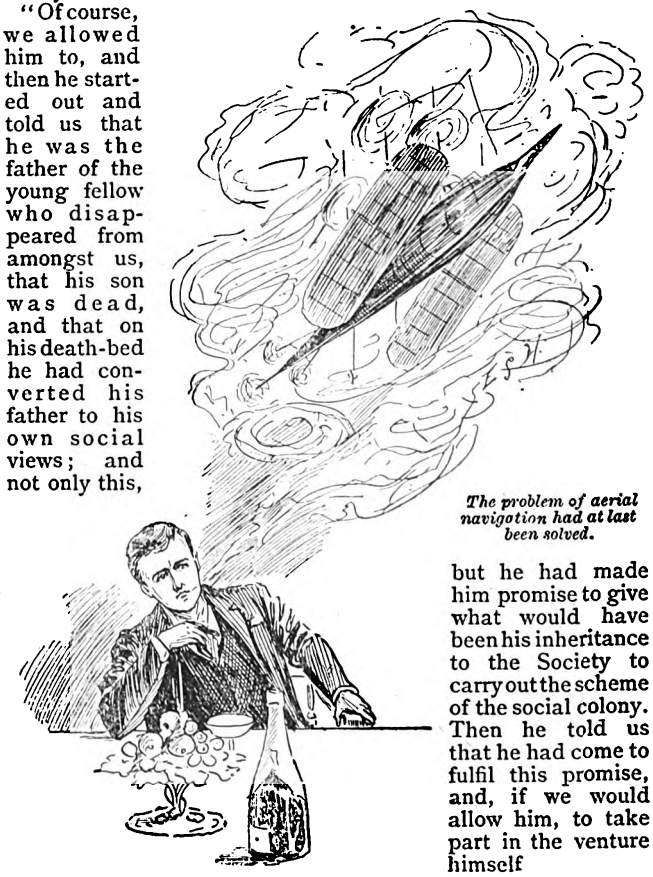
"Some years ago now, when I was a little more than a lad, and before I came to believe that there is no remedy for the present state of affairs except force and terrorism, I joined a society of amiable idiots who meet at each other's houses in different parts of London, and who call themselves the Brotherhood of the Better Life.

"I have kept up my membership, partly because it amused and interested me, and partly because I had a sort of idea that some day something might come of it. For a long time they have had a scheme on foot to emigrate to some out-of-the-way part of the world and start one of those social colonies which of course always come to grief in some way or another as the Freeland one has just done, but up to a few weeks ago they never had a chance of making a start for lack of money.

"Then, about a month ago, we had a regular romance, and something occurred that I would never have credited if it hadn't happened under my own eyes. Nearly six months ago one of our members who pretended to be a craftsman—but who was really nothing of the sort, for he was what they call a gentleman from head to foot—disappeared.

"For five months we heard nothing of him, and then, one night after a lecture by a sort of latter-day prophet of ours, a very clever but misguided fellow called Edward Adams, a stranger came out from the audience and asked to be allowed to say a few words.

"Of course, we allowed him to, and then he started out and told us that he was the father of the young fellow who disappeared from amongst us, that his son was dead, and that on his death-bed he had converted his father to his own social views; and not only this, but he had made him promise to give what would have been his inheritance to the Society to carry out the scheme of the social colony. Then he told us that he had come to fulfil this promise, and, if we would allow him, to take part in the venture himself



The problem of aerial navigation had at last been solved.

Digitized by Google

"Well, we consented, on condition that he accepted the Constitution which we had been, as I always thought, playing at drawing up, and this he agreed to do, and then staggered us by saying how much he was prepared to devote to the carrying out of the scheme. We expected a few hundreds at most, perhaps just enough to give us a start with what we could get together of ourselves, so you can imagine what we felt like—and I in particular—when the figure came out at over a hundred thousand pounds."

"Ein hunderdt tousand pound!" cried Hartog, unable to restrain his enthusiasm. "Vi, I could build nearly three ships of thirty-five knots mit so mooch! Can you get hold of it, Monsieur Max?"

"I'm not going to get hold of that, friend Franz, but of something a good deal more important than money. It turned out that our fairy godfather was no other than Frederick Austen, the head of the big engineering firm of Austen and Son, of Queen Victoria Street and Woolwich. The death of his son has made it impossible for an Austen to succeed him in the business, and that, combined with his change of social views, has decided him to give up the business altogether.

"Of course, I needn't tell you that we accepted him and his money with thanks. But there was something stranger to come yet. Last night, at a meeting of the committee, of which I have the honour to be a member, he confided to us a secret which, as he said, would enable the colony not only to hold its own against any who might wish to interfere with it in case it prospered, but which will enable the colonists to enforce an object-lesson in peace, goodwill on earth, and all that sort of thing, on the first nations that go to war with each other, after they are in a position to wield the power that it will give them.

"Then"— and here Max Renault leaned forward on the table and instinctively lowered his voice while the others leant forward also to catch what was coming—"he told us that just before his last illness his son had completed a series of experiments which enabled him to say with truth that the problem of aerial navigation had at last been solved, and that he had solved it.

"He told the secret to his father, and he at once placed all the resources of his business at his disposal, and, comrades, believe me or believe me not, as you like, but I tell you that less than twenty-four hours ago I saw in action a working model of a flying ship which Frederick Austen is going to build with my assistance in the Brotherhood's New Utopia."

A murmur half of amazement and half of incredulity ran from lip to lip as Renault uttered these momentous words, and Lea suddenly straightened herself up in her chair, stretched her shapely arms upward, and then, folding her hands behind her head, looked at Max with undisguised admiration in her eyes, and said, with a ring of exultation in her voice:

"Ah, now I understand you, after wondering all this time what your parable was going to lead up to. Excellent, Monsieur Max, excellent! You have not been playing the Anarchist wolf in the Socialist sheepskin for nothing. You will emigrate with these good folks to their New Utopia, wherever they may find it, absorb such ideas as may be useful, appoint yourself aërial engineer to that excellent converted capitalist, and then——"

"Yes, and then," said Max, with a significant movement of his hand towards the pocket that contained his revolver, "when the Cruiser of the Air is built and equipped, and I have satisfied myself of her working power, she will be found missing some fine morning, and so shall I.

"I'm not going to exile myself with a lot of people like that for nothing, I can tell you. If I'm the man I take myself for, within three years from now that air ship shall carry the red flag through the clouds and terrorise the whole earth from East to West and Pole to Pole.

"And now," he continued, rising to his feet, under the stimulus of his own words. "If you've any more champagne, fill up. I've a toast for you. For another year or two you must carry on the work without me, or stop it altogether as seems best to you, and meanwhile you, Hartog, shall get your thirty-five knot sea-devil afloat and to business till you've levied ocean tolls enough to give us funds to build an aerial fleet on the model of the ship that I'll bring you, and then we'll have no more hole-and-corner assassinations and no more pettifogging bomb-throwing. We'll declare war—war to the knife, on the world that we hate, and that hates and fears us, and then——"

"Here's your glass, my Lord of the Air that is to be," said Lea, rising and handing him a full tumbler of champagne with a gesture of deference that was not altogether assumed. "And so let us have your toast."

"You shall have it, short and sweet," said Max, taking the glass and lifting it above his head. "Here's life to those we love, and death to those we hate—Vive l'Anarchie and the Outlaws of the Air!"

"Mein Gott, but dat is a great scheme! He vill set de vorld on fire if he only comes properly to bass," said Franz Hartog, as he drained his glass at a gulp, and then stood gazing at Max Renault with a look that was almost one of worship in his little twinkling eyes.

(To be continued next week.)

THE LITTLE FROCK.

YES, she would do. She could start in work as soon as she liked, money to be paid on the piece-work system, and hours eight in the morning, sharp, till seven at night, with an hour for dinner and half an hour for tea; instant dismissal on the first sign of intoxication while at work, and suspension of work in the case of foul language or bad conduct.

The chief clerk lowered his head and continued his writing, and the little woman went out of the room into the shed where a dozen rough, red-armed females spent their days in sorting rags at starvation wages. The foreman listened to what she had to say, and then curtly gave her instructions.

A bale of tattered garments was put for her, alongside some baskets, and she had got to sort them.

"Tuck up yer sleeves. Look smart."

She flushed, then rolled up the calico and displayed a pair of thin, white arms.

"You won't be 'ere long," this from the foreman, prophetically, as he turned on his heel and sauntered away.

The eyes of the other women, which had been directed at the newcomer during the conversation, fell simultaneously as the foreman moved round, and a dozen pairs of temporary idle arms moved rapidly from basket to basket.

During the dinner hour she went away alone. The other women loafed about the premises and washed down their chunks of bread with tea, and talked scandal, with the little woman for the subject.

"Seems stuck up. Givin' 'erself airs."

"Lor'; she'd better not start them tricks; it don't pay."

Then, one of them, a tidier woman than the rest, with a thin, sunken face, mildly suggested, in a deliberate tone, that perhaps the new hand hadn't got anything to eat.

Next day she applied for the money that was due to her for her previous day's work, and, although it was against the regulations of the establishment to pay otherwise than at the end of the week, the chief clerk made an exception in her case, provided she held her tongue about it.

That dinner hour she went and got some food and came and ate it with the other women. She tried to be sociable, and after her meal seemed a lot better and stronger.

Things went on for a fortnight, during which time she found considerable favour with the women, because, as her fingers and arms became accustomed to the work, she did it more quickly than anybody, and, what was more estimable in their eyes, she always spent the bigger portion of her money in drinks round.

Digitized by Google

They liked her for that, for she never let a drop pass between her own lips, although she talked and chatted with them all in the bar.

One day, however, she took a half pint of bitter. It was on a Saturday night, when most of them were flush of money. She called for gin after that, and at closing time they had to carry her out and let her lie in the road.

Monday morning she turned up at the shed, the traces of her debauchery still visible on her face, which was even whiter and more pinched than it had ever been. At first she seemed inclined to drop her head and avoid the looks of her fellow workers, as if in shame; but, as they took no notice and made no mention of the affair, to them so familiar in the squalid misery in which they dragged out their existence, she was herself again before the dinner hour.

Next Saturday it was the same—worse, perhaps. For some reason or other she let temper get the better of her, and the most violent woman in that select band, if not in the whole neighbourhood, was mild compared with her. She began by swearing, and left off by fighting outside the public-house. No woman ever made such a brute of herself, to the certain knowledge of the barman and of the policeman who moved her on, purposely oblivious to her state.

In spite of these Saturday night eruptions, in spite of the debilitating effect they naturally produced upon her constitution, she kept pluckily to her work throughout the week, earning a larger return than any of the other women employed in that place.

At times she would scarcely speak a word to any of them for a whole day, sitting away from their circle at meal times, and staring hard on the ground as if her mind dwelt on some point in her life which was sweet for her to think of; for, during these periods, a soft expression would come over her face, and sometimes they would see, or fancy they saw, her eyes wet.

They cared for her less now than they had when she used to stand drinks instead of tippling the whole of her money away herself; besides which, she was getting more stuck-up and reticent, except when anyone started to argue with her on a Saturday night in the "Grey Bounder." Then her arrogance gave place to degradation, and the foulest language poured out from between her lips as easily as the gin had been poured down.

The other women were frightened of her, all but those whose condition resembled her own. They endeavoured to get her discharged, and, wholly indifferent to her future, told the foreman all that regularly happened on Saturday nights.

It did not affect him, however, he said. They had better mind their own business. So she continued to work on.

The effect of the work upon her garments was such that in the course of a few months her dress was in an abominably filthy state and almost in rags. For a few shillings she was able to buy another of her employer from among those she sorted. All the women selected their garments in the same way, and from among the thousands that passed through their hands they had a good choice.

But the new dress of the little woman ill-fitted her form. She looked bedraggled, miserably untidy, and the certain amount of care which she had at first exercised with regard to her personal appearance was gone. The wan, drawn face became red and bloated, the arms developed till the muscles, hard and stiff, showed clearly through the blotched skin.

She was going to the bad fast, they said.

One day a woman said:

"Lawks, this is a purty frock." She was holding aloft a child's gown of cream cashmere, greasy and well worn.

A couple of the others went over and examined it critically.

"Yus, do fur my Sal."

"Fine 'mbroidery on it. Some kid from the hupper suckles, I suppose."

The little woman was staring from her place with contracted brows towards the group, and then, as if impelled by some sudden power, she walked rapidly over and joined them.

No one noticed her until she reached out and snatched the frock from the holder's grasp.

"I'm going to have this," and turning she went over to the foreman and asked what he wanted for it.

"It's a good 'un," he said, eyeing it critically, and turning it over in his hands. "Can't let you have it for less than two bob."

She folded it carefully, and agreed to the price, and he made a note of her debt on a slip of paper.

At the end of the day it was found that she had got through less work than she ever had before, not excepting the first hours of her employment at the sorting sheds. She seemed strangely glad when the hands of the clock, hung on the rafters, pointed over the cracked face to seven. The cream frock had not left her side from the moment it had become her property, and all through the afternoon she had cast yearning glances at the faded and greasy fabric that, at one time, had given warmth to the body of some little child, some daughter of society.

Whose child? The dull, ignorant women whom Fate had made her fellow workers discerned no association between the sad face, sadder than ever, and the little cream frock. They wondered in a vague, unreasoning way, for whom she wanted this garment, as, to their certain knowledge, she had no children of her own living with her, nor was she in any way particularly indulgent with other folks' little ones.

But, had they once, in some byegone years, lived and moved in places at which they now stared with open-mouthed astonishment and admiration, drinking in the views of luxury and ease to which their eyes and ears treated them; had they known the kind fond voice of a noble man whispering love into their ears in the midst of the palm-filled conservatory; had they drooped their heads and blushed in return; had they stood before the altar in a large grand church through which floated the sweetest music from the organ all in their praise; had they pressed to their bosom a little baby girl, who, in the course of years, filled the fine mansion in Belgravia with her laughter and merry prattle; had they feasted their devoted eyes on the little one clothed in her new cream frock; had they fallen from the highest pinnacle of this state of bliss and of intense happiness to poverty in one short month; had they despaired at the sight of the little one's sufferings and, weak-minded, sought solace in the stupor of drunkenness; had they been turned by a heart-broken husband from the little struggling home, from the darling of their mother's heart, from all they loved and cherished; had they sought to support themselves by honourable work; had they fallen, at the moment of success, to the hands of the devil again; had they in the course of their work (merciless coincidence!) found and held in their hands the little cream frock that they had sold in a moment of frenzy to obtain the means to purchase the baneful sorrow-drowner; had they experienced all this and much more, they would have wondered less, and given all their womanly sympathy to the little woman who lay that night tossing upon a sleepless bed of straw, and clasping a little cream frock passionately to her heart.

Next morning she was not at her accustomed place in the work-shed, nor did she arrive at all during the day; and the foreman at seven o'clock struck her name off the book, and prepared for the customary row on the morrow when the little woman, barely recovered from a wild debauch, should present herself at the door for admission, as other women had done before her.

But there was no need for this preparation. She had gone out in the morning, the first floor lodger said, and she had come back, but beyond that she knew nothing, only that during the night she had been "snivelling a lot."

The dying rays of the summer sun shot through the grimy window of the attic and pointed out to them the little woman white and cold on the bed of straw, her pinched face less pinched, and bearing a calmer and softer expression than they had ever seen upon it.

And they wondered why the little cream frock that was gripped so tightly in her arms should have induced her to go out and buy the bottle of rat poison that stood on the floor by the bedside.

Digitized by Google

ALL the other actors of the company began to assemble on the stage for the closing tableau, the leading man began to manœuvre for his pose at L.C., where he was to voice the epigrammatic sentiment that gave the name to the play; and the escorts in the audience, heroically foregoing the finale, commenced to get together their ladies' wraps, fans, and opera glasses. The Babe poked Desfield with the handle of his cane, and said: "Let's get out of here before the crush."

Desfield picked up his programme from beneath the seat, where it had fallen, and put it in his pocket. He always made it a point to save his programmes. On the lower shelf of his clothes-cupboard at home he had made a pile that could be measured by feet.

Then he nodded to the Babe, and the two rose from their seats, Desfield very distantly conscious of the implied rudeness to the performers. The curtain, the original red curtain that had been down before the first act, fell just as they reached the end of the passage, amid hurried and doubtful applause, and whistles from the gallery. The house-lights were suddenly turned on, and the orchestra struck up a lively quick step.

It had been a matinée. They came out of the gloom of the theatre, which smelt of stale gas and plush upholstery, into the streets again. Desfield felt as though he were in a manner passing from one play to another, only with the difference that in this latter he was at once actor, author, and audience.

"Let's go somewhere and eat something," exclaimed the Babe, as they turned up the street. Desfield, as he instinctively reached for the middle part of his cane, cast a glance of some surprise at the Babe. He had not expected this. She had been in the first row of the dress circle with her mother, and Desfield had supposed that the unconscionable Babe would hang round the exit in order to see them to their carriage, and thus give Her a chance to ask him home to dinner.

But the Babe did nothing of this; he was a changed man to-day; he had moped all through the play, taking only the head of his stick into his confidence and his mouth, and, now that the play was over, skulked away from the theatre as soon as he could.

Desfield forbore to question. He knew that whatever was the ferment in the Babe's mind, it would sooner or later reach the boiling point, and bubble over in a prolonged recital of grievances.

This was precisely what did occur that very evening as they put their legs under the dainty table in the dining-room of their club. Desfield did not know whether the Johannisberger (1864) strengthened the Babe's impulse in the direction of unreserved intercourse between himself and his chum, or whether it weakened the barriers that the Anglo-Saxon throws before the spontaneous outburst of his more sentimental emotions; but whether the impulse was too strong, or the barriers too weak, out it came, and with admirable good humour Desfield submitted to listen to the endless chapters of lamentations of this new Jeremiah.

She had jilted him—thrown him over. You see, it was this way: the Babe had gone to call upon her on a certain day, and had found her (paradoxically) not at home. Then he had written her a neat little note asking if he might come on the following Sunday afternoon, and by return post she had told him that he might.

"And when I go up there," continued the Babe with a wail, "I find the Other Fellow coming away, who tells me, with a grin on his confounded face, that he's just been there, and that she's not at home. Now I just ask you——" and the Babe closed with a burst of indignation.

"I don't care, though," he added when he had finished, with his hands deep in his pockets, and rolling his head from side to side—"I don't care. If she can get along without me, I can make out all right. Let's see how she'll like the Other Fellow; that's all."

The next afternoon, at Somebody's tea, Desfield and the Babe saw her with the Other Fellow. She cut him dead. Oh, but it was one of those flat, unequivocal cuts, that was like a slap in the face.

"That's all right," said the Babe bravely, even if his chin would twitch, "did you see the look I gave her? Oh, I gave her a l——k."

The split was absolute after this. She sent back her picture that the Babe had copied for her from a photograph, and he returned the scented necktie-holder that she had embroidered for him. She became feverishly gay—was out somewhere every night. The Babe began to speak of life and youth as though they were spelt with capitals, and to talk of going abroad.

Things had reached this stage when Society took up illustrated lectures. It became a fad. It was rather peculiar too that the ladies of Society should have patronised them, because the Egyptian darkness that was the necessary adjunct to the lectures, precluded any possibility of gratifying the desire "to be seen of men." One particularly spiteful sheet gave it out that some people went, not in spite of the darkness, but because of it, which was, to be sure, very churlish.

But, however, they went in "numbers numberless." The lectures were upon European Travel, illustrated by magic-lantern photographs of all points of interest. In order to be consistent with his unconcealed intentions of foreign travel, the Babe was obliged to attend, and rarely missed a lecture.

Desfield was one of the ushers. Desfield always did seem to find his little niche in everything of this kind that was going on. In tennis tournaments he was apt to be chosen as scorer. In athletic contests for charity, he was always to be found upon the field in some semi-official capacity. At weddings he was best man.

At the club on ladies' night he was on the receiving committee; at cotillons he was generally leader. Somehow or other, those people that made up Desfield's "set" found they could not well navigate in the troubled waters of Society unless they felt Desfield's hand either at the wheel or upon the ropes.

Digitized by Google

The lectures were held at Oddfellows' Hall. There were but two a week; one on Monday evening, the other on Saturday afternoon. Admittance was by invitation only, and the price of seats was high. It was a select affair generally.

On the last Saturday afternoon of the series, reserved for Paris and its environs, Desfield found his hands full. The audience had never been so large or so fashionable. Until nearly half-an-hour after the lecture had begun, he was kept running up and down the aisle of which he had charge, seating the late comers, and this after the hall was darkened was no easy matter. She with the Other Fellow were among the last to come in. The few remaining chairs were soon taken, and Desfield's work was done. Those coming in any later were obliged to stand.

She and the Other Fellow had been with the latest comers. They were not, however, the last. The Babe was the last. The lecture was nearly half over when he came in, and finding Desfield, leaned up against the wall with him in the listless and melancholy manner which was now—poor beggar—not all affected.

"I'm off next week, Thursday, Desfield," he whispered after a while. "Got my ticket this morning."

Desfield was really sorry for him. "Hard lines, old man, isn't it?" he said.

The masculine emotion of these latter days can go no further than this. When the fin de siècle gentleman calls his friend "Old Man," he has figuratively fallen upon his neck and kissed him. Beyond this he cannot go, with dignity. The Babe felt and appreciated this, and loved Desfield accordingly; he would have liked to clasp him around the neck, or to have wrung his hands, and in the surrounding darkness could have done so without fear and without reproach; but instead he only shifted his position against the wall, and, in answer more to what Desfield implied than to what he said, returned:

"It's very good of you, old man."

"And now, ladies and gentlemen," went on the lecturer, turning from side to side, and occasionally silhouetting his head against the brilliant circular focus on the curtain, like the transit of a planet across the sun—"and now, turning from this marvel of engineering skill" (he had been talking about the Eiffel Tower), "which like the skeleton of the Tower of Babel, stands like a monument to the sky-aspiring ambition of mankind—turning from this, let us take one of those large and lumbering omnibuses drawn by those heavy white horses, a sight so characteristic of the streets of Paris." Here a picture of the sight was thrown upon the curtain. "We mount upon the top, are carried across the river, viâ the Pont de Jena, down through the beautiful Champs Elysées, and in a few moments emerge upon one of the most beautiful, as well as one of the most historic, squares in the world—the Place de la Concorde."

They drank champagne together.

He pressed a little tick-tack between his fingers, and the picture of the omnibus seemed in a manner to dissolve into a view of the square. He paused a moment for effect, and then proceeded—"We now stand upon ground where history has been made and unmade. In the distance, across the river, is the Chamber of Deputies. In the immediate foreground rises the Egyptian Obelisk, a single block of granite." He plunged into statistics with ferocious relish: "Seventy-five feet six and one-half inches in height, weighing ten thousand tons, and transported from Egypt at the cost of seven million one hundred thousand francs."

Desfield was troubled. He was not listening to the lecturer's flow of periodic English, but was thinking of the Babe and his miseries. That the Babe was hard hit, he knew now beyond any doubt. What effect it was to have upon him was less certain, and therefore more conducive to anxiety. The two had been chums ever since their college days, and had always been everywhere, and done everything together. Now that the Babe was about to leave for the continent, for anywhere, Desfield felt in anticipation like a corps sans âme.

"And surrounded," continued the lecturer, "by four magnificent fountains, throwing jets twenty-seven feet high, and pouring out daily seventeen thousand gallons of water."

Then, too, he was almost sure that She loved the Babe very much indeed, and that her encouragement of the Other Fellow was a pretence and a sham. It did seem supremely silly that these two little children should spoil their whole lives by a quarrel over the most trivial thing in the world.

"Groups of beautiful statuary at the four angles representing the four principal cities of the nation."

It had always been a settled thing with Desfield that the two should eventually be married, and he had been accustomed to pose before himself as the friend of the household in future days, dining with them en famille, or spending a cosy evening at their fireside. He felt keenly disappointed over this failure of his little romance.

"Measuring six and one half feet, over a mile in circumference."

Desfield wondered if anything could be done—if he could do anything.

"Six hundred dekametres."

The Babe had moved to a little distance, having found a vaguely appropriate seat upon a cold hot-water pipe.

Somebody in one of the forward seats got up, and came down the aisle. As his figure emerged into the scant circle of light thrown by the lowered gas jets that burned on either side of the door, Desfield saw that it was the Other Fellow.

"Whew!" said the Other Fellow, as he came within whispering distance of Desfield. "Can't stand this any longer. Had to excuse myself to Her, and come out and have a peg. Come with me, won't you?"

Desfield thought this was very like the Other Fellow, but an idea suddenly occurred to him. He said: "All right; you go along, and I'll come after you as soon as I can get my overcoat."

The Other Fellow went out, and Desfield turned to the Babe, who was still sitting on the warming apparatus, oblivious to everything. Desfield woke him up, saying, "Come on, I have a seat for you." Then he piloted him softly down the passage and placed him in the seat the Other Fellow had just vacated, beside Her.

As the Babe sat down, they recognised each other. The Babe turned quickly. "Oh, I say, Desfield," he said. But Desfield was already gone, saying to himself, "Leave 'em alone for half-an-hour in a dark room, side by side—with no chance of escape—with nothing or nobody to come between 'em, and if something don't turn up it will be because they are a different kind of people to what I take them to be.'

He had now to direct all his wits to keeping the Other Fellow out of the way. For an instant he had the idea of getting him drunk, but he grimly reflected that a gun of that calibre would probably kick about as far as it would shoot.

Digitized by Google

He went out blinking into the glare of the afternoon sun, and found the Other Fellow waiting for him at an adjacent bar. They drank champagne together. Desfield was as long about it as he could be, then inveigled the Other Fellow to the lunch counter, and dawdled over olives and caviar, talking about the 'Varsity Cricket Match, and Henley. Desfield knew the Babe had about twenty minutes more. They had already gone from the lecture-room about ten minutes.

By this, he thought, they must have got over the coldly-polite stage, and have come to mutual recriminations. He asked the Other Fellow to have another, with him this time. Then once more back to the lunch-counter, for another ten minutes. "Now, they're about coming round to explanations," thought Desfield. He wished that the Other Fellow were subject to epileptic fits, or could be drugged, or quietly knocked on the head. They left the room and started to return.

As the white-painted valves of the doors of the bar-room flapped back and forth behind them, they both heard a sudden noise that made them pause to listen. There is no more mistaking the bark of an angry dog than the hoof-beats of a runaway horse; there is a savagery, a viciousness, about it, that can be instantly distinguished from the ordinary canine utterance.

The noise came from a sort of blind-alley, hardly more than a deep recess, just behind the saloon. It was followed by a snarl, and a hoarse yelp in another key, and then a rapid succession of fierce, brutal noises, and the sound of furred bodies striking and rolling upon the ground.

The Other Fellow already had out a couple of five-pound notes, and was shaking them across the ring.

"A dog-fight," cried the Other Fellow with great delight, putting his hat on the back of his head. "Must take this in," and he ran up to where the crowd was already formed in a circle. Desfield followed him, looking at his watch. "Now they're about finished with explanations, and have started to make it up. The dog-fight is a special dispensation of Providence—they've about ten minutes more."

And when he saw the two dogs he perceived with unholy joy that the fight promised to hold out a good deal more than ten minutes, and he knew that the Other Fellow would stay as long as it lasted.

By the time that Desfield got sight of them, the two dogs were silent—they had already become "locked." The bull-terrier had a left-leg hold, while the Newfoundland, holding on temporarily to his adversary's ear, was gradually working for a grip at his throat. The Other Fellow already had out a couple of five-pound notes, and was shaking them across the ring at the large dog's owner, offering seven to ten. He seemed to be in his element. "Poor sport," said Desfield to himself, with great disgust.

"Isn't this beautiful?" said the Other Fellow to Desfield, rubbing his hands. "What a pity cats always fight in the night so you can't see 'em. Seven to ten on the bull, you over there!"

All at once the large dog let go, and made for a new hold. The instant the bull felt himself free, he slipped his jaws upward, from the fore-leg up along the shoulder-blade, along the shoulder itself, and then suddenly closed them, vice-like, sunk them in the soft part of the throat—all without a sound. "It's all over but the shouting now," cried the Other Fellow.

In a few minutes this would be true of the lecture as well.

"I think," said Desfield to himself, "that they should now have come to the most interesting part of all. They have about four more minutes." Then he looked at the Newfoundland; some men were vainly trying to pry the bull's teeth apart with a stout stick. "The bull won't kill him before four minutes, anyhow," thought Desfield. He waited till the Other Fellow's back was turned, then slipped over to the hall.

"Strange," he said, "that their future happiness should depend upon a dog-fight, and upon the strength of a bull-terrier's jaws. If the bull can only hold on for five more minutes they'll make it up, and get married."

By the time he had got the carriage to the door, the lecture was over, and the crowd began to stream out.

"Maybe the scheme failed after all," thought Desfield.

She came out on the Babe's arm. Both were nervously looking for the Other Fellow. Desfield made up to them.

"That's all right," he cried. "He's interested—elsewhere—just now, and your carriage is here waiting for you."

The Babe leaned out of the carriage window and wrung his hand. "You don't know of anyone, do you, Desfield, that want's to buy a Cunard ticket at a discount?"

"Oh, Mr. Desfield!" she began.

Through the window, on the other side of the carriage, Desfield caught sight of the Other Fellow hurrying distractedly round the corner.

"Where to?" he asked, interrupting her. Then, as he got her answer, he banged the carriage door, and looking up to the coachman said:

"Home, James."

Digitized by Google

THE SILVER-STRINGED LUTE.

ONE! TWO! THREE! The soft-toned bells in the cathedral pealed forth the Angelus, and for a brief space the restless life of the city was still. Men stood with uncovered heads, women in prayerful attitudes—even the little beggar children ceased for the while their importunities. Only a moment; then all was merry and noisy again. Yet the brief season of prayer was not without its influence.

The scene was a familiar one to Will Harcourt. Yet it had not lost its extreme picturesqueness to his English eyes. The low houses, the gilt spires of the cathedral glistening in the evening sun, still possessed for him a peculiar charm. Black-robed priests gliding noiselessly, gaily dressed men and women, some on foot and some in the gorgeously liveried vehicles belonging to the aristocracy, little beggar children, whose alluring eyes never failed to coax the desired coin from his pockets, passed him, all hurrying to the plaza, from which the strains of the band already floated. There all the gossip of the day would be retailed, business discussed, and lovers obtain a sight of their inamorata, a smile, a rosebud, or, perhaps, even a hastily whispered word should the watchful eyes of the duenna be, for the moment, turned away.

It was now two years since the sign "Harcourt & Co., Chemists," had appeared over one of the quaint shops in the Calle Hidalgo, and both Harcourt and Ralph Swain, his friend and partner, had come to be liked and respected among the prominent Mexican gentlemen of the city. And not only did the sterner sex regard him with favour, but many a soft glance was cast after the handsome young Englishman as he strolled more slowly along the crowded streets toward the quiet portion of the city, where he and his friend had taken a small adobe dwelling.

Will Harcourt, however, was not thinking of the dark-eyed maids of Mexico, fair as they seemed. Against their smiles and fascinations he was proof. Truth to tell, a little maid in Cheshire held his heart, and his thoughts, his love, his work, were all for her. The story was a common one; they had met, loved, agreed to marry; but adverse circumstances, in the shape of financial difficulties, prevented, and they parted —Harcourt seeking Mexico, where he hoped to make his fortune. And it was upon this he was musing as he stopped at the post-office for his weekly letter, which was handed to him with a smile by the courteous official.

All of Harcourt's friends knew of his hopes and sympathised with him, while they admired the sturdy faithfulness and honour which made him true in every thought to the lady of his love and blind to the allurements of the gay Mexican city.

He was still thinking pleasantly of his letter as, the evening meal over, he settled down in the cool patio to smoke. Good humouredly refusing all invitations of his friend to "come out and enjoy himself," he felt rather relieved when that gentleman took his departure for his usual evening tour of the city. Mr. Swain had fallen an easy victim to the Southern beauties; and clandestine appointments, as well as skilful eludings of duennas, were with him a speciality.

Harcourt's meditations were exceedingly agreeable. Pacing slowly up and down the court, scenes and memories brought to mind by the letter he had just received, crowded upon him, and he thought with satisfaction that his promotion was nearly at an end. He had not toiled in vain; respected and prosperous as he had become, he knew that before the year was over he would be reunited to the girl he had waited for so long—a man she might well love and honour. Her face rose before him as he had seen it last, the brown eyes filled with tears, while the lips smiled bravely. The years that had passed seemed long and dark, the future bright.

Suddenly he was aroused from his musing by the sound of music, far away, yet near, and full of such surpassing sweetness that he stood spellbound. It was a lute touched by a master hand and accompanied by a woman's voice.

He glanced round. The door that led to the street was open, and the great dog lay peacefully in the passage. The sound did not come, then, from any serenading party, and as it continued he noted that it came muffled, as if through a wall.

On the left was the city prison; it could not come from there. On the right was a deserted dwelling, the former home of one Don José Flores, who, in a passion of jealous rage, had stabbed a rival and fled from justice to the mountains, where he had become the leader of a dangerous gang of bandits. The house and property had been confiscated, and the government seal was still on the gate. Yet the music seemed to come from this direction, and he heard it most plainly when he paused in front of an unused door, covered now by a luxurious rose vine, but which, he knew, connected with the passage leading to the Flores garden.

He stood still and listened. Soft and sweet came the sounds, thrilling him in every nerve. Something impelled him to follow them, and he pushed aside the tangled vine, opening with some difficulty the door, which turned slowly on its iron hinges.

As he had surmised, it led into a passage connecting with the neighbouring garden, which was surrounded by a high fence and filled with overgrown vines and bushes. No light came from the house, but he could hear the sound more plainly now, and guided by it he pushed open a door, then stood back amazed at his own temerity.

The door opened softly. As he had guessed it corresponded to the one in his own house and led into the patio.

The place was dark, except at one end, where a quaint silver lamp was fastened into the angles of the adobe wall. The perfume of the roses came to him, and palms and potted plants were arranged round the sides, all speaking of habitation in the place which was supposed by everyone to be deserted.

Nor was this all. The light from the lamp fell upon a woman who half reclined on a couch covered with panther skins. It was she whose voice Harcourt had heard, and it came to him sweetly and clearly as he stood there, unable to move hand or foot.

Her clinging robe of black, confined at the waist by a silver chain, left revealed the beauty of her neck and arms, and the lamp, as it flickered in the draught, gleamed on the red gold of her hair like a living flame. Her long, black lashes lay like shadows on her cheek as she sat, with head bent a little forward, picking at the lute she held.

Harcourt, unable to take his eyes from her beauty, felt a strange sensation creeping over him as he stood silent in the shadow. Something warned him to retrace his steps, yet he felt powerless to do so. Suddenly, as if to make the decision for him, the door behind him flew to with a resounding slam, and the lady started up.

Fearing that she might be alarmed, Harcourt stepped quickly forward.

"Pardon me," he said in Spanish, "I heard the singing, and something urged me to seek the singer. For my intrusion, fair one, you must blame this," and he touched the lute which lay on her knees, then stopped, astonished at himself. In three years he had not spoken in this strain to any woman.

She raised her eyes. They were dark as midnight, soft as the velvet pansy-leaves, tender, compelling, inscrutable. From the moment that Harcourt looked into their liquid depths he knew but one desire, and that, never to look away.

"Intrusion? No," she answered; "you are welcome, for I know you, Don Cullermo, and have often watched you. It is lonely here."

"Then may I stay," he asked persuasively, "and hear you sing again?"

She drew aside her dress and made room for him beside her. "I am Amorita Flores," she told him, "the sister of

Digitized by Google

Don José. Sometimes I am with him and sometimes I am compelled to remain here, but keep it secret. It is a dreary life, señor; I would die if it were not for my lute."

Harcourt did not answer. Leaning back against the panther skins, he gazed dreamily into the star-set sky. A vision of Madeline floated across his mind, and, with a sudden resolution, he started up; but, encountering the eyes of Amorita, he hesitated, then sank slowly back again.

"It is a relic," she went on, in her soft, languorous voice; "it belonged to a troubador, and 'tis said that when he willed he could draw the hearts of man and maid from their breasts by its sweetness. See, the strings are all of silver, not one has ever broken. 'Tis said that when one breaks, the spell goes also."

"A dangerous weapon," answered Harcourt, lightly; "yet I court the danger. Sing again."

Smiling, she touched the strings, while Harcourt sat with half-closed eyes, his hand, which had fallen on her shoulder, resting there unrebuked. He felt a sort of faint surprise at himself, but it was dim and far away. He was content to be beside this beautiful woman in the soft Mexican night. Past and future, all faded; he was passive to her charming.

Her voice died away in a sweet, lingering note, and the lute softly slid to the ground. She leaned nearer, until her silky hair brushed his face. His hand crept round her neck, and, emboldened by her silence, he bent and kissed her throat.

Her lips drooped, but Harcourt started up suddenly, resolutely throwing off the spell. He pushed her from him. "No, I will not!" he exclaimed. "By heaven, I will not!"

Amorita also rose. Unheeding his violence she stretched her white arms out languidly, and let them fall slowly round his neck, looking full into his eyes. One moment she kept him thus, the next he held her closely in his arms, while their lips met in a long, passionate kiss.

. . . . . .

Ralph Swain had, for some time past, noticed a change in his friend. He was abstracted and reticent, and looked worn and haggard; yet he declared that he was in perfect health, and seemed to resent any remarks upon his appearance.

One day when they were standing talking to Don Juan Gonzales, a friend of Swain's, a woman of wonderful beauty passed the door. Swain, always eager to view a pretty face, craned his neck to look after her.

"Pretty woman that," he said regretfully. "Wonder I have not seen her before."

Gonzales laughed, then turned suddenly grave.

"Turn your eyes from her, my friend," he said. "That is Amorita, the witch and the ruin of Flores. It is said that by obtaining new victims she keeps him in funds. It is certain that no one who once gets into her toils can resist her, and many a man has died for her perfidy. There is something about her that makes a man believe in her until he finds her out. I know to my sorrow, for she ruined my faith in woman. It is now some time since she favoured us with her presence. I wonder where she is staying and who her latest victim is."

A gasp from Harcourt drew the men's attention to him. He stood leaning against the counter, breathing heavily, his face ghastly white.

Swain sprang to his assistance. "What is it, old fellow?" he asked anxiously.

Harcourt assured him that it was a sudden faintness produced by the heat; then meeting the keen eyes of Gonzales he blushed deeply. Swain thought no more of the incident, but Don Juan turned away with a cynical smile, murmuring "La belle Amorita."

Truth to tell, Will Harcourt, from the time he first opened the door leading to the Flores garden, had lived in a very torment. Possessed by an evil infatuation for the beautiful singer, his days were spent in remorse over his unfaithfulness to Madeline—whose letters lay unread and unanswered—and a determination to redeem his lost honour and free himself from the toils of the enchantress. But no matter what he might resolve, when night fell, and the silvery strains of her lute came softly through the adobe walls, he would hasten to the garden of Amorita. In her presence his doubts disappeared, but only to assail him with redoubled force when daylight came again, and he was forced to undergo the routine of his business.

The money he had carefully saved for Madeline was lavished upon Amorita. He believed what she told him, and, urged by her not to betray her hiding-place, he guarded the secret so jealously that even Swain never doubted him, but continually jested with him about his "hermit life," and his fidelity to Madeline. When he repeated to her Gonzales' story, she weepingly denied its truth, and at the sight of her lovely eyes filled with tears, Harcourt was ready to kill the man who had traduced her.

Time went on, until at last one day Will Harcourt awoke to the fact that he was ruined. A cheque given by him in payment of a bill had been refused at the Bank of Mexico. All the money he had toiled for had been cast in the lap of the siren. So far, he had been able to keep his secret from his friend, but now that would be impossible, and, after a long day of desperate conjecture, he resolved to bring matters to a crisis. He would throw himself at the feet of Amorita, beg her to marry him, and then join her brother in the mountains. By this act he knew he would dishonour himself for ever, but it would be better than his double life. Madeline's face rose before him, and he shuddered as he thought of her grief and broken heart. But the face of Amorita—alluring, beautiful, irresistible—drove all other thoughts away, and he determined to follow his desires.

As night drew on he paced restlessly up and down the patio, waiting for the sound of the lute, which was his signal to hasten to her side; but all was silent. Moments, hours dragged by, and still she did not call him. Finally, devoured by anxiety, he pushed open the hidden door, and followed the familiar way into the garden.

The patio was silent and deserted, the silver lamp unlit, but the moon, shining brightly, showed him the couch at the end, and it was empty.

He called her name. No answer but the echoes came. With growing alarm he searched the house; her lace mantilla lay where she had dropped it, but Amorita was not there.

Returning to the patio, he stood bewildered. The palms, the flowers were the same, the soft grasses strewn on the floor were undisturbed. The faint, subtle perfume, which was inseparable from Amorita, was in the air, but the lady had vanished. Something gleaning on the panther skins caught his eye. It was the lute which had first lured him to destruction, pinned with a small stiletto, and slipped under the strings was a note.

Hastily lighting the lamp he tore it open and read:

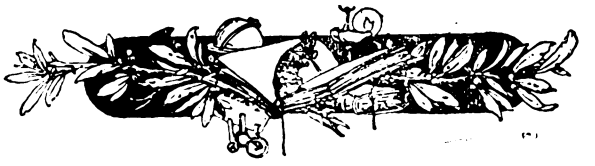
"Amigo mio: I go to the only man I could ever love, my brave José. To you who have made this possible I leave the lute you loved to hear in memory of your generosity. If that fails to compensate, there is the stiletto. Adios.

"AMORITA."

The paper fell from his hand, rustling softly. The unfilled lamp died down and went out. There was a sound of shrill discord, then—silence.

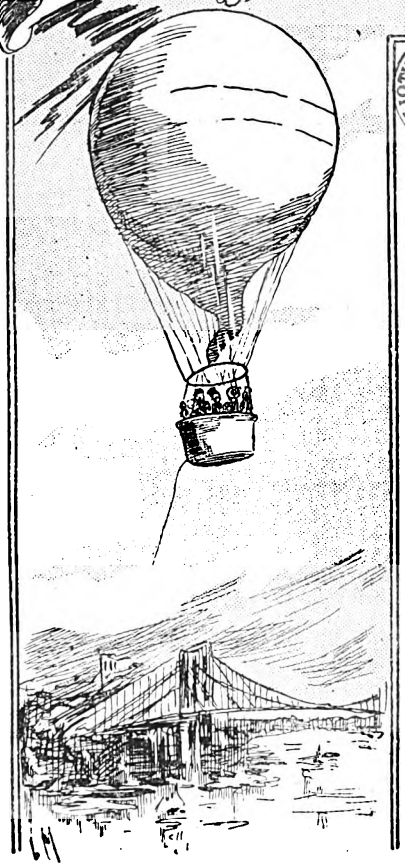
The first rays of the sun, peering merrily into the patio, fell upon Will Harcourt stretched upon the couch of Amorita with the dagger in his heart.

Beside him, rent and shattered, its spell gone for ever, lay the lute with silver strings.



Digitized by Google

A WEDDING IN THE AIR



"YOU cannot marry my daughter, young Bergen," Mr. Rowley declared. "until you are worth £8,000. £8,000 isn't a fortune, but it permits a man to start in life."

"Yes, sir," said I, standing, hat in hand, near his office desk in New York.

"Very well, young Bergen, go and make it, then," said old Rowley, "and after that ask me for Caroline Elizabeth."

"Yes, sir," said I, seizing my hat in a great hurry, as if I were going to cash a cheque for that amount instantly, for fear the bank would close, "and thank you very much."

"Kindly shut the door after you on account of the draught," responded old Rowley.

I did so, and then with a groan stalked out into the street. I did not possess 8,000 farthings. I had left England to make my fortune and I had not made it. I could look forward to making a decent salary and living on it, even putting a few pounds in a savings bank for a rainy day, and Caddie—that is what I called her—Caroline Elizabeth did not seem a bit like her to me—Caddie said she could keep house beautifully, and that she could be happy in the very cheapest flat that we shared together.

And now old Rowley commanded me to produce £8,000.

I would do anything, I thought, anything to get that sum of money, but when, where, how was it to be done?

Suddenly I ran violently into the arms of another man, who had stopped in the middle of the pavement to light a cigar.

"What the dickens—hullo, old boy, how d'ye do?" cried this person.

"Millett, by all that's wonderful!" said I; "I thought you were in South America."

"So I was," said he. "Gonzales and Ravello offered splendid terms for a five-year contract, but when I got down there I found the yellow fever in full blast. Boat came out to take us in; looked over the side, saw something sewn up in a sack floating about. 'What's that?' says I.

"'That, señor,' says the fellow that had come to fetch me, 'that, señor, is the Señor Jones, last head clerk of the respected Señors Gonzales and Ravello. He is dead of the yellow fever, and they no longer bury the dead, there are too many.'

"'That's the fellow who resigned his place and expected me to come and take it.'

"'I believe so, señor,' said he.

"'Ah, then you can take me back to the steamer,' said I; and here I am. Confoundedly disappointed, too. I counted on making £8,000 in these next five years."

"£8,000?" I repeated.

"Yes," said he. "But much good they'd do a fellow that was bobbing about the ocean in a sack."

"A man might not take the fever," said I.

"He might not," said Millett, "and then, again, he might."

"Have Gonzales and What's-his-Name got another head clerk yet?" asked I.

"Not they," said Millett. "There is a lot of commission as well as salary; as I said, a fellow might make £8,000 and £10,000 for himself—a fellow with a good connection. But what use——"

I did not stay to hear the rest.

With a brief "Good-bye," I rushed away, leaving Millett staring after me, sought the office of Gonzales and Ravello, and presented my credentials to the senior partner—a gentleman with round, black eyes rolling in orange-coloured seas, a round nose, and a quantity of straight, black hair, who was most affable, and learning that I spoke Spanish, received me with open arms.

"You may go at once," he said. "We need a new head clerk; ze former is a little indispose; he vish to retire. Matters are confuse in consequence. You are needed."

I remembered Millett's narrative, but did not repeat it.

"I will go," I said; "my object is to make money."

I signed the agreement, and proceeded to extract from Mr. Rowley a promise that if I returned at the end of five years with the sum he insisted upon, I should wed his daughter.

"Five years," old Rowley said, laughing. "Well, if she'll wait for you five years, I won't hinder her. I don't believe any girl will do that, though she may think she will. However, you show a proper spirit, and I know a man or two out there who will throw something in your way, and you can spend the evening with Caroline Elizabeth, if you like."

Caddie wept bitterly. She asked what use was anything at the end of five years. She wondered if I knew we should be dreadfully old by that time. She was sure I should fall in love with a black-eyed lady in a high comb and lace mantilla, and forget her. But she—oh! she would be true. She would be old and ugly, but as true as steel.

Digitized by Google

"Saw something sewn up in a sack floating away."

I was very unhappy myself, and I had added cause in my secret knowledge of the fate of my predecessor, Mr. Jones. But I pretended to be very hopeful.

"Only be true to me," I said—"only be true."

She wept in my arms as she repeated her promise; and I only saw her once more before I started, when she came to see me off. I reached my destination in safety, and found that I had secured a splendid position. The yellow fever was dying out; and, at all events, they were used to it there. I took every precaution, and I did not take the fever. In fact, I kept very well.

I began to make money. I wrote as often as circumstances would permit to Caddie, and our course of true love was running very well, considering, when I received a most frightful letter from old Rowley.

"Young Bergen," it began, "merely because I mentioned the well-known fact that he was a liar and a thief, that abominable, contemptible, cowardly, and untrustworthy sneak, your uncle Tomkins, has called me some of the most offensive names in the English language. I have pulled his nose, he has beaten me with his cane, which I have taken from him and broken over his confounded back. It all happened in the Stock Exchange before a thousand witnesses. He was taken home in an ambulance, and as soon as he is well enough I am going to have him sent to a convict prison for five years.

"After being so ill-used by your uncle, I, as every one knows, the most inoffensive, law-abiding gentleman in New York, must renounce the honour (?) and pleasure (?) of being connected with him by marriage, and forbid you to write or speak to my daughter again. I have made her take her oath that she will never marry you. I did it gently, though firmly; but she knows the value of an oath.

"O. ROWLEY."

"P.S.—She has begged me to permit her to write you a farewell letter of explanation. I have yielded to paternal weakness and permitted this. You must not reply,

"O. R."

Her oath. Old Rowley, who supposed he had brought up his family piously, had a habit of lugging out a large family Bible which he possessed, and making them swear all sorts of things upon it. Such an oath I felt sure my Caddie would never dare break. I read her letter with a sinking heart.

"Papa has told you all," she said. "I love you, and I never will marry anyone else. When he got out the family Bible I said at first, 'No, sir, if you please, I don't wish to be undutiful, but I will not.' When he locked me up on bread and water I still refused; but when he got his pistols, both of them loaded, and held one at either of my temples, and said he should curse me first and shoot me afterwards, and mamma called through the keyhole that she was dying of fright, I gave in.

"'Swear,' said papa, 'that you will not marry this young Bergen as long as you are upon this earth or sail upon the waters thereof. Swear it, Caroline Elizabeth, if you wish to live. Otherwise you die, with my curse on your head.'

"It was an awful scene, but I put my hand upon the Bible, and said, after him, 'I will not marry my Henry as long as I am upon this earth or sail upon the waters thereof, but I will love him until I die.'

"'Just as you please about that,' said papa. Then mamma had nervous prostration, and she is only just getting well, and I wish I were dead. Your broken-hearted

"CADDIE."

This was old Rowley's gentle firmness, then. He had made his daughter take the oath at the pistol's mouth.

I read the letter over a dozen times; that clause about the waters of the earth seemed to bar every way of escape.

Even mid-ocean would not seem to invalidate her vow to so conscientious a creature as my little Caddie.

I wrote to Caddie, despite her father's edict, but no answer ever came to me, and probably my letter never reached her.

At last, however, a New York paper brought tidings which, while they were tragic, were hopeful.

Mr. Rowley was dead. There was a glowing obituary notice of him in the columns, but I heard afterward that he died in a fit of rage, caused by a dinner that did not please him.

As soon as it was possible to do so I asked for a holiday, and returned to New York.

Reaching the great city, I flew at once to the residence of the late Mr. Rowley.

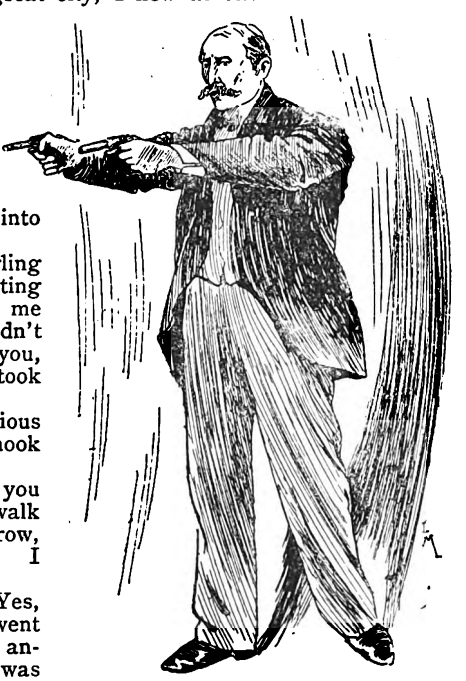
No one forbade me to enter the door, and soon Caddie, her eyes red with weeping, came to me in a black dress, and threw herself into my arms.

"Poor, dear, darling papa was just getting the Bible to make me swear that I wouldn't ever speak to you, when the angels took him," she said.

I looked as serious as possible, and shook my head.

"As he did not, you may take a little walk with me to-morrow, may you not?" I asked.

She answered, "Yes, dear," and I went away and made another call. It was upon a young clergy-



This was old Rowley's gentle firmness, then.

Digitized by Google

man. And when he learned my plans and heard my story, he agreed to my request.

It was the year 1879. Coney Island had but recently been transformed from a peaceful solitude to the land of hotels, booths, showmen, and concert halls that it has now become.

It was to Coney Island that I took Caddie, and there we met the Rev. Mr. Nutley, a young clergyman, who bowed and blushed and introduced us to his married sister and her husband, and his younger sister, who smiled and showed her dimples as though she knew a little secret.

We walked about the island, had lunch together, and bought milk of the milkmaids, who drew it iced from the monstrous effigy of a cow, in the kiosk.

"There is the captive balloon," said my friend, the clergyman, just then; "let us all go up in her."

There was a captive balloon that year at Coney Island, and it was a great attraction.

An ascent was about to be made. A short interview with the manager won us permission to have it for ourselves for half-an-hour. We stepped in it, ascended the ladder, screamed and clung to each other, and in a minute or two we saw the world far beneath us. We were no longer of it.

"If the cord should break!" gasped Mr. Nutley's sister.

Nobody made any addition to this remark. Suddenly I seized Caddie's hand.

"My dear betrothed wife, we are no longer upon the earth, nor are we upon the waters thereof. Our position absolves you from the oath you took upon the family Bible. You pledged yourself to nothing concerning the air. It was only land and water. I have consulted Mr. Nutley, who is an expert in such matters. Being a clergyman, he is willing to marry us while we are in this balloon. He knows all the circumstances."

"My dear Miss Rowley," said Mr. Nutley, "I feel that it is quite proper of you to take a literal view of an oath you took under compulsion. Your excellent father, I am sure, would have it so if he could send a message from a better world. We all have moments of passion, in which we do things of which we repent. I believe he has repented of offering you that oath, and I believe, being what it was, you may marry in the air with all propriety."

"We think so too," chorused our friends.

Then Caddie, blushing and weeping, drew off her little glove, and my friend Nutley united us in the holy bonds of matrimony, in the presence of witnesses.

How the news got about I do not know, but we were saluted with cheers as we descended to terra firma, and were mentioned in next day's paper as a couple who sought notoriety by being married in the captive balloon.

My readers, however, know the reason, and no one has ever blamed us for it.

A SOLDIER OF BRITTANY.

FROM THE FRENCH.

It was in the country, near the forest not far from the Seine, in the modest villa where I hoped to spend my old age, that I saw Jean de Thommeray for the first time. He was scarcely twenty-two. Some pages signed with my name had won his heart to me, and he presented himself with no other recommendation than his good appearance and his desire to know me. The sympathy of the young has an irresistible attraction. It is very sweet to be able to draw them when one is approaching the autumn of life. I was the more willing to give him a welcome that I could do so without any effort, for he was really charming.

It was a clear April day. We walked together in the woods of Meudon. Though many years divided us, we conversed like two friends. He had generous impulses, holy illusions; all the happy and ardent feelings of his age.

Thanks to the confidences he gave me without my asking, I soon found out all about him. His father, who came of a good old Breton family, had studied in Paris, in the days when patriotism and liberty ranked as high as letters and arts among the young men of modern ideas.

The Breton gentleman felt the influences of this awakening in the flood of thought, and, without giving up the traditions of honour in his family, he set sail with the current. He loved, with a pure, delicate, romantic love, a poor girl of good family, of Irish descent, and he married her. When his studies were ended, he went back to Brittany.

Here Monsieur de Thommeray lived, like his forefathers, the life of a country gentleman—hunting, riding horseback, visiting his neighbours, improving his land; while his wife—"la belle Irlandaise," as they called her—gave herself up to domestic affairs, and governed with grace and authority. Though he had taken root in this primitive life, he was faithful to the tastes and inclinations of his youthful days. He never went beyond the circle of his remembrances, and for him nothing beyond them seemed to exist. Time, which never stops, had apparently forgotten him on the way.

It was a happy family, he, his wife, and his three sons. The elder and the second son showed no taste for study or literature, but Jean, the little one, more delicate than his brothers, grew up, under his mother's gentle wing, with a strong sense of the beauties and harmonies of creation and a love of books. While his brothers walked and rode over the farm, and led a hardy, rustic life, Jean read, dreamed, or composed little Breton poems that his mother proudly compared to Moore's "Irish Melodies," and that excited the admiration of his father. His brothers, too, were proud of his gifts and his charming ways, and even of his weakness when a little fellow, for that seemed to claim their protection.

But one morning, not long before the time I first met him, Jean embraced them all and set out for Paris, filled with the same illusions that his father had had before him.

Two or three years passed. I did not know what had become of Jean. I supposed that he must have left Paris, and that he was living peacefully in his father's home. He had evidently forgotten me. I was not surprised at that. As for me, I thought of him from time to time. A journey I made into Brittany revived in my heart the memory of my young friend, when I learned one day that I was only a few leagues from the Manor of Thommeray. I arrived at nightfall at the house I loved to think of as the asylum of happiness. I found the family assembled, and, not seeing Jean, naturally I asked for him. M. de Thommeray answered me briefly. "Monsieur," he said, "we have only two sons now—these whom you see. We never speak of the one we have lost."

Was Jean dead? No; the attitude of M. de Thommeray, his voice, his language, and his gesture were not those of a father who has buried his son. During my visit his mother found an opportunity of speaking to me alone. She told of her son and of the sorrow he had brought upon them—how he had compromised himself, falling lower and lower from day to day, in the wicked world of Paris, and how his family no longer looked upon him as their own. She made me promise to go to see him, to write to her and to let her know how he lived, to hide nothing from her. Could this be the same Jean de Thommeray whom I had known? How could he have fallen so low from the heights where I had left him?

I went back to Paris. I found him living in richly-furnished apartments, and he held out his hand to me with an easy grace, as if he had not a pang in the world—as if the luxury, in the midst of which I had surprised him, had been bought by the efforts of a glorious and honest labour, instead of the fruits of the gaming-table. He began to excuse himself for having so long neglected me.

Digitized by Google

"All that is excused," I said. "I have come from Brittany, where I saw your parents, and as you have always spoken of them with respect, I am only fulfilling a duty when I come to tell you of the sad state in which I found them——"

"Thanks, monsieur, you need not go on." He interrupted me calmly and with a tone of great urbanity. "It is nothing new that you tell me. My way of living is a subject of scandal and trouble to my family. My brothers disown me, my mother weeps in secret, my father no longer knows me. Well, sir, be my judge. I am not a saint. Not being able to reform the age as once I thought of doing, you remember, I have ended by adopting its ways and wearing its livery. It seems to me that in a society where money is a god, not to be rich would be an impiety. I have played, I do not deny it, and I have always won. By my skilful playing I keep up the state of the house and belongings I won by my luck. My parents lived according to the manner of their time. I live according to the ways of my own."

It was sad to hear this young man exult in his fall and glory in his ruin. All about him betrayed the habits of the life he now led. His very smile, once so sweet and clear, had a cold expression like the hard lustre of steel. He told me his story, how he had been basely deceived and robbed of his last centime by a woman whom he thought deserving of his heart's devotion, in spite of his mother's penetration, which had sounded the depths of unworthiness in the character hidden beneath the charms of beauty and an artless manner; how, when he came to his senses, his youth was dead, and a new and a worse man had come to life within him. He believed no more in anything good.

"There are no longer any women!" he said.

"You are mistaken," I replied. "We have mothers, sisters, friends, wives, who every day and every hour quietly accomplish miracles of goodness, devotion, and charity. Society is not as bad as you think; but you, you, sir, are much worse than I feared. Still, why not return to your family, who are grieving for you? Your youth is not dead; it is waiting for you there."

"It is too late! I must confess to you that since my sojourn at Baden the gambling fever has never left me. Let us live and enjoy ourselves; after us, the deluge? It is now my hour for the Bourse, and, to my regret, I am obliged to leave you."

"One word more," I said, rising. "Until now you have been successful; but fortune will not always be on your side. What will you do when she betrays you? For that day will surely come."

"Let it come. I am ready!"

"You will kill yourself," I said. He did not answer. "And God?——and your mother?" After a moment's hesitation, he held out his hand. I took it.

A few days after this I wrote to Madame de Thommeray and gave an account of my interview with Jean. I did not try to see him again. Other thoughts occupied me. War was declared. The enemy was already marching on Paris; the world was filled with the noise of our disasters.

Whoever did not see Paris during the last days of the siege cannot form an idea of the physiognomy of the city at that time. The confusion and flight brought on by the first news of our defeat gave way to manly thoughts and noble resolves. Every one was ready for great sacrifices.

One morning, on the Quai Voltaire, between the Pont-Royal and the Pont des Saints-Pères, I met Jean, face to face.

"At last!" I said, greeting him. "And you have stayed?"

"Yes, I have stayed here," he replied. "I was obliged to look after my fortune. Now it is all arranged. I have drawn out all my money, and I leave this evening to go and live in a foreign land."

"You are going away!" I exclaimed. "When your country is in agony, you think of leaving her?"

"My country, monsieur! The wise man carries his country wherever he goes. You, yourself, what are you doing here?"

"I have not returned only to go away again. I am not worth much; but here I have known good and bad days. Paris has given me whatever good I have in me. I wish to share her dangers, if only by my presence. I will live in her emotions, I will help to bear her anguish; and if we suffer hunger, I shall have the honour of suffering with her. But you, Jean de Thommeray! But you! I knew you were changed for the worse, but I did not think you were fallen so low.

"The land is invaded—and you, a young man, instead of seizing a musket, catch hold of your pocket-book! The fortunes of France are on the verge of ruin, and you have no other care than to realise your future. To-morrow the enemy will be at our gates, and you strap up your valise and fly like a coward! It was not enough to have plunged your family into mourning and despair. You must inflict this shame, too, upon them!"

A quick flush rose to his forehead. A light shone in his eyes.

"Pardon, monsieur, pardon. These are very grand words, it seems to me. You are too old and I am too young for us to understand each other. I am not running away. I am going away. There is nothing here to keep me. Paris does not interest me. It is only just that she should be punished. As for my family, they are safe enough from the dangers of war, and I do not see why I should be forbidden to seek for myself —in Brussels, or in London, or Florence—the peace and security they enjoy in Brittany."

My heart was sick and disgusted. I turned away, when suddenly Jean started with surprise. "Listen!" he said. I listened, and heard a strange music, the tones of which, vague at first and indistinct, grew louder and louder, and seemed to be coming towards us. I looked, too, as I listened.

I saw beyond the bridge of Solferino an immense crowd, who came on singing. It was a slow, grave chant, almost religious, and had nothing in common with the bursts of song to which we were accustomed. Jean leaned against the parapet. I saw that he was very pale. In the meantime, the confused mass approached nearer and nearer, and became less and less confused. The gardes mobiles of Finisterre were entering Paris.

The head of the column is now only a few steps from us. It is my turn to be startled. I look at Jean. His hand falls upon mine. "My father! My two brothers!" he says in a low voice. And he sees passing before him, under their most striking forms, the eternal truths that he has so long disowned or forgotten—God, country, duty, and family! The long pageant of his honest and noble days defiled before him singing as the troops go by. I give him the last blow. On one of the balconies of the quai I have just seen his mother.

"You unfortunate fellow!" I exclaim. "You said there were no longer any women. Look, there is one. Do you recognise her?"

Madame de Thommeray waves her handkerchief; the Breton chant redoubles in fervour, and the chief of the battalion, with the courtesy of a knightly gentleman, bows in his saddle, and salutes her with his sword. Mute and motionless, with sad eyes and dry eyelids, Jean seems turned to stone. I leave him to the mercy of God.

The next day, in the courtyard of the Louvre, the Commandant de Thommeray called the roll of his battalion. The call finished, he passed down the ranks, when a soldier stepped out and said:

"Commandant, one of your men was forgotten."

"What is your name?"

"My name is Jean," answered the volunteer, lowering his eyes.

"Who are you?"

"A man who has lived badly."

"What do you wish?"

"To die well."

"Are you rich or poor?"

"Yesterday I possessed an ill-gotten fortune. I have resigned it voluntarily. I have only my musket and my knapsack."

"That is well." And with a gesture he ordered the young man to return to the ranks. There was a long silence. The Commandant had again taken his place in front of the battalion. "Jean de Thommeray!" he called out.

A manly voice answered, "Present!"

Digitized by Google

THE NORWEGIAN BRIG.

IT was during the Empire, when Napoleon was knocking the kings right and left. The Englishmen had blockaded all the French ports, and privateering was almost impossible, for a cruise was pretty sure to come to an end in the Plymouth Prison.

So nearly all the French ships lay sunning themselves at their moorings, like so many rotten old hulks.

But a few Frenchmen were still cruising on the high seas, and giving the Englishmen an occasional shot by way of revenge and in order to keep in practice. One of these was Captain Kerkof, a true Breton, hard-featured and swarthy; stiff as a handspike, thirsty as a cook, and jolly as a midshipman.

He was a good Christian withal, for he never failed to have mass said on leaving port, and had given one of his richest prizes to the chapel of St. Barbe—all of which did not prevent his being leader of a crew of sharks and the greatest scoundrel of the lot.

Kerkof, then, in spite of the Englishmen, was roaming the North Sea in his pretty schooner, the Sans Quartier, with his eye on the wind and his hands in his own pockets, in default of others.

It was a day of dense fog, and the horizon was shadowy, but suddenly the captain saw the ghostly form of a brig cleaving the fog, and standing on a course nearly parallel to his own.

At the same moment the look-out cried, "Sail on the starboard quarter!"

"What fool of a skipper dares come within gunshot of the Sans Quartier?" roared Kerkof. "If he's an Englishman, we'll give him a trip to France for the good of his health. Come, my lads, clear the decks! Crowd all sail and send the stranger our card, for we privateers must be polite, above all else."

The next instant a ball from one of the schooner's guns plunged through the fog and pierced the rigging of the mysterious brig.

There was a moment of suspense, but the stranger had evidently understood this polite invitation to show her colours, for a small English flag soon ran up a halyard, and fluttered at the brig's peak.

"Good!" cried Kerkof, calmly filling his pipe; "to your guns, my lads, but don't fire until I give the word."

The Sans Quartier changed her course slightly, and bore down upon her prey with outspread wings, like a cormorant.

The situation of the brig seemed desperate, as the point for which she was making would evidently be reached by the Sans Quartier at the same time, so that the stranger was running straight into the range of her formidable adversary's guns.

She kept on her course, however, and as she grew more distinct an expression of wonder overspread the faces of Kerkof and his crew.

"What kind of ship is that?" said the captain. "Did you ever see such a rig, my lads? She doesn't carry sail enough to cross a mill-pond in a week, you'd say, but there she goes making a good twelve knots before our eyes! I'll be hanged if I can understand it!"

The crew answered only by nods and oaths, and the like symptoms of surprise and terror.

But the preparations for attack went on, and the gunners stood at their posts with lighted matches.

"Attention!" suddenly cried Kerkof, springing into the nettings. "Ship or shadow, we'll send a volley into her. Now we're in line. Ready, men? Fire!"

A terrible detonation shook every timber of the San Quartier.

When the smoke cleared away, the men gazed in amazement at the spot where the brig had been.

She had vanished! Not a vestige of her to be seen!

"Sunk!" cried a dozen voices.

"Silence, fools!" roared Kerkof.

With an air of stupefaction he scanned the sea in all directions. All eyes followed his, and soon there rose a chorus of oaths, for the brig, dimly seen through the fog, was scudding away, far to larboard and with all sails furled.

"Fire again!" cried Kerkof, in a hoarse, unnatural voice.

The second broadside was given with less precision than the first, for the strange sight had lured some of the gunners from their posts.

The brig was too far away to be affected by the ragged volley, and was soon lost to sight in the fog.

Kerkof, leaning against the nettings, was still staring in amazement at the spot where she had vanished, when the boatswain's voice roused him from his stupor.

"Captain!"

"Well?"

"Captain, did you see that brig?"

"Of course I did, you idiot!"

"Well, Captain, she is the very one we sunk in the Channel a year ago this blessed day."

"What!"

"Yes, Captain, a year ago to-day. It was Good Friday, you know. Perhaps the crew were not prepared for death, and they have come back to ask our prayers for the repose of their souls."

"You are an idiot!"

"Well, may be I am, Captain."

The old sailor retired, slowly shaking his head, and Kerkof resumed his reverie.

The sun went down, and the privateer kept on her course with a favouring wind.

Suddenly the men, who had been discussing the strange occurrence, set up a great shout.

Kerkof raised his head and recoiled in astonishment.

Close on the port bow stood the strange brig, with all sails furled, but keeping even pace with the schooner. A torrent of smoke and flame poured from a great black cylinder amidships.

"The brig!" gasped a voice near Kerkof.

"To your guns and fire!" shouted he.

The terrible brig seemed to have heard this hoarse and broken command, for she bounded forward, crossed the schooner's bows, and soon disappeared to starboard.

She passed so close to the Sans Quartier that the roaring of the flames was heard, and through the port-holes was seen a fiercely-blazing fire, with fantastic human figures moving about in its ruddy light.

Not a word was spoken aboard the Frenchman. The crew fell on their knees. For full ten minutes Kerkof knelt, with head bared, and his rosary in his hands.

Several days later the Sans Quartier made Breton port. Kerkof and his crew never knew what had frightened them so badly, but about this time the English newspapers announced the arrival at London of a steamboat hailing from Norway.

This was the first vessel propelled by steam that had traversed the waters.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid :—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

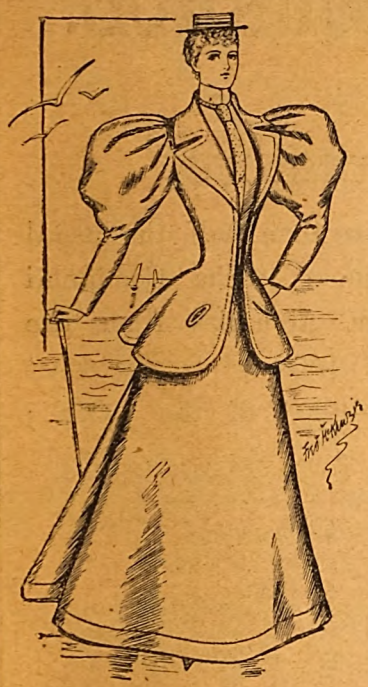
Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ANOTHER GREAT SUCCESS!

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the World, AT LESS THAN HALF ORDINARY PRICES.

OVER EIGHT HUNDRED WORKERS EMPLOYED.



The most remarkable of all the costumes that have ever been produced is the one here illustrated; it is undoubtedly the most popular style of the season, and has been generally adopted as

A LADY'S HOLIDAY SUIT.

These Suits are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.) in Navy Blue or Black. Also in fashionable Grey or Drab Homespun mixtures, and Navy or Drab Twill Drill, each suit consisting of a smart shape open coat or jacket—stylishly cut, beautifully made with two pockets, and finished all round edge of coat with special quality silk cord—together with a wide bell-shape costume skirt trimmed to match jacket. The jacket fits closely to the back of the figure, and remains gracefully open in front. These two garments, viz., 15/-

JACKET AND SKIRT COMPLETE

form at once a smart, stylish, and yet most useful outfit for wearing with a blouse or cambric shirt, and are offered for the amazingly low price of 15/-. Ladies are asked to consider what this means: A really well-made fashionable outfit that any lady might be pleased to wear, made without the slightest approach to sweating, and yet supplied complete

FOR FIFTEEN SHILLINGS.

Every garment is made in the firm's arge, airy, and perfectly appointed workrooms, and is surely value that will please every lady in the land.

When ordering please state measurement across back from shoulder to shoulder, also length from neck to waist at back. The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 ins. round bust under arms. Larger or special sizes 1/6 extra. Each suit is packed in strong leather board box, and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

made from the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Reseda, Tan, Ruby, Grey, or Drab. The Costume consists of extra wide Bell Skirt (40 ins. long) and improved Blouse Bodice, well made and finished, the Bodice pleated back and front, with full fashionable sleeves and belt. The lower part of skirt, and cuffs, and collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed rows of narrow Russia Braid, the whole thus forming a Lady's Complete Costume for 10/6. The Half-Guinea Costumes are also supplied in Brown Linen Holland, and in Navy or Drab Twill Drill, at the same price. Sizes kept in stock fit any figure up to 38 ins. round bust under arms. Larger sizes 1/6 extra. Each Costume packed in box, and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

10/6

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES,

Made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, or Brown Linen Holland, and consisting of stylish Blouse Bodice and extra wide Skirt, trimmed Russia brade, are now offered at the low price of 8/9. Packed in box and sent carrage paid for 9d. extra. The skirt is made in two sizes—viz., 33 ins. or 36 ins. long. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Ruby, Reseda, or Tan. When ordering please state whether skirt is required 33 ins. or 36 ins. long.

8/9

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS

From 1/6 each.

FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, or Brown Linen Holland, with saddle top, long full sleeves, belt and pocket, at the following low prices:—

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45	ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6	each.

Postage 4½d. extra. The lengths stated are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

☞ PATTERNS, also Illustrated "Book of the Serge," and Fashion Sheet of other Costumes for Ladies' and Children's Wear sent POST FREE to any reader of Short Stories on application.

NOBLE'S NOVELTIES IN DRESS FABRICS For early Autumn wear. New and exclusive designs, fabrics, and colourings, specially produced for wear during the Autumn of 1894. Hundreds of novel and artistic effects, double widths at prices ranging from 7½d. to 4/6 the yard. Large Box, containing over 1,000 New Patterns sent post free on approval to any address. Every lady who would dress well at the smallest cost should certainly see these patterns, and when writing ask for a Large Box.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS
FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

For Tradesmen's Windows, Fascias, Signs, or Tablets. The durability, elegance, and striking brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the Most Effective Medium of all kinds of indoor and outdoor advertisements. Enamelled Iron Plates. Swinging signs in great variety. Call and see our stock, or send for price lists.—Near the Farringdon Road Station.—Inventors and Manufacturers. Agents wanted.

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists 2d. per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 4 GOLD MEDALS and 22 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from
THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

BALDNESS CURED

in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

MELVILLE'S
NEW UPRIGHT
GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, Charing Cross Road, London.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM :—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland :—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL—"THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR"
(By GEORGE GRIFFITH, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," and "The Syren of the Skies.")

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 298.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 15, 1894. [Price One Penny.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH AND LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.

Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each,

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BEETHAM'S WORLD FAMED CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists, CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

THREE HALF CROWNS

IT IS A STARTLING FACT

that Three Half-Crowns (7/6) will purchase a beautiful SERGE DRESS LENGTH in any of the following colours:—Black, Blue, Brown, Green, Claret, Nut Brown, Chestnut, Mulberry, Ruby, Red, Moss, Olive, Myrtle, Bronze, &c., also several very pretty and effective mixtures.

Full Dress Length (Carriage Paid) FOR 7/6

Money returned if not approved.

20,000 Sets of Patterns now ready, write at once. Patterns are sent Post Free and need not be returned.

These beautiful Serges are specially manufactured for Autumn and Winter wear, elegant in appearance and are not heavy as most Serges are. They will not spot with rain or wear threadbare.

£5,000 to be Given Away in Presents to Purchasers.

Thousands of Testimonials from all parts of the World.

Cloth Table Covers, 2 yds. square, 4s. 9d. each, in Crimson, Claret, Tan, or Emerald. Remnant Bundles of Serge, 5s. and 10s. each, carriage paid. Write to-day for Patterns of Dress Materials, post free to any address. (Dept 21.)

LUTAS LEATHLEY & CO., The Dress Warehouse, Armley, Leeds.

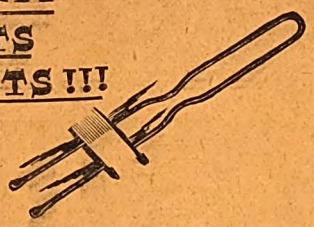
PREVENTS COLDS AND CHILLS

BOVRIL

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST STOCK FOR SOUP.

Digitized by Google

A HAIR PIN
WITHOUT POINTS HAS GOOD POINTS !!!
SEE THE POINT ?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD. AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES. BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

MELVILLE'S
NEW UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTE
26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. It has all the latest improvements. Price 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

HAIR REMOVED permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W C

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

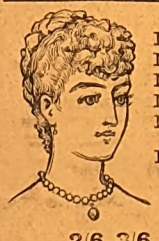
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide, 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866 N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades ESTIMATES FREE.

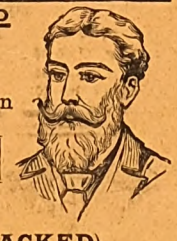
FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES, & Cº



(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

MELVILLE'S
NEW UPRIGHT
GRAND PIANOFORTE
GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

MELVILLE, 61, Charing Cross Road, London.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES
TO No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:— LADIES
TO "By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise. LADIES
TO A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case. LADIES
TO Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope. LADIES
TO Write privately to— LADIES
TO Mrs. P. S. S., LADIES
TO 145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W. LADIES

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS MIXTURE.
The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

If you have
ECZEMA
OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from
THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

A BOON TO LADIES
Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 298.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 15, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A DAUGHTER OF THE DESERT.

A CARAVAN was plodding southward, long ago, over the glistening sand, under the torturing sun, crossing the great desert between Persia and India. The path was plainly marked by white and bleaching bones.

There were skeletons at every feast, no matter where they spread their mats; for this was the great highway between the old world of Persia and the newly conquered realm of India.

The caravan was as mixed as a caravan could be. It was a combination of small families and individuals, making the journey together for mutual protection against the Thugs and Brinjari who infested the desert. Each family lived and moved by itself, holding little intercourse with the rest, except in time of danger, when they united under a common chief.

Among the poorest yet most exclusive of the pilgrims was a family of three—a father, mother, and boy of five years. Very often they looked sadly backward; then, as if struggling to gather hope from the opposite direction, they looked forward again, over that interminable gleam of sand.

All that they possessed was borne upon the back of one donkey and yet his burden was so light that the mother rode beside it. It was nothing, in fact, but a bag of grain on one side for the donkey, a sack of maize meal on the other, with a bunch of red peppers, for the family, and the mutual goat-skin of water between them.

The mother, sitting behind the water-cask, was a beautiful Persian woman; frail and delicate, and very different from what one would expect to find upon the desert with a mixed caravan. The father, a tall and powerful man, walked beside the donkey, and much of the time the boy sat upon his shoulders.

These shoulders were so broad and strong that the little fellow could not imagine himself to be any possible burden; his black eyes were merry, and his red lips laughed, and the plume on his turban bobbed about as he tossed his head, as proud as any king upon a royal throne. And it was, indeed, a throne that was royal, little as he or any one else, except the woman riding upon the donkey, dreamed of such a thing. In truth, however, he was sitting upon the shoulders of the crown prince of Persia.

Serious complications had arisen between the royal family and various factions of the government, endangering the life of the little prince, and since he was two years old he had been carefully hidden. Even the boy himself was kept in ignorance of his rank. The secret escaped, at last, and his life was again in peril. His parents' only hope lay in removing him to some distant land. They thought of India; and rather than trust the precious charge to others, they went themselves, disguised as pilgrims, in the mixed caravan.

All Rights Reserved

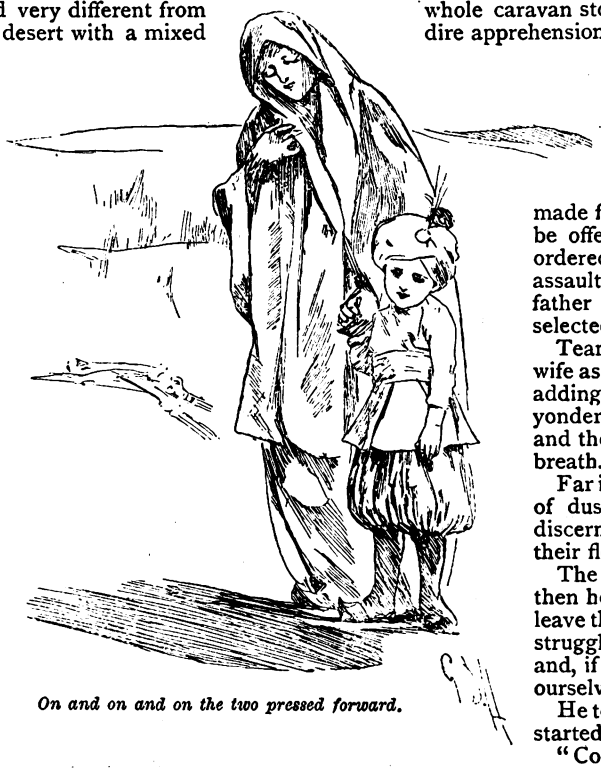
It was the eighth day of their journey, and but six days remained. "Have courage, Light of My Eyes," the man said to his wife. "More than the half is behind us, and better days lie beyond this desert sand. Thy face is sadder than its wont. Thou art not so well to-day."

"I am as well, Dearest Breath of My Body," she replied, laying her hand tenderly upon her husband's shoulder, while the boy, sitting upon the other shoulder, leaned over, behind his father's head, to caress it. "I am as well; but I dreamed a dream last night, three times repeated. I stood in the desert, with our son. I leaned upon a staff, and he on me. Out of the South there came a mighty hand and grasped the staff."

The mother shuddered, and for a moment clung, trembling, to her husband's shoulder. Then in a faltering voice she continued, "I gave one cry to Allah, as I fell, and lo! an angel stood beside me and each time, in my dream, I heard him say, 'Fear not. Thou must go hence, but I shall abide.'"

The husband tried to comfort her, but he too was troubled. In his day and country a dream thrice repeated assumed the importance of a message from the Most High.

Late in the afternoon the mother touched her husband, and silently pointed to the south, where a little cloud lay just above the horizon. He shaded his eyes from the fierce glare, and watched it anxiously as he walked. Others seeing him did the same, till soon, without a word of command, the whole caravan stood still, watching that cloud in dire apprehension.



On and on and on the two pressed forward.

It came from the desert, not the sky. It grew rapidly larger, and came directly toward them. It was not caused by the wind; neither was it a peaceful caravan. In great commotion and consternation, preparations were made for such feeble defence as could be offered. The strongest men were ordered to the front, to receive the first assault, and of course the stalwart father was one of the first to be selected.

Tears stood in the eyes of his frail wife as she bravely said farewell to him, adding, "I fear it is my dream, for yonder hand cometh from the south, and thou art my staff, my heart and my breath."

Far in the distance, beneath the cloud of dust, keen eyes could now easily discern the forms of armed men, urging their fleet horses over the sand.

The husband hesitated for a moment, then he replied: "Fear not. I will not leave thee. It will be a hopeless struggle. We might as well go on, and, if danger comes to us, face it by ourselves."

He took the bridle of the donkey and started forward.

"Coward!" cried the leader of the caravan, seeing that he did not obey, "Go forward as I bid thee and help the guard."

Digitized by Google

"I have my own to protect, and for it I ask no help from thee," the father replied calmly, and, to the astonishment of every one, he went out alone upon the desert with the two he loved.

He urged the donkey forward at its utmost speed, but they were still near enough to hear the savage yells as the robbers came upon the caravan. They did not dare look back, but it was easy to understand the sounds which reached them; the clash of arms, the shrieks of the dying, the yell of the victor, the groan of the victim, the silence of triumph, as when the vulture begins to glut himself upon his prey.

Harder and faster the father urged the donkey till at last the dumb animal, utterly exhausted, lay down upon the sand and refused to move.

"Take the boy with thee, my Sun and my Moon," the father said, in a choking voice. "Go as fast and as far as thy strength will bear thee. If the animal will not move, then I will take the food and water from his back and follow as quickly as I may. It may be that the robbers will not care to come after us, and if they do, they will not go beyond the burden, which is all they seek. Go! It was for him we started. It is for him that we struggle now. Go, and Allah be by thy side."

It was not a time for words. The wife looked into her husband's eyes, knowing well that it was for the last time; but she looked at their little boy and, silently taking his hand, turned forward again, upon the path marked by whitening skeletons.

On and on and on the two pressed forward, as long as their strength held out.

They walked, they ran. They rested for a moment, and then toiled on again. The rolling sand-hills soon hid the objects behind them from their view, and the sand shrubs rose above them. No sound, no sign came from behind, and when the red sun sank into the sea of sand, the mother fell prostrate, under a dry and crackling sage bush, alone in the desert with her son. There was a wild gleam in her dark eyes as they looked upon the boy beside her. The lips were parched that tried to speak to him. The hand was cold as ice that caressed him, as he lay upon the sand, with his head upon her arm, and slept.

Hour after hour those eyes, too full of agony for tears, watched the stars as they flashed and sparkled. Hour after hour the ears were strained to catch the sound of the footfall of the man she loved, in a desperate hope against the surest conviction that the Hand from the South had taken away the staff. Hour after hour, in bitterest agony, she saw the night drag out its cold and silent length, and morning dawned.

Looked down upon her two little ones.

Fiery and red, as when it set, the sun came up out of the great, lifeless sea, and the boy opened his eyes. He turned to his mother. She was lying upon the sand, at a little distance. Her eyes were open, but she was only partially conscious. She did not notice him. He crept towards her. What was it she was holding in her arms? Could it be an angel? He had listened while she told her dream, and had understood more than his parents supposed. He realised that his father had been taken away and that his mother had fallen upon the desert. Could that be the angel? He heard the plaintive wail of a little baby girl, pleading for nourishment which the mother could not give, and wondered if it could be the voice of an angel, saying, "Fear not. Thou must go hence, but I shall abide."

The tortures of the day were over at last, but it was only that the tortures of another night might begin. The stars were like flashing darts to pierce them. Cold and white the moonlight flooded the wide expanse of death. Throughout the day no groan or murmur had escaped from the pale lips of the mother, but as the night came on, she breathed one deep, quivering sigh, and, slowly rising, looked down upon her two little ones.

She felt the icy chill of death creeping over her. She could not lie there dead between them. She took off her long sarai, and bound it about the baby girl. She took off her only remaining garment, and laid it gently over the boy. "She is thy sister," she whispered in his ear. "Allah will help thee to guard her until I come again."

Kneeling on the sand, with her face toward Mecca, she touched her forehead to the ground, and the little boy remembered afterward that she said, "Thou knowest they are a prince and a princess, born to the throne of Persia. They are thine. Do with them as thou wilt." Then she rose to her feet and, weak and tottering, walked slowly away from them.

That was the last that was ever known of her.

In a stupor, between death and sleep, the little ones lay till the sun was ready to rise again; when out of the desert there came another caravan, moving as they had been moving, from Persia toward India.

There was no mixture of elements about this caravan. Gold and jewels glistened upon the camel trappings. Swords and shields and spears shone and flashed in the early morning light. The camels were young and fleet, and the swift-footed dromedaries seemed almost to glide along the glistening surface.

Why not? The lord of the caravan was the great sheik, Selim Christi, prime minister of Akbar, the Emperor of India. He was returning from a royal embassage to the throne of Persia, and the great white camel which bore him, in the midst of the royal guard, was passing the sage bush when a faint wail from the folds of the swaddled sarai attracted his attention. He lifted his hand. The entire caravan halted, and at his command soldiers opened the sarai and discovered Allah's treasure hidden there.

The children were given in charge of the women of the caravan, and soldiers were detailed to guard them. Their lives were staked upon the lives of the two to whom Selim Christi offered his protection, and when that gorgeous caravan swept through the marble gate of Futthepore Sackri, the magnificent capital where Akbar reigned in all his glory, the children were rapidly gaining health and strength

They were at once taken into the royal harem, though nothing was known of their parentage; for the secret which had been disclosed to the boy in his mother's prayer only became impressed upon him as he recalled it, again and again, in the years that followed, and treasured it in his heart till, later in life, he had an opportunity to prove it true.

Under the powerful patronage of the prime minister the boy grew and prospered. The blood of monarchs flowing in his veins spoke for itself, and when his patron died he took his place as second only to the Emperor of India. He married the daughter of his preserver, and became the father of the world-renowned Nur Mahal, wife of the Emperor Shah Jehan, the woman whose tomb, the Taj Mahal at Agra, is known, wherever that which is beautiful is admired, as the finest specimen of architecture in the wide, wide world to-day; while the Desert's daughter, the little sister whom he defended, the angel who came to his mother, well fulfilled the promise of the dream. She did abide, not only for her time but for all time; for she was Lalla Rookh, the heroine of Tom Moore's immortal poem.

Digitized by Google

The Frost Lily

MIDSUMMER WAKA had come. This is the greatest festival of the year among the Norse peasantry, and in Vik, the cluster of little houses which nestle in the bend of a great fjord, the vigil of St. John's Eve was kept with dancing, and drinking and song. The old belief of the Northmen, that those born near the sound of many waters are endowed with a natural gift of music, made the Vik fiddlers sought far and wide for the June merry-making of St. John's fête; and before many houses in the little village the Wolmar fire burned brightly in token of the noisy betrothal within.

Somewhat removed from the gaiety and revels of the night, the small white dwellings of old Liof Thure nestled in the long grasses full of clover-blooms, with a gravel-pathed garden at one side, overflowing with old-fashioned pink and white rose trees, and a long white fence at the other, leading down to a quay and the tossing green fjord, which looked violet-black in the shadows of the night.

The family of Thure was an old one, and had lived in this same spot for generations, looking at the grand, grey, fir-clad mountains and the wild, moss-grown boulders, and listening to the wash of the great water against the little landing-stage. The present occupants of the place were old Liof, who had never known a day's variation from his accustomed routine in his life-time; his six yellow-haired, strong-limbed sons, who looked like nothing so much as pictures of the old Norse Vikings: and the pride of her father's heart, sweet, imperious Gerda, the acknowledged beauty of Vik, who looked at him with her mother's eyes and face, and spoke to him in the tones of the woman whose life had gone out eighteen years ago, when she gave to her husband the girl-baby for whom he had so longed.

Gerda was wilful, spoiled, and tantalising. Her brothers had lost all patience with her, because she had laughed in the face of every honest fellow who would have married her, and because she loved many strange things that had no beauty to the sons of Liof Thure; the magpies, which are as much a part of Norse scenery as the invariable birches and pines; the blue gentians of the snow-capped heights; the yellow and white water-lilies of the Norwegian tarns, and the lady-ferns, which the first cold snow-winds of winter tinged with bright scarlet.

She gave to the wind and the weather the love that should have been a husband's, and worshipped the swift, wild rain which made the moss and ferns so lovely, and the flashing of the waters and the brilliant heavens above them when the sun went down. She loved to paddle her boat idly about the shores of the fjord, watching the colours deepening in the sky, and the gloom which spreads itself over all nature as the day dies, when she should have been merrymaking instead with some Norse lover, after the fashion of her people.

Of admirers, who would have willingly become something dearer, she had had more than any other maiden in Vik. She was bright, with an intelligence far beyond the average Scandinavian girl, such as was that of Hörsberg, the peasant painter of Sweden. She loved nature with all the consciousness of the Greek and the passion of the German; but she was practical and well-skilled in the arts which attract a Norse husband. She could prepare the flesh of the reindeer most deliciously with cream, which is used so lavishly in Norwegian cookery; she knew the concoction of each of the many cheeses beloved of the Scandinavian; she could bake great round ryecakes a foot and a half in diameter, and so flavour and dry them for the winter that they were like confections; and the large attic chamber of her father's house was hung around with her wardrobe, most of which was her own handiwork; snow-white wool aprons with brilliant red borders, linens, coloured prints, embroidered bodices, deer-skin coats, snow shoes and winter boots; for Liof was a well-to-do peasant, and had brought up his daughter in the belief that plenty and cleanliness in the matter of raiment elevated the Norwegian woman above her Swedish sister.

But to-night there was no sound of joy from the white house so close to the fjord. No light gleamed from the windows, and a hush seemed to have settled over the place, in marked contrast to the revels of the neighbourhood. Sweet-smelling odours of fragrant new-made hay filled the air, and a savage looking cow, which wore a collar and a tinkling bell, was wandering home from the far-off fields, and was the only sign of life about the Thure homestead.

Old Liof had gone for a visit with two Norwegians just returned from a fifteen-years' sojourn in the western states of America. They found old Norway very slow after the nervous bustle of the new world. The boys were making the most of their holiday, and had trudged away early in the morning, each bearing gifts to his sweetheart. Gerda had persistently refused to join in the pleasures of the festival of St. John, and had strayed out this delicious night, going from boulder to boulder, until she had clambered nearly to the top of the mountain through the lichen, whortleberries, and ferns.

She had moped all day, said the great, rough brothers, Olaf, and Byn, and Nils, and Brun, and Rolf; while Jarl, the youngest, and more nearly in sympathy with his sister, had watched her wistfully when she was among the red-currant bushes of the garden, and whispered softly to his brothers: "She will never forget him!"

One year before, upon this very St. John's eve, the little steamer which came tri-weekly from the Norse capital, bringing with it a breath of the great world, in the shape of tourists who found fjord-travelling a charming novelty, had stopped at the little quay nearest to Liof Thure's dwelling, late in the afternoon, when the purest of purple shadows were lying over the lake.

Gerda stood waiting for its arrival, and the mate handed to her a small parcel, which from its size and shape one could easily guess contained a pair of new shoes.

"Great Heavens, what a lovely girl!" exclaimed a voice in English, as the boat moved away, and, looking upward at the steamer's tiny deck, Gerda saw a man whose dark eyes spoke to her plainly the sentiments which her Norse ear failed to comprehend.

The superb fringes of her large, dark-blue eyes drooped as she walked away. He was an artist and an Anglo-Saxon, of that she was sure, for he had had sketch-book and pencil in hand, and bore about him the general air of assurance which characterises the Anglo-Saxon at home and abroad. She had seen many of them, who had passed through Vik, finding a constant interest in the exquisite scenery of the fjord, and the mountains of the water-falls, and the stretches of green slope, with the hay stacked on the wooden fences to dry; she smiled again the next afternoon, when she turned her boat homeward after a long pull, and remembered his tone and glance.

The evening was coming on, and the setting sun tinged the snow-tops a faint pink, while the green grass on the mountain side was covered with white daisies, like a powder of pearls. Her boat was filled with hare-bells and purplish heath-plants, and ferns and mignonette, and as she reached the small wooden bridge which stretched across an arm of the fjord, she saw a stranger leaning upon the rail watching her. It required no second glimpse to assure the Norse girl that it was he whose admiration of her had been so outspoken upon the steamer the night before. In a moment he was at her side.

Digitized by Google

"Let me help you," he exclaimed, as she gathered the boat's fragrant freight in her arms, after making the tiny craft fast, and although the tongue in which he spoke was a strange one to her, she needed no dictionary to interpret his actions as he walked homeward beside her, and easily persuaded old Liof Thure to accommodate him as a boarder.

He was a landscape student from Montreal, with dreams and a great ambition, and he had come to paint the wild beauties of the Norse scenery and the glinting sunshine which laughed through the tall, swaying pines.

For six months he had lived in the family of Liof Thure, and had acquired enough of the Norwegian to tell them of the distant city of his birth, of his hopes, and his prospects and his friends.

He had learned to listen with the keenest pleasure to the sweet voice of Gerda during the long days and evenings, when she explained to him the lore of her country, and the folk-tales of the North—of the castle of the pirate Erik, and the three hunters turned to stone; of the mystery of the parsley bed and the milk-white deer and the white worm of the witches; and how the spectre-cross in the enchanted garden frightened the Finnish sorcerers.

And as the days went by, the idea of a picture which should show the beauty of Gerda to the world filled his brain, and the hours when she posed to him as a model passed too swiftly for them both.

There was no word of love between them, but, day by day, the Canadian saw the sweet womanliness of this Northern girl, the rich nature still undeveloped, thought responsive with poignant feeling to each vibration of his own artistic soul, the spirit of true life, unfettered with the contractions and ceremonies of conventionality, a life high and wide, like the blue Scandinavian heaven above; he saw all this, he felt the inspiration of this continual contact with nature, and yet he did not tell her that his whole heart was hers, because of the elder brother across the sea, who would have deemed it an unchangeable blot upon many generations of financial prosperity, that the sole sharer with himself of great wealth should marry a Norse peasant girl.

Finally the picture was completed. There was the wide fjord stretching out to the ocean with silence and solitude on its waves, which caught the blood-red reflections of an angry sky. There was not a vessel in sight, and so well had the artist caught the spirit of the scene, that the slow, majestic sweep of the heaving rollers seemed to die out without breaking and to give place to others, and against the gathering darkness the exquisite slenderness of a woman's figure stood clear out upon the canvas.

She wore a white skirt and white bodice, the dainty sleeves revealing more than half of the round, dimpled arms, which hung down and were clasped in front of her; the skirt fell full to the ankle, and the firm, well-shaped feet were bare upon the moss-grown shore; from the white cap upon her head the great braids of pale-gold hair extended below the waist line; her eyes, which were of the purple blueness of water of great depth, looked outward over the waves, and the whole face expressed subdued force and sweet seriousness. It was the portrait of a woman whose heart knew not yet the thrill of love, but had experienced the sadness of some undefined longing.

It was a matchless picture, a masterpiece of the artist's power, and, as he mixed his colours and laboured over it, but one name seemed suitable to the Canadian as he thought of Gerda. "So pure, so fresh, so cold!" he had said to himself; and when old Liof Thure first saw the painting and read the name of "The Frost-Lily," he was quick to grasp its significance and to realise what had prompted the stranger in his house to call the gem of his Norse collection by the title of the most prized and the most unattainable of the Scandinavian flora.

"It dies when they take it from the snow-bitten waters of its mountain tarns," thought the old man sadly. "Does he think to take her away from me to the country across the waters?"

But he was wise in his way and said nothing, although he could have chosen for his Gerda one of the white-skinned, serpent-eyed Northmen of her own race. Brown eyes and hair and beard did not accord with the Scandinavian ideas of freedom and manliness.

"Be a black slave!" was the old Norse curse. Gods and goddesses had light hair and a pure colour; the thralls were black; and, while the Americo-Norman has yielded up his prejudices against the brunette tinting, the delicacy of the fair skin is still a sign of better blood, a token of the free-born, in the Scandinavian peninsula.

When every detail of the picture had been made as perfect as brush and colours and the critical taste of the artist could render it, the Canadian packed up his palettes and canvasses, and bade good-bye to the snug farmhouse where he had eaten and slept and worked for so many months. When he said farewell to Gerda, it was in the presence of her father and brothers; there was a quick pressure of the hand, and he had jumped into the sledge which was waiting to speed him over the frozen snow away from his love to the nearest station of the continental trains.

That was nearly half a year ago; and through all the long months tidings had come from him but once, when he had sent a great medal of gold which the picture had taken in some famous exhibition, with the words, "Gerda, in remembrance of Ralph." And it was upon all this that Gerda was thinking, this anniversary of their meeting, as she strayed aimlessly upon the mountain slopes.

As Gerda turned to descend the hillside, a little boat darted out from the shadows of the fjord, and rowed swiftly through the long paths of silver light which the moon rays threw upon the waters. The road down the mountain so wound about that at intervals it commanded a view of the fjord, so Gerda saw the boat near the shore as she herself approached the valley. To the rower she paid little heed, simply noting that he wore the holiday costume of the Norse peasant, in scarlet and brown.

As the boat shot under the bridge, toward the pier, the man looked upward with a glad cry.

"Gerda!" said he, "Gerda, don't you know me?"

As the keel rasped upon the shore, he leaped from the boat and held his two hands out to hers.

"Dear-Eyes," he exclaimed in the Norse love-words, "do you love me?"

And what did Dear-Eyes do but nestle with a great throb of content against his heart!

"I have come straight from Montreal to you," he cried. "It is one year ago to-night since I first saw you, and I could not stay away another day. I stopped yesterday to buy this costume which is to be mine in the future, Gerda, and then I came on to you, sweetheart, to be with you always if you will have me." He paused an instant to press her head to his shoulder tenderly before he continued. "I could not ask you to leave everything that has made you what you are, and go across the seas with me. There is nothing about you that I would change for the world, and so I am come to you, Gerda. When we are married, we will live here in this pure air and amid all this grand scenery; our life shall be the same simple primitive one that has made you the woman I love. I am a Norseman hereafter for your sake!"

"Have you nothing to ask me, Dear-Eyes?" he murmured as he pressed his cheek against hers. "Have you nothing to ask me of the home or friends or family I have left?"

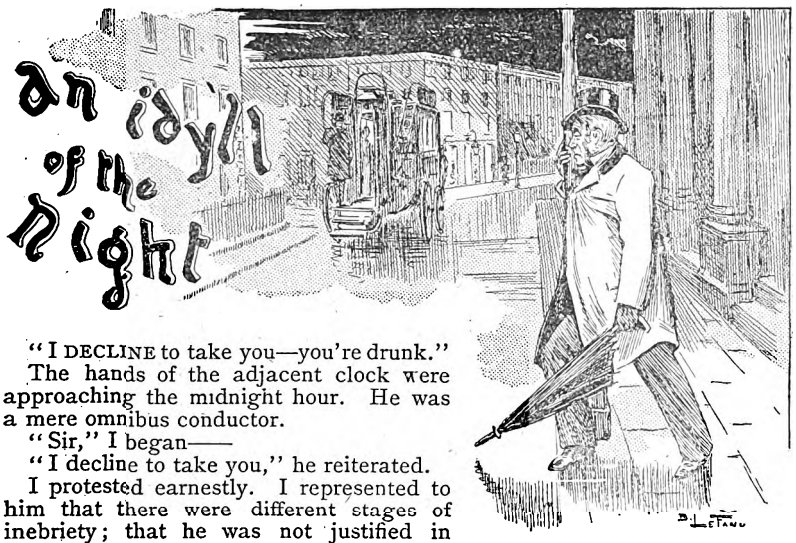
"No," answered Gerda, "I have you, and I love you so that there is no room for any other interest in my heart!"

Life's golden paradise opened for them, and unquestioning and content they entered in.

Two days later the following cablegram was sent to Horace Clifford, Esq., of Montreal:

"Dear Brother,—I have gathered the Frost-Lily, but shall not transplant it. When you do Europe next year, come and see us, and you shall have some of the finest salmon fishing in the world.—Always affectionately, RALPH."

Digitized by Google



"I DECLINE to take you—you're drunk."

The hands of the adjacent clock were approaching the midnight hour. He was a mere omnibus conductor.

"Sir," I began——

"I decline to take you," he reiterated.

I protested earnestly. I represented to him that there were different stages of inebriety; that he was not justified in refusing the accommodation of his vehicle to anyone who had not achieved the maturity of intoxication. I poured forth a torrent of expostulation. In vain. Rhadamanthus on a footboard; he was inflexible. In the midst of my exhortations, he drove away, leaving me alone in the bleak, dreary solitude.

I looked round grimly. A soft rain filled the air and fell unceasingly upon the glistening asphalt. A bleary radiance invited my attention to a street lamp, and, embracing its pedestal, I suffered my thoughts to fly after the retreating vehicle, whose dark form, a fading hope, grew indistinct in the distance. I resolved to concentrate the whole efforts of my life upon the acquisition of an omnibus. "Some day," said I, "this conductor will come along and demand to be carried, while I on the footboard will defy him. And, as he lingers, then will I reveal to him the iniquity of this night." Overjoyed with this prospect, I laughed gleefully, and advanced cautiously to a doorstep that lay close by, and sat down thereon.

The contending clamour of unnumbered clocks rang forth the hour. The air seemed to grow dense and gloomy. Buildings expanded, and assumed gigantic proportions. My head grew heavy; strange shapes swept past my vision. I was in a weird and disconsolate shadowland.

A rough voice broke in upon my meditations: "Git up from there!"

I looked up, and saw a tall, swarthy figure—a policeman. Making no immediate response, I caused my eye to glide over his person, from the metallic lustre of his helmet-top to the tips off his mud-splashed boots. A sense of ignominy overspread my spirit. His words fell searing and burning into my consciousness.

"What!" said I, "have we returned to the days of slavery? Am I to receive with humility the brutal insolence of an official, whom I help to clothe and feed? And this ungrateful man orders me to get up!"

Impelled by these considerations, I arose and smote him.

"Ha! would yer?" exclaimed the scion of the law, and, advancing with cautious eye, he prepared to seize me, when a young man came out of the shade and interposed himself between us.

"I believe, constable," said the young liar, "that I know this gentleman. Allow me to speak with you for a moment."

After a short pause, I beheld the retreating back of the policeman, and my deliverer approached and lifted his hat respectfully.

"Young man," said I to him severely, "the fraud that is exercised on behalf of another may seem venial to your eyes; but, in mine, the villainy of falsehood derives no palliation from the presence of disinterested motives. Go!"

In an elegant manner he explained that he had frequently seen me before, and that it would afford him the most exquisite satisfaction to be allowed to see me to my house. As he said this, the heavens opened, and a deluge descended upon our heads.

I suffered myself to be persuaded by him, and propped by his sustaining arms we began a weary pilgrimage through the rain and mist. He supported my wandering footsteps with the most anxious solicitude, and bore, with patient resignation, the moral counsels that I offered for his consideration by the way. At length, after hours of muddy travel, I saw the familiar portals of my house, and I turned to thank, in a dignified manner, the person who had aided me during my temporary indisposition.

"The lateness of the hour," said I graciously, "precludes my offering you that hospitality which perhaps you have some right to expect, but I have every reason to believe that the consciousness of having, unrewarded, performed a good action flourishes in the heart, and affords comfort and consolation under the most distressing circumstances; and I congratulate you upon having laid up a treasure of this character in the friendly help you have given me. I wish you good-night."

He stared at me in a dumfounded fashion, but not overtly regarding his expression, I sought to produce my watch as independent testimony to the reason of my observation, but found it gone. The truth flashed upon me. Under the base pretext of Good Samaritanism, this scoundrel had profited by the opportunity of my confidence to pick my pocket. "Police! police!!" I shouted. He gave one distracted look around and fled.

The door of my house opened. Lights flashed. My fair-haired daughter came bounding down the pathway to the gate, and my stern-faced better-half stood, a dismal portent of troubles to come, on the doorstep.

At this moment, a dismal object, splashed with mud from head to toe, in the grasp of two policemen, appeared on the footpath.

"My dear," I explained, "there is the unprincipled wretch who took advantage of your parent's indisposition to prosecute his rascally profession. Do not be afraid."

The group advanced towards me, and I contemplated, with satisfaction, the retribution that had overtaken this unhappy wretch in his course of infamy; and, as I did so, I perceived him make an attempt to release his throat from the grasp that encircled it, with the object, as I apprehended, of making an appeal to those sympathetic instincts, which, in greater or lesser proportions are implanted in the heart of every human being. But I resolved to disregard, upon this occasion, the promptings of a benevolent disposition, and, turning to my daughter,

"My darling," said I, "he tried to rob your poor old father. Tell your mother not to wait up for me. Ah, they are bringing in the villain!"

As I said these words, what was my stupefaction to see my daughter throw her arms around the neck of the malefactor, and to discover, at the same time, my gold hunter in my coat-tail pocket! I stood aghast. Clearly, when my watch was in my pocket, the man in the clutches of the constables had not stolen it, unless, by some miraculous light-fingeredness, he had placed it there. But my daughter—how on earth? What reckless immodesty prompted the embrace? I stared at everybody! Who would explain to me?

"Henry," wailed my daughter, "what does this mean?"

* * * *

If vice were incapable of assuming the guise of innocence, this world would have no cause for the assistance of a numerous and able-minded legal profession. I freely admit a mistake in the character and motives of the youth who protected me from the onslaught of a vicious constable. It appears he is my daughter's accepted suitor, and the son of my old friend Jenkins.

It is true I had other views for her, but an earnest attachment is touching to the feelings of a parent, and without much solicitation I bestowed upon them my blessing and consent.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc.

SUMMARY—PROLOGUE.

Max Renault, the leading spirit of the anarchist "Autonomie Group No. 7" meets his colleagues in a club near the Caledonian Road on the eve of President Carnot's assassination. He shoots a traitor who has almost betrayed the Group, and so saved Carnot's life. Then he tells them that he is about to emigrate with a society of Socialists, one of whom, Frederick Austen, a wealthy engineer, who has been converted to Socialism, takes out with him a working model of an aerial vessel which is to enable the colonists to enforce a reign of peace on earth. This air-ship Renault determines to steal when complete, and use for the purpose of bringing about an Anarchist reign of terror instead. Meanwhile, Franz Hartog, another member of the Group, is to carry out a plot he has formed to steal a very fast torpedo boat destroyer, which is to be built at Elbing for the Russian Government, and with her to levy blackmail on the Atlantic, and so raise funds to build an Anarchist aerial fleet when the time comes.

CHAPTER I.

Utopia in the South.

On the 21st of November, 1898, the Calypso, a steam yacht, rigged as a three-masted schooner and measuring between four and five hundred tons, met with a rather serious accident to her engines in one of those brief but deadly hurricanes which are known to navigators of the South Seas as "southerly busters."

They are the white squalls of the South, and woe betide the unhappy ship that they strike unawares. Over the smooth, sunlit waters there drifts with paralysing rapidity a mass of hissing, seething billows, churned into foam and then beaten down again by the terrific force of the wind that is roaring above them. Often there is not a breath or a puff of air felt by the ship until the squall strikes her, and then the blow falls like the united stroke of a hundred battering-rams.

If the ship is stripped and ready for the blow, she heels over till the water spurts in through the lee scupper holes and half the deck is awash. If there is a rag of sail on stay or yard, there is a bang like the report of a duck-gun, and, if you have quick eyes, you may see it flying away to leeward like a bit of tissue paper before the gale, and, if it has not yielded with sufficient readiness to the shock of the storm, a sprung topmast or a snapped yard will pay the penalty of resistance.

Meanwhile, what was a few minutes ago a smoothly-shining sea, scarcely ruffled by a ripple, is now a white, boiling, mass of swiftly rising billows, amidst which the straining, struggling vessel fights for her life like some stricken animal.

In company with his sister Violet.

It had been thus with the Calypso. A stout new fore-staysail that had been hoisted in the hope of getting her head before the squall had been struck square and had resisted just a moment too long at the cost of a sprung fore-topmast. Then, an effort to bring her round with the screw had resulted in the disaster that practically crippled her.

A big sea came rolling up astern, her nose went down and her stern went up, her propeller whirling in the air, and, before the engine could be stopped, there came a grinding, thrashing noise in the engine-room, and, a moment later, the yacht was drifting helplessly away before the storm with a broken crankshaft.

When this happened, the Calypso was on a voyage from New Zealand to the Marquesas Islands, between four and five hundred miles to the north-east of Auckland. The screw had been hoisted out of the water and a spare fore-topmast fitted; but only five days after this had been done she was caught in a heavy gale from the south westward and got so badly knocked about that when every spare spar on board had been used in refitting her she could only carry sail enough to take her at four or five knots an hour before a good topsail breeze.

The result of this double misfortune was that a month later she was still on the southern verge of the tropics, beating about in light baffling winds, unable to make her way into the region of the South-east trades.

The Calypso was owned and sailed by Sir Harry Milton, of Seaton Abbey, Northumberland, landowner and ironmaster, who rather less than three years before had come of age and entered upon his inheritance of broad acres, mines, and ironworks, which yielded him an income not far short of £30,000 a year, and in addition to these a comfortable nest-egg of nearly half a million in hard cash and good securities.

For the last year and a half, he had been seeing the world in the pleasantest of all fashions—cruising about from port to port, and ocean to ocean, in his yacht, in company with his sister Violet, a pretty, healthy, high-bred brunette between eighteen and nineteen.

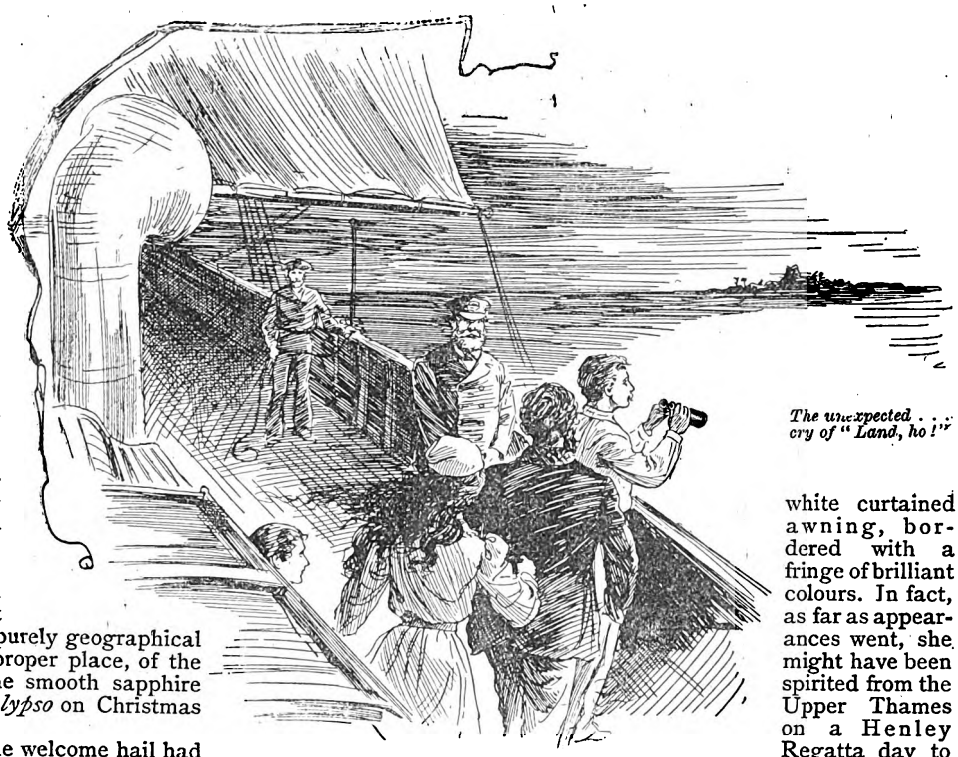
Sir Harry, himself, was a good specimen of the typical English gentleman, standing about five feet ten in his deck shoes, well built, broad shouldered, ruddy-skinned and clear eyed, with features that were frank and pleasing in their open manliness, rather than strictly handsome, and yet saved from mediocrity by that undefinable, yet unmistakable, stamp of good breeding which distinguishes, as was once wittily if somewhat cynically said, the man who has a grandfather from the man who only had progenitors.

Apart from the officers and crew of the Calypso there was only one member of the yacht's company who needs introduction in special terms. This was Herbert Wyndham, second lieutenant of Her Majesty's gunboat Sandfly, an old schoolfellow and bosom friend of Sir Harry's, and just now on a year's invalid leave in consequence of a nasty bullet wound received in storming a stronghold of a West African slaver chieftain, at the head of his blue-jackets. Sir Harry had picked him up at Cape Town, when he was beginning to get about again after the fever that had followed on his wound, and, with his sister's assistance, he succeeded without much difficulty in persuading him to spend the rest of his leave on a cruise to the South Seas in the Calypso.

In person, Lieutenant Wyndham was a well set-up, clean-limbed young fellow of twenty-six, with a good-humoured face and bright hazel eyes, which looked alertly out from under a square strong forehead that matched the firm chin which, according to the modern fashion of naval officers, was clothed with a close-clipped, neatly-trimmed beard a shade or so lighter than the close, curly chestnut hair that formed not the least of his personal attractions.

As week after week passed, and neither land nor sail appeared in sight from the decks of the half-crippled yacht, Sir Harry began to feel a little natural anxiety for the ultimate safety of his beautiful craft and of those near and dear to him on board her. Another such a squall or a gale as she had already suffered from would almost infallibly wreck her in her present state, and both he and his sailing master would have been glad to reach even the shelter of a coral lagoon, within which she could take refuge until she could be thoroughly overhauled in a fashion that was not possible out in the open sea.

Digitized by Google



The unexpected . . . cry of "Land, ho!"

But most things have an end—even calms in the South Pacific—and by Christmas Eve the Calypso had at last crept out of the zone of calms and had begun to feel the first fitful puffs of the trade winds. Then, about an hour before sunrise on Christmas morning, the unexpected, but none the less welcome, cry of "Land, ho!" brought everyone, from Sir Harry himself to his sister's maid, or the "Lady-in-Waiting," as Lieutenant Wyndham was wont to call her, tumbling out of their berths and up on deck.

No one who has not seen the sun rise over an island in the South Pacific can form any adequate idea of the scene that greeted the eyes of the crew of the Calypso, as the light broadened and brightened to the eastward in front of them. The island paradises of the South Sea are like no other part of the earth. Their beauty is entirely their own. No word-painting can ever do full justice to it, and the reader must therefore fain be content with the purely geographical description, which will follow in its proper place, of the island that was seen rising out of the smooth sapphire sea from the poop-deck of the Calypso on Christmas morning, 1898.

In less than half an hour after the welcome hail had run along the deck, Sir Harry and the sailing-master were eagerly scanning the land, now about ten miles distant, through their glasses.

"What do you make it, Mr. Topline?" asked Sir Harry, after a good long stare at the mysterious land, taking his binoculars from his eyes and looking at the old salt with a puzzled expression.

"I can't say, Sir Harry. I've never seen the island before, and I don't believe it's down on the chart. You see, we've got clean out of the track of the trading vessels and mail steamers, and this part of the South Sea is even now very little known. I'd no idea there was land within three hundred miles of us," replied the sailing-master.

"No, it's not on the chart, for I was following Mr. Martin yesterday when he was pricking off the course, and there was nothing near us. Confound the wind! There it goes to a dead calm again. Hullo, what the deuce is that?"

As he spoke Sir Harry jumped, glass in hand, on to the rail that ran round the flush deck of the yacht, climbed half-a-dozen rounds into the main-shrouds, and again levelled his glasses in the direction of the island. A moment later he sang out to the sailing master:

"Topline, what do you say to a steam launch coming off from your unknown island?"

"A steam launch! Well, I'll be kicked if it isn't," said the other, mounting the opposite rail and focussing the approaching craft. "It must be the steam tender of some man-o'-war surveying the island or getting fruit and water, only she's got no funnel, and I don't——. Why, she's going twenty knots an hour through the water if she's going a yard! She's no man-o'-war tender, not she!"

All eyes on board the Calypso were now turned on the strange craft, which, by this time, had cleared the reef and was coming speeding towards them over the smooth, windless sea at a pace which proved that, whatever her motive power was, it lacked nothing on the score of efficiency. In less than half-an-hour, she was describing a wide curve round the stern of the yacht, preparatory to running up alongside.

It was at once evident that the sailing master had been quite wrong in his first guess that she was the steam tender of a man-of-war. She was a ten or twelve tonner, long, narrow, and low-lying, white painted, with a bright gold stripe from stem to stern, and covered, fore and aft, with a snowy white curtained awning, bordered with a fringe of brilliant colours. In fact, as far as appearances went, she might have been spirited from the Upper Thames on a Henley Regatta day to the distant and lonely region of the South Sea, out of which were now rising the high bluffs and green slopes of the unknown island whence she had come.

As she came up alongside the Calypso, a youth of about eighteen, who was standing at the wheel amidships, hailed the yacht in English and wished the new comers, "A Merry Christmas!" in a tone which left not the slightest doubt as to his nationality. Sir Harry returned the greeting as heartily as it was given, wondering not a little, like the rest of his shipmates, not only at the presence of such a dainty little craft in such out-of-the-way waters, but also at the strange contrast between the manner and language of the youth who had hailed him, and his entirely uncivilised appearance—uncivilised, that is to say, from the stand-point of modern fashion.

His bearing and speech were those of a well-educated and cultured young gentleman at the latter end of the nineteenth century, but his dress was more like that of a Phœnician mariner of a thousand years ago. His long, brown hair fell in curls on his broad shoulders and clustered thickly about his smooth forehead, held back from his bronzed, handsome face by a narrow fillet of metal that looked like polished aluminium

His dress consisted of a long over-tunic of soft grey woollen cloth, bordered with cunningly-worked embroidery in blue silk, open at the neck, where it showed a white linen close-fitting under vest, and confined at the waist by a red silk sash, wound two or three times round, and hanging in heavily fringed ends over his left hip. A pair of soft, yellow leather moccasins, beautifully worked in many-coloured threads and bead embroidery, covered his feet, and came half way up the calves of his bare, muscular legs.

"What craft is that and where do you hail from?" asked Sir Harry, some dim notion of pirates associating itself in his mind with the somewhat fantastic attire of the youth at the helm.

"This is the electric launch Mermaid, and yonder island is Utopia," he replied. "We came out to see if we could be of any assistance to you. You seem to have had rather a bad time of it somewhere by the look of your spars."

On hearing this queer, though kindly expressed, reply, Sir Harry began to think that the Calypso must have drifted out of the realms of reality and into the regions of romance, for the only Utopia he had ever heard of had been Sir Thomas More's Nowhere. But good manners forbade any expression of surprise or incredulity, and so he answered laughingly:

Digitized by Google

"I had no idea that a Utopia existed on earth in these degenerate days, but I am delighted to learn that I am wrong, and I'm also much obliged to you for coming out to us. We've disabled our engines and got our spars badly knocked about. But won't you come on board and let us introduce ourselves?"

"Thank you, if you'll throw me a rope I will. Never mind the gangway ladder. Here, Tom, take the wheel, and don't let those girls run away with you."

"That's just what he'd like us to do," came in the laughing tones of a girl's voice from under the forward awning as the young fellow caught the rope and swung himself lightly over the Calypso's rail.

"I didn't know you had ladies on board," said Sir Harry, meeting him at the gangway and holding out his hand, "if I had known I would not have hailed you so unceremoniously."

"There are no ladies in Utopia, and the Utopians dislike ceremony very much, so it's just as well you didn't," replied the youth with a laugh as he took Sir Harry's hand.

Three pretty long-haired girls.

"But surely that was a young lady's voice I heard just now, and a very sweet one too, if I heard aright."

"Well, it was a girl's voice, certainly. There are three of them on board the Mermaid, but they wouldn't like to be called young ladies. There are only women and girls in Utopia. We left the ladies behind in England."

He checked himself rather abruptly as his eyes met Violet's gazing in frankly undisguised astonishment at him. Then with a slight flush on his cheeks he went on:

"But pardon me, I had better introduce myself instead of talking about our manners and customs, which I daresay you will learn before long. I am Frank Markham, skipper of the Mermaid, and her crew is at present composed of Tom Harris, Ralf Smith, Lucy Summers, Annie Hilton, and Dora Merton, the girl who made a very true remark about Master Tom as I came on board."

As young Markham said this he went to the side and sang out:

"Come now, Mermaids, show yourselves! I want to introduce you to our visitors. By the way, you have not told me your names yet," he continued, turning to Sir Harry.

"My name is Harry Milton; I am owner and skipper of the Calypso. This is my sister, Violet, this is Lieutenant Wyndham, of Her Majesty's ship Sandfly, and this is Mr. Topline, my sailing master."

As Sir Harry made the introductions in turn the curtains which ran round the fore-deck of the launch were drawn aside, disclosing three pretty long-haired girls, picturesquely, if somewhat lightly attired, in gay tunics and cloaks and long moccasins, profusely ornamented with many-coloured silken embroidery, fringes, and curiously worked clasps and armlets of lustrous white and yellow metal. Instinctively every man who was looking over the bulwarks of the Calypso raised his hat or his cap as the three girls, half gravely, half shyly, returned the salutes from the deck of the yacht.

"And now, what can we do for you?" asked Markham when this little ceremony was over. "I suppose you want to get into port and refit as soon as possible?"

"That's just what I do want to do very badly," replied Sir Harry. "But where am I to find a port and a dockyard in this part of the Pacific?"

"Both are within less than a half-a-dozen miles of us, and the Mermaid shall tow you in in an hour if you will first oblige me with five minutes' conversation in private."

"Certainly, come into my cabin," said Sir Harry, leading the way to the companion.

In less than ten minutes they returned, Sir Harry looking just a trifle mystified, and without loss of time a light hawser was got out and made fast to the Mermaid, and the two vessels began to move smoothly towards the white reef in the distance, fringing the hitherto unknown Island of Utopia.

CHAPTER II.

GOING INTO PORT.

It took a little over an hour for the Mermaid to tow the Calypso from where she had lain becalmed into the lagoon of Utopia. As the yacht approached the island it rapidly became manifest that, whether chance or design had guided the Utopians in the selection of their far-away home, they had had the good fortune to choose a spot that well deserved to be called beautiful, even in that part of the world where land and sea and sky seem to conspire to wear their brightest and most beautiful aspects.

They were approaching it from the West, and before they reached it the sun had risen above the horizon, and against the flood of light that blazed along the Eastern horizon they saw, standing out clear and sharp, the truncated cone of an extinct volcano, which raised itself in lonely grandeur between four and five thousand feet above the sea. From the middle slopes to north and south two curving ranges of hills, sparsely timbered at their summits, but with their sides clothed with ever denser and more luxuriant vegetation, ran out to the south-east and north-west, gradually decreasing in height until they terminated abruptly in cliffs of naked rock which rose eight or nine hundred feet sheer up from the water.

Between these two headlands lay a wide irregular bay fronted by the broad expanse of brilliant emerald-green water and backed by verdant slopes which, clothed with all the wonderful vegetation of the Southern tropics, rose and fell valley behind valley and hill beyond hill until they merged in the distance with the heights of the volcano and its attendant chains.

"That is Mount Plato," said Markham, who at Sir Harry's invitation had remained on board the yacht to act as cicerone to the visitors to Utopia. "We call it that because under its shadow we hope to found our New Republic."

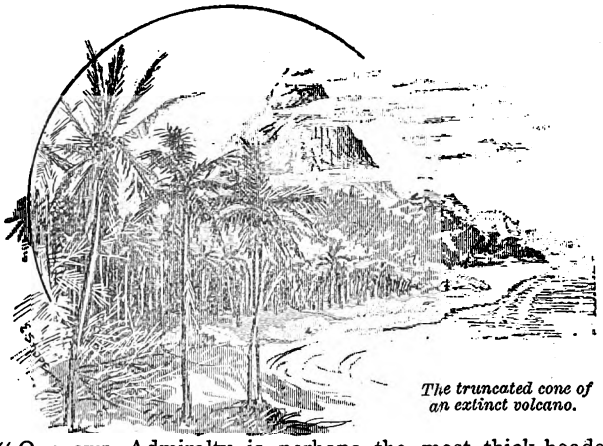
"But isn't the Republic founded yet?" asked Violet. "If you'll allow me to say so I should have thought it was not only founded but had reached a considerable height of prosperity."

"Yes," chimed in Wyndham, with a movement of his hand towards the Mermaid. "If twenty-knot electric launches are not a sign of a fairly prosperous civilisation, I can hardly see what would be."

"Twenty knots!" laughed Markham. "Why the Mermaid can run thirty when we're in a hurry, and we've got a three-thousand tonner on the slips now in the dockyard that we are building on a new principle, and which we expect to make forty."

"Whew," whistled Wyndham, lifting his eyebrows in undisguised astonishment. "Forty knots! If you can build vessels like that you Utopians ought to be millionaires to a man. Why, there isn't a European Government that wouldn't willingly give you half a million apiece for as many of them as you could turn out.

Digitized by Google



The truncated cone of an extinct volcano.

"Our own Admiralty is perhaps the most thick-headed institution of its kind under the sun; but I believe even it would give me a good deal for the secret of a ship like that, if you would let me take it home with me."

Instead of replying directly Markham looked at Sir Harry, who at once took the hint and said, with a shake of his head:

"No, Wyndham, I'm afraid there's no chance of that or anything of the kind. In fact," he said, "I may as well tell you, and you gentlemen also," he continued, with a glance at the sailing master and his chief mate, "that I have accepted the invitation to put into Utopia on the sole condition on which it was given, and I have pledged my word of honour for myself and everyone on board the yacht that no attempt will be made to learn anything that is not freely told to us, and even that if we learn anything by accident we will behave both here and at home as though we had never known it.

"You see, we have not the slightest right to pry into the secrets or discoveries of our hosts, and I'm sure you will agree with me that in giving such a pledge I was making the least return I could for the kindness and assistance that I'm sure we shall receive on shore."

"Oh, quite so, quite so!" said the lieutenant. "Of course, I was only joking. A man would deserve to be shot who did a caddish thing like that. Still, just now, you know, a forty-knot ship properly armed would be simply invaluable, not only to an individual nation like ourselves, but to the civilised world at large. You know what I mean."

"Ah, yes!" replied Sir Harry, his face becoming grave in an instant. "You mean to chase that brute with the red flag and hunt him down to wherever his lair is. Yes, a ship that could do that would be cheap at a couple of millions, and I believe Europe would subscribe the money to buy it in a week, even if the Governments couldn't find it. I'd give ten thousand myself with pleasure."

"Pardon me," said Markham, turning round from the rail where he had been standing pointing out the different features of the island to Violet, while Sir Harry was speaking. "But that sounds almost like a modern edition of one of the old pirate stories. Surely you don't mean to say that there are any pirates nowadays, either with black or red flags?"

"I am sorry to say that there is at least one?" said Sir Harry, "and he can do more damage in a month than all the old pirates put together could have done in a year."

"What a villainous shame!" said Markham, looking for the moment graver and sterner than they would have thought possible. "That will be news for them ashore if you care to tell them the story. In fact, I'm afraid we shall put a considerable tax on your generosity in that way, for we haven't had any news from the outer world for quite twelve months now.

"But here we are at the entrance to the lagoon. What do you think of it? Don't you think our Utopia is a lovely land?"

"Lovely, indeed!" said Violet, who, during the conversation, had been looking about her with all her eyes, as though she could never get enough of the beauty of the scene. "I've heard and read all sorts of stories about the Pacific Islands, but I couldn't have believed that anything earthly could have been so beautiful as this."

And truly the scene that was visible from the bridge of the Calypso on which they were now standing was worthy of the enthusiasm of her words. Every colour that Nature uses in painting her incomparable landscapes was here, either blended or contrasted to produce the most exquisite effects.

On land were mingled a hundred tints of green and gold, from the sombre hues of the banyan leaves to the golden ears of the patches of corn that were ripening on the upper hill slopes; trees and shrubs of every shape and height succeeded each other, from the lowly bananas to the towering palms and the splendid pines that crowned the higher summits of the mountain ranges, and, high above all, the bare blue-grey cone of the volcano rose to crown a picture which no words could adequately describe.

But when, to the medley of hill and vale, mountain rock and ravine, presented by the island itself, were added the snowy white of the billows breaking on the long reef—which, save for one narrow opening, stretched from point to point across the bay—the emerald-green of the lagoon inside it, and, outside, the deep blue of the open ocean reflecting the sapphire of the cloudless sky, the picture became almost unearthly in its strange and varied loveliness.

The roar of the tumbling billows upon the reef sounded louder and louder in the ears of the Calypso's company as the Mermaid and her charge ran in towards the opening.

"I think I had better take your wheel now," said Markham to Sir Harry when they were within about five hundred yards of the reef. "This is rather a ticklish piece of steering for anyone who doesn't know the currents."

"I should think so," said Wyndham, looking ahead as Markham went and took the wheel from the sailor who was steering. "I know I wouldn't care about the job of bringing a torpedo boat in here in the dark. Why, there doesn't seem to be much more than sixty feet of clear water to get through. If this place were properly defended it could be held against all the navies of Europe as long as they chose to stop here."

"Yes," laughed Sir Harry, "especially with one or two forty-knot cruisers dodging about outside and making a judicious distribution of torpedoes. What do you think, Topline?"

"I think, Sir Harry," growled the old salt, "that I'll believe in forty-knot cruisers when I sees 'em. If a speed like that's possible, why can't all the Governments of Europe, with all their money, build a cruiser that'll catch that craft, whatever she is, that's been playing up old Scratch among the Atlantic liners, according to the news we got at Sydney?"

"Because they don't know how," said Markham, without turning his head, "and because there are some secrets that money won't buy."

"Don't you think our Utopia is a lovely land?"

As he spoke he gave the yacht's wheel a turn and swung her about four points to port in imitation of a similar manœuvre of the Mermaid, which was apparently running dead on to the reef. Within fifty yards of the white water the Mermaid shot across into the seething foam, doubled sharply, and ran to starboard at right-angles to the yacht. This brought a strain upon the hawser, and, as it came up dripping out of the water and tightened, Wyndham could not repress an exclamation of surprise.

Digitized by Google

"That's queer towing; what on earth is she doing that for?"

"You'll see in a moment," said Markham, giving a spin to the wheel and swinging the yacht round after the launch. By the tenseness of the rope it was evident that the Mermaid was pulling very hard upon it. The Calypso came round, and then her stern swung with a rush into the swirling white water that was boiling about the narrow entrance.

Then, while the party on the bridge watched with barely concealed anxiety the breakers which every moment brought nearer until they were roaring only a stone's throw away, the line slackened slightly, and just as the sailing master, unable to contain himself any longer sang out: "She'll be on the reef in a minute! Tell the launch to tow harder, man; can't you see she's going?" the foaming, tossing mass of breakers suddenly seemed to slide away ahead, and a minute later the Calypso had drifted through the opening stern first, and was floating motionless on the smooth glittering water of the lagoon, with the Mermaid lying a few yards ahead of her.

"There's a twelve-knot current coming round the corner of that reef," said Markham, leaving the wheel and turning to the sailing master. "You could no more tow a disabled ship through there than you could tow her over the reef itself. The only way to get the yacht in was to let her drift in—with a proper check on her, of course."

"I beg your pardon, young gentleman," said Topline, looking just a bit crestfallen. "I was wrong, and you were right. You know the place, and I don't; and I'll be hanged if I could have got her in myself."

Saw the wall of rock open into a vast arch.

The Mermaid now got under weigh again and began to tow the Calypso across the lagoon towards the high bluffs at the southern arm of the bay. The bright smooth water of the bay was already dotted by dozens of pretty little craft, some canoes with outriggers, some double-hulled catamarans with great white sails that swept them along at a famous pace, others canoes of the shape seen on the Canadian lakes and rivers, and others again just such craft as you may see any summer's day on the Thames between Putney and Richmond, large roomy row-boats, slim outriggers, and broad, flat centre-boards, with their wide spread of snowy canvas.

All came racing away with the land breeze from the head of the bay, where half a dozen jetties ran out into the water, and where, behind the snowy coral beach, the verdant shore was dotted with white houses peeping out from shady groves of lime and orange trees and spreading tree-ferns above which the stately palms lifted their gently waving crests a hundred feet into the air.

The Calypso was soon surrounded by the light-heeled craft, and many a greeting of welcome was waved to the new comers by their gaily dressed crews, and, thus escorted, the yacht was towed to the bluffs. It looked as though the Mermaid was going to run her nose up against the huge frowning wall of rock that rose hundreds of feet above her, but within a couple of hundred yards of their base Markham went to the wheel again.

The launch swerved to port, and as he sent the Calypso after her those on her bridge saw the wall of rock open into a vast arch, the apex of which was over two hundred feet from the water. They glided through this for a distance of about fifty yards, and then the half light of the tunnel gave place to the bright sunlight again, and they found themselves floating in a perfectly land-locked oval basin about a mile long by about three-quarters of a mile broad, and closed in on all sides by perpendicular cliffs rising sheer from the water to heights varying from eighty to a hundred and fifty feet.

"Here we are at last!" said Markham. "This is the dockyard of Utopia, and in a couple of hours your yacht shall be on the slips in the dry dock; meanwhile, if you will come on board the Mermaid with me, we will go ashore."

(To be continued next week.)

THE OLD GUIDE

IN the Place des Thermes, at Luques-de-Born, the delightful, well-known watering-place, an old man was to be met every day tottering slowly along. He wore the picturesque costume of a guide—a suit of black velvet, a blue woollen cap and a red belt. He carried a long iron-tipped staff; from his side hung a leathern bottle, and on his back an axe and a ball of rope. His shrunken breast bore a shining plate displaying his name and title, "Auguste Lagnerot, Guide of the First Class."

His laborious gait indicated an age of at least seventy years. He strolled about among the tourists, saluting them respectfully, but no one desired his services.

In his youth Auguste Lagnerot had been one of the most intrepid and valued guides of Luques-de-Born. He was the first to conduct the excursionists to the magnificent valley of Arbelles, whose lakes, glaciers and cascades are now the admiration of strangers.

From that picturesque valley he had discovered a path by which, in five hours after leaving Luques, the famous peak of the Lion-Blanc, previously reputed inaccessible, could be reached.

In those days Auguste Lagnerot was a robust, sinewy young fellow, a favourite of the ladies who climbed among the glaciers. Passionately fond of mountain scenery, he had eyes only for the waterfalls, the stretches of snow, the chaos of rocks, the marvellous and changing scenes of nature among which he lived.

. . . . . .

From June to October daily for twenty-five years he had guided the tourists from his valley of Arbelles to his peak of the Lion-Blanc. Every scene of interest was proudly pointed out by him with an enthusiasm and delight ever fresh and inexhaustible.

. . . . . .

At that period Lagnerot earned fifteen francs a day and his travelling expenses—meals, lodgings, and tolls. But he would have esteemed the pleasure of reviewing the lakes, cascades, and glaciers an adequate compensation. And in the winter, when Luques slept like a dead city in the shroud of its white mountains, Lagnerot sometimes revisited his valley of Arbelles and endeavoured, notwithstanding the danger, to climb the snowy crest of the Lion-Blanc.

Digitized by Google

At fifty years of age he fell sick, and was confined to his bed for several months. His convalescence covered nearly four years, and when he was able to put in an appearance again in the Place des Thermes, he had become so old, and bent, and feeble, that his vigour did not inspire confidence, and he was no longer employed.

His illness had ruined him. He lived abstemiously with a nephew, who kept a furnished house in the suburbs of Luques, and the old guide never had enough money to undertake, at his own expense, the ascent of the Lion-Blanc.

Like many persons advanced in life, he was deceived regarding his powers, and continued placidly to wear his costume of a guide, hoping every summer day to find some tourist in need of his assistance. Auguste Lagnerot became an inoffensive monomaniac, whom everybody respected, and whose history was soon learned by strangers.

He constantly saw the guides, his successors, leave in charge of the excursionists; he looked from afar with melancholy eyes on the arid, snow-capped mountain at the further end of the valley; then, with shortened steps, and rounded back, and disheartened mien, his thin hair streaming in the breeze, he sought a photographer's window and scanned with pleasure the views of the glaciers, cascades, and peaks, all the objects which he loved so well, and which, no doubt, he would never see again.

. . . . . .

One day in September, close on his seventy-sixth year, he perceived a young couple approaching.

"Monsieur Lagnerot," said the gentleman, "can you conduct my wife and me to the valley of Arbelles and the peak of the Lion-Blanc to-morrow and the day after?"

The old guide drew himself erect and grew somewhat pale. Was he dreaming? What a time had elapsed since he last heard a similar question!

"Certainly, sir," he replied firmly, striving to hide the trembling of his hand on the iron-tipped staff.

The hour and the price of the excursion were agreed on, and after arranging that he should call for them at their hotel on the morrow at mid-day, they took leave of him politely.

The gentleman and lady had not long been married and having already made the excursion three times, and learned the story of the old guide, had a sentimental fancy to take him to the Lion-Blanc, under pretext of going under his charge.

The good man suspected nothing and at the appointed hour presented himself to take charge of the party. It was a fine day, and they started on the journey. Lagnerot, brushed up and carefully arrayed, held out well for the first hour. He was full of zeal, and the couple had some difficulty to keep up.

He pursued his former route, following the course of the Nivette, the resounding and foaming torrent which resembled a white-skirted little girl frisking in the meadows.

He arrived at the ruins of Castillon. As in former days, he stretched out his left arm, and said:

"The valley of Aurin!"

Then he pointed with his right hand, and exclaimed:

"The peak of the Crabère!"

His voice trembled with emotion; his eyes gleamed with pleasure; his cheeks reddened beneath their wrinkles.

He was still able to indicate the sombre gulf where the Nivette disappeared like a shifting diver. He hurried through the zig-zags of the slope, bent on exhibiting the precipice where the three Englishmen were killed; then drank deeply at the shaded spring where he had so often quenched his thirst.

When he resumed the route, and clambered up the steep ascent, he endeavoured, as in the days of old, to assist the lady; and it was really she who was the prop, and the gentleman following pressed against him while pretending to be seeking support for himself. The old guide did not perceive their intention.

"Courage, courage!" he exclaimed in a broken voice once and again to his companions. "Now then, one more effort and we're there."

He wiped his brow bravely, and did not stop too long to take breath.

They succeeded in hoisting him to the plateau, and as the sun set they debouched between the two rocks of basalt on the valley of Arbelles.

Lagnerot was so happy that he felt tempted to fall on his knees and kiss the ground. Oh, to see the Lac Bleu again! and the Chevelure de la Vierge, and the Ville-d'Enfer, the sparkling glaciers, the many-coloured peaks above which the Lion-Blanc reared its snowy crest!

He explained it all in a husky tone, trying to make gestures of admiration with his wasted fingers. Behind him the couple stood smiling, gratified to witness his enjoyment.

He was served with dinner at the inn by the side of the lake and provided with a good bed.

Rising at dawn, Lagnerot, as soon as dressed, went to wake the tourists, according to the custom of the guides. But the couple had already risen and were chatting together.

Lagnerot heard the husband say:

"Shall we take him up? You know it will be more fatiguing than yesterday. Perhaps we'll have to drag him all the way!"

The lady laughed out, "Poor old man!"

Lagnerot was startled. At first he could not fully comprehend. He crossed his trembling hands on his staff and stood with open mouth. He tried to think, to ponder, to recollect; but his brain was almost as incapable as his limbs. The reality gradually dawned on his mind as he looked at his wrists, which were quivering on the staff, and on his limbs, which seemed ready to give way beneath him. Almost stupefied, he fetched a deep sigh and turned back slowly without knocking at the door.

Shortly afterwards, the couple found him seated by the side of the blue lake, gazing up on the rose-tinted mountain tops.

"Well, Monsieur Lagnerot," they said. "Aren't we going to the peak? There's no time to lose if we are to return to Luques this evening."

The old guide shook his head and remained silent.

They did not insist, but left him alone, after instructing the innkeeper to take good care of him until their return.

Lagnerot remained on the spot. Dipping his hand in the icy water of the lake flowing between the rocks, he moistened his brow, and sat with eyes riveted on the rising sun.

At ten o'clock the innkeeper invited him to table, but he declined. He neither ate nor drank. He wandered away to the Chevelure de la Vierge, and was pleased to feel a little of the cold spray from the rocks striking his face.

At two o'clock the young travellers found him cold and unconscious. They covered him with wraps and gave him a stimulant.

He regained consciousness, looked at the two for a moment, and then closed his eyes. But he opened them shortly after, smiling in his tears.

"Pardon!" he stammered; "but you are so good! Yes, very good to contrive to give me this pleasure! If you believe in God, let me tell you that I shall pray for you every day until my death."

He rose and walked behind them, accepting their arms in the difficult places of the descent, and was able, the same evening, to reach Luques-de-Born.

The husband slipped two louis, the price of the excursion, in Lagnerot's vest pocket at the moment when the old man turned round to take a final look at the Lion Blanc.

. . . . . .

From that day the old guide put aside his velvet suit, his iron-tipped staff and his shining medal. He was seen at times wandering about the streets, but in appearance he was ten years older and scarcely ever spoke. He was almost blind, and seemed to be deaf, resembling a lifeless body which still moved slightly, but whose soul had made the ascent to the valley of his youth, to rest in sight of the resplendent peaks and the eternal snows at the foot of the Chevelure de la Vierge.

Digitized by Google

IRISH MARY

A STORY OF THE SEPOY MUTINY.

IT was in the early days of the Sepoy Mutiny, and the revolt had already begun.

At little Flutterhabad, a small government depôt occupied by companies of the Sixth, one of the Inverary Rifles, and a battalion of native foot, under Captains Donaldson and Clare, though but thirty miles from Delhi, they were unconscious of any danger till, two days before, a messenger on horseback arrived at the cantonment with a note from the officer in command of the neighbouring town of Susi, informing Captain Donaldson that some of the sepoys there had raised cries of disaffection, that a large body of mutineers were reported as marching on the place, and, therefore, the officers of the Sixth were implored to start with all speed, and with whatever force they could muster, to intercept these latter, as, were they once to coalesce with the disaffected within the walls, the lives of the English would in all probability be the sacrifice. No time was lost in complying with the appeal contained in this dispatch, and the senior captain thought himself showing extraordinary prudence in deciding not to take the native battalion, in which, however, he had full confidence.

The regiment marched out of Flutterhabad an hour before sundown, leaving behind it, besides the soldiers' wives and children and the civilians, an English sergeant and ten men to overawe (!) the native troops; also the young wife of Captain Clare, with her little baby two weeks old.

The overpowering heat, dust, and noise of the dirty little town had so affected Mrs. Clare, in her delicate state of health, that her husband had moved her to a deserted mosque, about a quarter of a mile distant from the depôt, and which, standing in a garden thickly overgrown with palms and tulip trees, made a pleasant sort of improvised bungalow for the invalid.

The fierce day had faded into evening at last, the evening of the day after the departure of the troops, and Mrs. Clare lay on her couch, her ayah squatted on the floor beside her, with the infant in her arms, and the punkah waving with monotonous regularity over her head, being pulled to and fro by a servant seated in the verandah outside. The croaking of the frogs could be heard distinctly from the pool in the deserted garden below, mingling with the sharp "cheep, cheep" of the lizards, and an occasional murmur from the cantonment, or the shrill "ta-ra" of the bugle for supper; but it was not to these customary sounds that Mrs. Clare was listening as she leaned rather forward on her elbow.

"What can it be?" she said at last. "Don't you hear it, Zeena? Can it be the Sixth returning?"

"The mem sahib is feverish. Zeena hear nossing at all; and de sahib Clare and de Sixth not go to come back till to-morrow."

"But we were to have heard from them to-day, and there has been no message. Could anything have happened to him? Oh, no, not that! And yet it is so strange, no one coming near me this evening, not even Mrs. Smyth, as she promised or—there, Zeena, you must hear that.

"That" was audible enough indeed—a cry from the cantonment something between a shriek and a shout, and followed by a confused hum of many voices.

"Soldier got bhang—drunk—mad," said Zeena lazily. "Sergeant put him in black-hole."

"It is news of some sort from the regiment. Zeena, give me the baby, and run up to the cantonment and see what it is; and ask Mrs. Smyth to come back and stay the night with me. Make haste, run." And as the lady clapped her hands impatiently, Zeena rose with the silent docility of her class, and, only waiting to lay the infant by its mother, and place a tumbler of cooling drink beside her, sped swiftly through the low, arched doorway, and disappeared into the darkness.

Left alone, Mrs. Clare's anxiety increased. The strange rolling sound was now plainly distinguishable from the measured tramp of soldiers, and that some great excitement was going on at the cantonment was more and more evident. Once a shrill cry rose faintly into the air. Then came the sharp clang of a bell as suddenly suppressed, and yet no thought of danger there or to herself crossed her.

. . . . . .

A step aroused her. A quick, noisy step coming nearer every moment. Was it her husband? No, that was no smooth, military tread, but a woman's; and not the smooth, cat-like fall of the Hindoo, but one flying up the garden walk with frantic, almost clumsy, haste; another moment, and there was a clatter on the marble steps; another, and the heavy cloth curtain draping the arched doorway was roughly torn aside, and a young woman, with a sun-burnt, freckled face, hung round with tangled, reddish elf-locks, and lit by a pair of laughing blue eyes, bare arms hugging something like a dingy bundle of rags to her bosom, herself clad in similar rags of divers hues, badly covered by an old plaid cloak, thrust herself into Mrs. Clare's dainty presence—the girl, nick-named "Irish Mary," wife of a soldier in the Sixth, and a kind of self-constituted sutler to the corps.

She seemed beside herself now, for, after a pause for breath, she darted to the couch where the pretty patrician lady lay, and exclaimed, in tones hoarse with excitement, "Mrs. Clare, dear, is it lyin' here ye are, as if nothin' were doin'! Get up and fly for the love o' Heaven. Ochone! ochone! It's small chance ye'll have, anyhow."

"Fly where? From what?" cried Mrs. Clare, her indignation at the intrusion lost in astonishment, as the other, having deposited her bundle on the bed, almost lifted her on to her feet.

"From murther and slaughterin', an' worse a million times to the like o' you an' me!" Mary cried, her rough hands busy in thrusting Mrs. Clare's little, bare feet into a pair of shoes, and flinging a dark cloak, which happened to come handy, over her muslin wrapper. "Shure, an' aren't the Sepoy divils afther enterin' the depôt, an' our soldiers drugged aforehand, and no shot fired to stay them! Hark to thim, dear! There's a cry! Och! hurry, hurry, as ye're a livin' woman. There'll not be wan alive an hour hince, nor we aither if we're not gone from here!"

"The Sepoys here?" stammered Mrs. Clare. "Do you mean our battalion has risen?"

"An' have let in a couple of hundhred more, at laste. Misthress, dear, for God's sake don't stan' there. There was wan of ours as wasn't drugged—Sergeant McCann he was—an' the thing I stumbled over at the gate was the dead body of him hacked thro' and thro'. Shure, an' I turned straight roun' an' niver stayed till I got here; for I knew 'twas in yer bed ye were, an' none to purtect ye."

Digitized by Google

"Thank you," said Mrs. Clare faintly and very pale, but still holding back; "but go yourself. I could not run or walk either far, and Captain Clare will be back in a few hours now, if he be alive, and if not, I—I would rather die here."

"Die, is it," cried Mary contemptuously, "and d'ye think I would be afther fearin' death, if that was all? Or d'ye think it's betther for the captain to fin' ye a slave to the black haythens and yer child's brains dashed out on the stones, as they did wid the childher at Meerut? Missis, I'm flyin' for Jim's sake an' me boy's here, an' I'm not goin' widout you; for the captain's been good and kind to Jim. Come, ma'am, hurry! Ye'll walk betther yersel' than if ye were tied to a gun an' driven. Here, take hould o' that shawl while I rowl the childher together. I'll carry them, and you kape close to me, and don't spake above yer breath. This way—so!"

The will of the Irish girl was paramount to-day, and the lady followed, with the meekness of a child, in her footsteps.

The eastern sky was red as blood from the blazing roof of her own house in the officers' quarters; and in that scarlet light Mrs. Clare could see the hillside and the walls of the cantonment dotted over with black figures, while the whole air seemed alive and quivering with a turmoil of shrieks, cries, and yells of agony or triumph.

One look was sufficient, and then, as the whole history of their successful treachery burst on her mind, Gertrude Clare cowered closer to the side of the Irish girl whose very existence she had hitherto so loftily ignored, and clung to her, murmuring: "We shall never escape! What hope is there for us?"

"Lave hould an' follow me, or it'll be thrue for ye," Mary muttered in curt response as she dived into a dense thicket of prickly pear and jungle grass, tramping a path in front with her strong feet, and leaving many a fragment of her ragged garments, many a streak of blood on the thorny boughs, yet never suffering a touch to disturb the sturdy, brown-skinned, eight-months' baby, or the tiny infant of scarce twice as many days which she carried so tenderly on her right arm.

On and on, tearing their feet and hands, stooping their heads low, praying inwardly the whole time, they struggled on for half-an-hour, treading their way at random through the scrub, only trying for the time to put so much more space between them and their foes; on and on, the Irish girl walking with the firm elastic tread of one well used to the march, the English one staggering after with a step momentarily slacker and more uncertain, until they reached the outskirts of the wood, and found themselves on the edge of a large field of Indian corn, covering the summit of the low hill where they stood.

Then as Mary stooped lower with her burden, that her head might not show above the tall green stalks through which she was about to make her way, Mrs. Clare gasped out:

"Go on. Save yourself. I can do no more," and sinking down, fainted away at her humble friend's feet. At the same moment the latter's baby, awakened by the sudden shock of the falling body, set up a piteous wail.

Half beside herself, Mary crouched down, hushing her baby to her breast with one hand, while with the other she loosened the fainting woman's dress, and turned her face upward that the night air might refresh her.

Loosened the fainting woman's dress.

She could do no more. There was not a drop of water near to moisten the lips already black and parched, but after a brief while, when her child, being fed and soothed, had fallen asleep again, she laid both babes down by Mrs. Clare and crept on hands and knees to a little eminence, where she could have a view of their surroundings.

Poor Gertrude! she was roused from her merciful stupor by something sharp stinging, and, opening her eyes, saw Mary leaning over with a branch of some thorny plant in her hand; but not even the seemingly cruel method of her revival recalled her so much as the look of horror on the girl's face.

"Foller me—so!" the latter whispered, and, crawling behind her, Gertrude came to a point where, peeping through the sheltering stack of the Indian corn, they could see the valley beneath. They were not more than half a mile, as the bee flies, from the mosque. It lay just below them, its white domes gleaming out of the tufts of palms, like a globe of frosted silver in the moonbeams. Mary pointed to it silently, and Gertrude felt her blood grow chill within her veins as she saw five armed figures, their black faces and white turbans plainly discernible in the pure white light, as they stole through the garden to the door from which the two women had so recently escaped.

"Hark!" Mary whispered—and even with the words there came to them upon the wind the faint cry of baffled rage, as the murderers found that their prey had escaped. The next moment they came rushing out into the garden again, beating about in search of their victims. Mary's hand closed on her companion.

"If they find our thrack, an' come shtraight afther us, they'll be ten minutes gitten' here," she said huskily. "An' if we're not gone—Missis, dear, I only ax ye to run ten minutes more. If we can but get through this field, an' down on the other side toward the river, I know where we can hide, an' they'll not be follerin' fur fear o' bein' cut off by our men. Only kape up yer heart for the love o' God, an' thry."

"I will do my best," answered Mrs Clare; "but if I drop, leave me. It will not be your fault, and I shall not suffer long."

Mary said nothing, but squeezed the slim, white hand in her brown and horny one, and then, only waiting to lift the mercifully sleeping children, they resumed their flight.

But before they reached the further extremity of the cornfield, Mrs. Clare stumbled, and Mary stopped of her own accord, warned by the long-drawn, gasping breath, that her companion's strength had well-nigh come to an end. A new idea seized her, and, taking off her cloak, she succeeded in strapping the infants on to her back, then, making Mrs. Clare take her arm, led her on, cheering the sinking woman every now and then with an encouraging whisper.

It was down-hill now, but every step was a stumble, every breath a prayer, and they had gained such a little distance.

Suddenly Mrs. Clare reeled, and the hold on Mary's arm gave way. The red spots on her cheeks had died out, and a mortal pallor was there instead.

"Mary," she said, every breath coming with a moan, "leave me now—I command it. You've done your best. God bless you. Go, take your child, and give me mine. It could not live long without me, and I can go no further, not one step."

And looking in her face, Mary Kirwan saw it was true. What was to be done? For a moment she stood still and mute, then a scarlet colour rushed into her cheeks, and she fell on her knees. "Oh, Lord Christ, I see a way, but it's hard!. Help me to do it; for there's no other at all.

It was a moment's prayer, and no sooner uttered than she rose, undid the children from her back, handed Mrs. Clare her own, and tenderly wrapping up the other in her cloak, darted away with it among the corn stalks without a word.

When she came back, her arms were empty, and her face was white as death.

"Mary!" cried the English mother, "where is it? What have you done with it, your child?"

"I've put it down," her lips quivering as she raised the other. "Maybe they'll not be afther seein' him (for it's in a hole he is—among the corn) widout he cries, an' he'll not do that the darlin', when I've nursed him but the now, an' wrapped him up warm to slape."

Digitized by Google

"But Mary, my God! What do you mean?"

"Mane! shure, that I can't carry you and the childher too," said Mary simply, "an' it's thrue, ye can't walk any further. Och! don't be talkin', but hould yer own tight while I lift ye. Shure it's not the feather-weight ye are. Don't be talkin', I say," checking with an almost fierce authority the resistance which Mrs. Clare would fain have offered as she was lifted from the ground. "But iv yer never axed the Mother o' God to pray for ye an' yours, as you're a mother yersel', ax Her now for me."

And on she strode as she spoke, walking far more swiftly now under her burden than when she had to accommodate her steps to the fragile creature behind her; though, now and then, a sob broke from her bosom, rending the heart of the prostrate woman she carried.

Yet it was not the weight that distressed her. It was the mother's heart in her, fighting and breaking for that sturdy, brown-skinned infant, whom every step put farther and farther away from her, and still she hurried on more swiftly for the agony in her mind, sometimes running, sometimes stumbling, sometimes nearly falling, never daring to pause, or lift her head once for a single breath.

Mary felt sure that, could she only reach a shelter she knew of, namely, an ancient tomb, half hidden among jungle and creepers in a thicket near the river, and which, though once often used as a sleeping place by tramps, fakirs, and smugglers, had, by some accident mysteriously significant to the natives, become unclean and had been shunned henceforth as an accursed and polluted spot by Mohammedan and Brahmin alike, they might safely hide there till the return of the regiment from Susi.

And she did. As the eastern sky flushed into a delicate rose colour, tinting earth and cloud with an ineffable opaline glory, her sore and weary feet stumbled heavily into the thicket of which she had been in search, and dropped upon the damp earth within with a cry of thankfulness, half inaudible from fatigue.

They were safe.

And Mrs. Clare, rising to her knees, took the brown hands, to which she owed her life, in her little fingers, covering them with tears and kisses as again and again she poured thanks and blessings on her preserver. Mary checked her.

"Whist! Not a word above yer breath! Shure it's scarce a hundred yards we are from the road, an' I'm hearin' somethin' passin' the now."

Men's voices were indeed audible, laughing and talking loudly along the road. There might have been half-a-dozen by the noise, but whether they were deserters, or only coolies on their way to labour, the women could not tell, as they cowered in the inmost recesses of their sanctuary, not even venturing for the next half-hour to creep out to drink at a little muddy pool among the reeds, though their lips and throats were so parched and swollen by this time that, during the period of waiting, they had hardly been able even to whisper a word to one another.

Mrs. Clare, with great discretion, drank sparingly, and would fain have coaxed Mary to do the same, but the latter plunged her hot face deep in the water, swallowing it in gulps, and only replying when she had slaked her thirst to the full.

"Lave me alone; it's got to last me till I get back."

"Back! where?" Mrs. Clare asked, but was abashed by the reply:

"Shure, an' is it lave me child for good I'd be doin'?"

Gertrude burst into tears. Her long fainting fit had confused her, and she now reproached herself bitterly.

"Ah! how could I let you! And you whom I've often looked down on! Why didn't you leave me instead?"

"You're a woman yersel'," said Mary gently. "An' could you be afther lavin' a feller-woman now to the marcy o' thim black divils? As to the boy, acushla"—her plain features working unrestrainedly with the sorrow she tried not to express in words—"wasn't it betther to lave him awhile, an' he slaping like an angel in me ould cloak, that's for all the world the colour o' the groun'? Shure, I tuk him to the font meself afore iver we left Calcutta, as is more than iver ye've been afther doin' for yours, I'll be bound, the purty, wee craythur! So I'd the clane right to say to our Blessed Lord: 'It's You he belongs to now, so take care of him till I'm comin' back, for it's meself is takin' care of a poor unbelavin' sowl for You,' I said, an' where would that be ef I didn't?"

"But Mary, Mary dear," cried Mrs. Clare, weeping more freely for the girl's simplicity and confidence. "Don't go now. It will be only throwing away your own life, and if they have discovered him—oh! please God, they have not!—it will be too late, too late to save. Don't, Mary! The Sixth will be here a few hours hence, and then we will go back together under good guard and search for him, and he shall never want for anything again if I can help it, or you either. Only stay!"

But Mary shook her rough head doggedly.

"I could thrust Him above to help me when I was thryin' to help Him," she said; "but ef 'twas carin' for meself I was—an' shure anyhow is it I could sit here an' me purty, bright-eyed boy, Jim's one bairn, tugging at me heart-strings all the while?"

And yet it was with a stern, beautiful patience that she delayed another ten minutes to feed Mrs. Clare's tiny infant, which had awakened, crying with a hunger which no longer warded off rapid movement, and which its poor young mother had no power to relieve. Then, her work of charity completed, the private's wife gave the babe back to its mother, and, cautioning the latter to keep well within shelter till she saw relief at hand, and undaunted by the growing heat of the sun, her terrible fatigue and bleeding feet, untroubled even by the prospect of almost certain discovery, she sallied forth on the return search for her child.

Left alone, the hours passed wearily with the officer's wife. She was worn out with fatigue and agitation. She was faint with hunger, and, do what she would, her child wailed and fretted.

The hours wore on. The sun rose higher and higher, till the low entrance to the ruin glowed like a yellow mouth of a furnace. The child, tired with crying, fell asleep again; and she herself was resting in a sort of half-slumber of exhaustion, when a noise from without startled her into a sitting position, her heart sick with terror. There was the regular tramp of many men coming up the road.

Was it the Sixth? Or was it the party of mutineers which had separated from their fellows?

If it were the former, and she remained in her hiding-place, they might pass on and leave her to perish of hunger and weakness. If the latter, and she were to show herself, God only could foresee her fate in its full horror. And the tramp, tramp, came nearer and nearer. She could hear the murmur of voices, and catch now and then the gleam of arms among the trees which hid the ruin.

The suspense became intolerable. Laying her child gently in a dark corner, she crawled to the entrance and looked out. A body of troops were passing, and almost passed. She could see the scarlet uniforms of the Sixth, and the Scotch caps and grey jackets of Captain Donaldson's men. She could almost hear the words of the soldiers, as at quick march and in double file they passed along, their sternly vengeful faces telling of the work they had been doing and the work they were about to do, and yet, when she tried to call to them, her tongue clove to her mouth, a mist rose before her eyes, and, with a faint cry, she sank face foremost on the ground.

When she recovered she was in her husband's arms, and his grateful tears were on her face. Little did that young officer, who had heard of the attack on Flutterhabad and the wholesale massacre, expect to see his wife alive and safe. The Sixth had indeed met and defeated the party of which they were in search, with more ease than they expected, and were in consequence returning rather earlier, when met en route by the body of mutineers dispatched for that purpose, and who, by first harassing and then leading them in pursuit, had without the loss of more than two or three men contrived to delay them two good hours on their way.

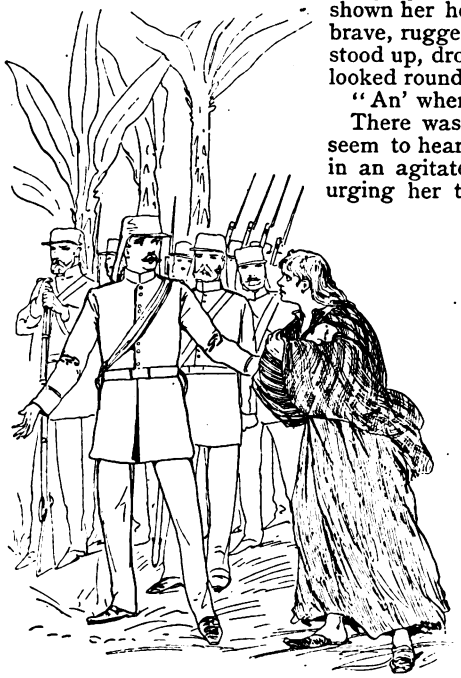
But what of Mary?

Digitized by Google

No one can tell what she endured in her return search for her child. It was then in the last week of May, and the heat at eight o'clock was so intense that it seemed to frizzle the brains in her uncovered head. She had lost a shoe, and her feet were cut and swollen. Her head felt swollen too, and her eyes dim and distended. It was the effect of the too hearty drink in the hot sun and the want of food, which was, besides, making her sick and giddy; and as the sun grew hotter and hotter, a species of delirium seemed to seize her. She saw before her a crowd of Sepoys, with inflamed eyes and dark, ferocious faces, and in the midst of them her baby held on high by one of the miscreants, in the act of dashing its brains out upon the ground.

She shrieked aloud in her agony, darted wildly forward, stumbled, fell headlong to the ground, staggered to her feet again, and, lo! the Sepoys were gone, and, instead her child was wailing, wailing, somewhere in front of her. Yes, she saw it now distinctly, wrapped in the cloak as she had left it among the cornstalks, and near it, crouching for the spring, a huge Bengal tiger. Again she screamed and sprang forward, throwing out her arms wildly to scare the animal, and again the horrible vision vanished, only to be renewed a thousand times in a thousand different forms.

Once she met a gentle-looking Parsee face to face, who stopped her and gave her some "chuppatties" (coarse meal cakes) and a drink of sour milk, and warned her earnestly against returning to the town, signifying, by gestures as well as by words, the fate which had befallen her friends there. She ate and drank ravenously of what he gave; but only shook her head at his advice and hastened on. The Parsee went his way, shaking his head. Evidently the poor woman had been driven mad by the slaughter of those belonging to her, and he should only embarrass and compromise himself by trying to detain her.



"An' where's my Jim, at all?"

And then at last, all at once, the weight rolled off her brain, and the red mist from before her eyes. She was on her knees in the maize-field and in front of her was the very hole where she had laid her infant with the rusty plaid cloak crumpled on the edge of it.

But the child?

For a moment an awful despair seized her, and a cry broke from her lips, so shrill and unearthly that it scared away a couple of vultures who were hovering low over something a yard or two distant. A little cooing, gurgling note of pleasure answered, and turning, she saw a round, rosy face among the cornstalks, and a pair of fat hands, and naked, dimpled feet, trying, by stretching and crawling, to get at the mother who had left it.

When Captain Clare, accompanied by four of his men, entered the same field in search of his wife's preserver, they found Mary quietly seated on the ground, nursing her baby, and the ringing cheer which greeted the sight might have shown her how her heroism was appreciated by those brave, rugged hearts. She hardly heeded it; but just stood up, dropping her courtesy to the officer, and then looked round at the others.

"An' where's my Jim, at all?"

There was no immediate answer. The men did not seem to hear, and Captain Clare began thanking her in an agitated way for all that she had done, and urging her to hasten with him to the carriage at the foot of the hill, where Mrs. Clare was waiting for her, which was to take them both under a strong escort to Susi, and thence, as soon as possible, to Calcutta. Mary courtesied again.

"Thank ye, sir. It's very good ye are to me; but I'm not wantin' to lave me husband, though it's not 'on the strength' I am. Shure, I'll go down to him the now, since he's no mind to come up to me. Maybe, though, he's not got lave to fall out o' the ranks for that."

The last words were said piteously, her eager, excited blue eyes lifted to the officer's kindly face. Very gently he took her arm.

"Come to the carriage first, Mary, any way. Mrs. Clare wants to—to speak to you. My good girl, my brave girl, you're not going to give way now!"

"Is it kilt he is?" she asked hoarsely; and then, before any reply could be given, save the mute answer of the eyes, the child fell from her arms, she reeled suddenly, and dropped, a senseless, crumpled heap, at the commander's feet.

When Mary recovered from the shock occasioned by her husband's death, she accompanied Mrs. Clare to England, and was ever after her constant companion. The two boys became fast friends, and when young Kyle, Mary's boy, grew to man's estate, Mrs. Clare had him established in a small business, for, as she said, "she could never do enough for the son of the woman who had so generously saved her life."

THE EXPLANATION OF THOSE PIOUS BURIALS.

ON the frontier opposite Spain, like a dog couchant between two pillars, lies Querterac, guarding the entrance to a valley. On the right and left the mountains, broken for a space, resume their monotonous, unending chain. Querterac is a small, old-fashioned town that was once fortified. It is difficult of access, and has about 6,000 inhabitants.

On the neighbouring mountain, regarded as neutral, was gathered a population as doubtful in morality as in nationality—a confused mixture of Gascons, Basques, and Catalonians, whose chief occupations were highway robbery and smuggling.

About the middle of the present century cholera was devastating Spain, Italy, and France.

In the country and in the towns there was a cessation from the activities of life. The inhabitants barricaded themselves in vain against the invisible enemy, which glided treacherously through half-opened doors, locks, and unsuspected openings in roofs and walls. In Querterac, a victim from the first day, nothing could be seen but deserted streets and houses closed from top to bottom. Those who fell in the public squares had no assistance, for pity was dead through fear.

The civil authorities were disobeyed and despised as useless and powerless, no regard being paid to the official notices that were placarded on the doors and walls.

If fear was great and selfishness hard in the city, the country was even more distracted and cruel. If a beggar showed himself at the door of some lonely farmhouse he was received with stones and bullets. The dogs were set on him, and he was maltreated.

Perfectly absurd stories were circulated among the country people. They said that cholera was not so bad as it was reported to be. Many people who had seemingly died of cholera had really been poisoned by some enemy, who had drugged the water or kneaded arsenic into the bread.

Digitized by Google

In short, the people in the valley were eternally in dread of some hostile action on the part of "those rascals up above," as they called the mixed race that dwelt in the caves and recesses of the mountains.

The opportunity was a good one for these mountaineers to plunder the flocks and property of those below, but "those rascals up above" never stirred from their holes. Why?

Well, they also were dying. They seemed to die in more astonishing proportions than elsewhere, and one never could have believed that there were so many people in those mountains.

At Querterac there was considerable astonishment, for after a few days the epidemic began to decrease, but the mountaineers insisted on dying. The townspeople did not understand it, but they could not help admiring the piety of those people above. Every evening three or four jolting vehicles loaded with coffins and followed by men and women in mourning descended slowly through the ravine, entered the village and passed silently toward the cemetery.

The shadows of the mourning cortége in the light of the glowing fires cast dark, fantastic pictures on the walls. The passers-by fled at the sight, seized with fresh alarm. It was over a lonely route that the procession passed to reach the cemetery, and those poor wretches, those heathens, followed their dead to their last resting-place, when it would have been so easy to throw the bodies into the ravines and rivers or to leave them to the wolves and eagles; but no, those wanderers, those aliens, scrupulously regarded the rites of burial.

The charge of the custom-house at Querterac is one of great importance, and generally falls to a competent officer. From this point inspectors, going to and fro, carefully watch the narrow valley which is the only easy entrance from Spain. During the epidemic death interrupted the routine of duty, for on some days twenty men fell victims to the disease, and the survivors, distracted by the panic, neglected their work.

One man only kept his post, the old man Valgenod. He always sounded the final "d." He was a born custom-house officer. He belonged to that race. He could smell a smuggler three hours before he saw him, and six miles off a bale of tobacco would make him sneeze.

Night and day he kept on his rounds, declaring that it would be an absurdity for an old custom-man to die of the colic, as he called the cholera. The guards were increased, and Valgenod went the rounds of those who did not answer to their names at roll-call.

He was always watching the mountain, the lair of the monsters. He knew them every one—those smugglers on whom he had fired so often when he had found them prowling round the town on some dark night.

There was one old man, Father Meritas, a grey bearded gipsy, with whom Valgenod had frequently come into contact, and each had a high opinion of the cleverness of the other.

"Valgenod!" said Meritas. "The scoundrel! If it were not for him! If he were only out of the way!"

"Meritas!" said Valgenod. "The rogue! The day after my death he will smuggle Madrid into France."

Meritas was a smuggler—as Valgenod was a custom-house officer—from temperament and instinct. It was his vocation. Numerous were the tricks that he invented, the schemes that he devised, and he was never caught.

In the caves of the mountains were hidden bales of tobacco, cloths, skins, Spanish laces, and liquors. In some way or another all this merchandise was gradually smuggled into France, but how, no one, not even Valgenod, knew.

It was the third day of the epidemic, just about twilight, that Valgenod, scenting the winds and looking round, saw a cart, drawn by a broken-winded mule, entering the valley and going straight toward the gates of the town. Behind came Meritas and a few ill-clad fellows of his tribe, who were singing psalms in a harsh patois. The cart was a railed one, and, in spite of the approaching darkness, the sergeant made out the long shape of a coffin.

"Ah," he moaned. "There is suffering up there, too. Honest people are not the only ones to die, I see."

He drew himself up to let the procession pass and gave the military salute—a corpse deserved such salute even though it was one of those reprobates.

Before the walls of the custom-house, Meritas, whose eyes gleamed like two fires in his pale face, raised his long lean arms to heaven and sobbed:

"My wife! my wife! my wife!"

"Poor old man," said Valgenod, and he drew a match to light his pipe, for he felt an unusual tenderness creeping over him.

Two days later another procession was seen winding along the mountain, and Meritas was walking behind. This time there were three coffins in the cart.

"Well, now," thought Valgenod, "these cannot all be his. Perhaps it is a subscription."

But the old smuggler was tearing his beard and shrieking in broken tones at the top of his voice:

"My sons! my sons! Who can give me back my sons?"

The sergeant saluted three times, and the entire post, drawn out in line along the open gratings, uncovered piously before the bitter grief of the distracted father.

Every evening at the setting of the sun a funeral procession passed through the town, and Meritas invariably formed part of the cortége. He walked with a friend on each side supporting him, calling aloud on God, blessing the dead and lamenting his fate. He buried in order his wife, his sons, his daughters, his nephews, his cousins. One day he besought Valgenod to kill him, and end his suffering.

"He is getting silly, and there is some reason for it," said the sergeant shrugging his shoulders.

Finally, so strong is pity, he felt his former respect grow into love for his old enemy.

These funerals continued for three weeks. Then the people in the town began to wonder. Querterac awoke from its stupor, and the epidemic seemed to have disappeared. The deaths became fewer and fewer; the windows were opened; every one would have regained confidence if it had not been for those mournful processions that came down every evening from above, a lamentable proof that the epidemic was still raging, if not in the city, at any rate in the outskirts.

One evening—it was the last—three carts, as usual, were crossing the city bridge. One of them, the foremost, struck against a mile stone. The mule backed, and the cart upset, throwing its contents, two coffins, at the feet of Valgenod. In the fall, the lid of one of the coffins fell off.

Immediately Meritas and all the mourners, spreading out their arms like the wings of birds, fled to the mountains. Valgenod was astonished to see instead of the corpse, before which he was already preparing to flee, rolling between his legs four bales of merchandise carefully marked.

"To arms," he cried.

The post ran up, but it was too late. The smugglers had escaped. The other carts were seized and the coffins opened. They were all filled with merchandise. Valgenod tore his hair.

This then was the key to the mystery, and the explanation of those numerous deaths, of those pious burials. Not one of those "rascals up above" had died from cholera. Meritas had not lost a wife or sons, daughters or cousins. All the coffins that had entered Querterac, and had been saluted by the custom-house officials, had been loaded with lace, liquors, and tobacco.

They had been taken through the deserted streets, and the contents stored in a house at the gates of the cemetery. When the house was searched it was empty. The merchandise had been sent away every day to the large towns.

The villagers smiled. Valgenod swore that in future he would refuse to pass a skeleton unless he turned his pockets inside out. Meritas disappeared.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:-

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PALACE STEAMERS.
(Weather and other circumstances permitting.)

BOULOGNE and BACK for 10s. 6d., MARGATE and PARIS DAILY (except Tuesday), from Tilbury by LA MARGUERITE.

Trains from Fenchurch-street Station at same fares. Weekdays, 8.33 and 8.38; and Sundays, 8.45 and 8.55 a.m.

DAILY SAILINGS from Old Swan Pier, London Bridge (except Fridays). MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and BACK by ROYAL SOVEREIGN at 9.30 a.m. YARMOUTH and LOWESTOFT by Palace Steamer VICTORIA, from Harwich at 3.0 p.m., in connection with the KOH-I-NOOR, from Old Swan Pier, at 9.10 a.m.

Trains from Fenchurch-street at same fares. Royal Sovereign, 10.28 a.m.; Koh-i-Noor, 10.15 a.m.

Offices—33, KING WILLIAM STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

VICTORIA STEAMERS.
(Weather and other circumstances permitting.)

CLACTON, HARWICH, and BACK in a Day, YARMOUTH, Lowestoft, Ipswich, and Felixstowe. DAILY (Fridays excepted), when the Lord of the Isles will run to Clacton, by KOH-I-NOOR, from Old Swan Pier at 9.10 a.m., calling at Woolwich (South) and Tilbury. Tender Steamer from Greenwich 9.25, and Blackwall 9.35 a.m. Special Train from Fenchurch-street Station at 9.45 and 10.15 a.m., to meet the Koh-i-Noor at Tilbury.

SALOON STEAMER LORD OF THE ISLES, from OLD SWAN PIER, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and S. Woolwich. MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and THURSDAYS, SOUTHEND, SHEERNESS, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 11 a.m. FRIDAYS, CLACTON, SOUTHEND, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 9.10 a.m.

SATURDAYS, HUSBANDS' BOAT to MARGATE and BACK, at 1.30 p.m. Train, Fenchurch-street Station, 2.54 p.m., in connection.

SUNDAYS, ROUND NORE LIGHT, ROSHERVILLE, and GRAVESEND, at 2.45 p.m.

ROSHERVILLE GARDENS and GRAVESEND DAILY (Friday excepted) by MERMAID at 10.0 a.m. and 3.0 p.m., from OLD SWAN PIER, calling at Greenwich, Blackwall, and Woolwich.

HAMPTON COURT, RICHMOND, or KINGSTON, from OLD SWAN PIER at 10.0 a.m. DAILY, by CARDINAL WOLSEY, calling at all piers.

KEW GARDENS, GREENWICH, and BATTERSEA PARKS, frequently.

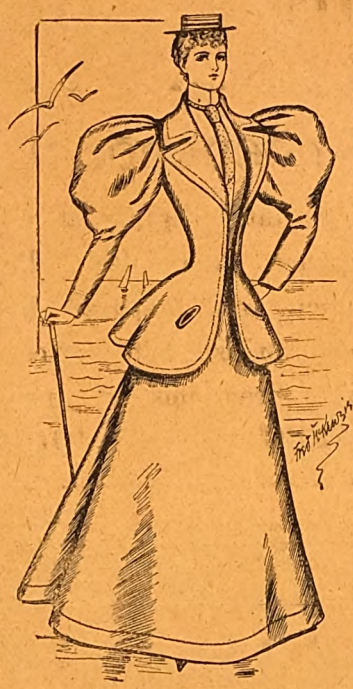
Cheap Through Tickets to and from Stations on District Railway.

Offices—VICTORIA HOUSE, LAURENCE POUNTNEY LANE, E.C.

ANOTHER GREAT SUCCESS!

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the World, AT LESS THAN HALF ORDINARY PRICES.

OVER EIGHT HUNDRED WORKERS EMPLOYED.



The most remarkable of all the costumes that have ever been produced is the one here illustrated; it is undoubtedly the most popular style of the season, and has been generally adopted as

A LADY'S HOLIDAY SUIT.

THESE SUITS ARE MADE IN THE JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE (REGD.) IN NAVY BLUE OR BLACK. ALSO IN FASHIONABLE GREY OR DRAB HOMESPUN MIXTURES, AND NAVY OR DRAB TWILL DRILL, each suit consisting of a smart shape open coat or jacket—stylishly cut, beautifully made with two pockets, and finished all round edge of coat with special quality silk cord—together with a wide bell-shape costume skirt trimmed to match jacket. The jacket fits closely to the back of the figure, and remains gracefully open in front. These two garments, viz., 15/-

JACKET AND SKIRT COMPLETE

form at once a smart, stylish, and yet most useful outfit for wearing with a blouse or cambric shirt, and are offered for the amazingly low price of 15s. Ladies are asked to consider what this means: a really well-made fashionable outfit that any lady might be pleased to wear, made without the slightest approach to sweating, and yet supplied complete

FOR FIFTEEN SHILLINGS.

Every garment is made in the firm's large, airy, and perfectly appointed workrooms, and is surely value that will please every lady in the land.

When ordering please state measurement across back from shoulder to shoulder, also length from neck to waist at back. The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 ins. round bust under arms. Larger or special sizes 1s. 6d. extra. Each suit is packed in strong leather board box, and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES, made from the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete for the ridiculously low price of 10s. 6d. each.

10/6

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES 8/9, KNOCKABOUT FROCKS from 1/6.

 PATTERNS, also Illustrated "Book of the Serge," and Fashion Sheet of other Costumes for Ladies' and Children's Wear sent POST FREE to any reader of Short Stories on application.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL—"THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR"
(By GEORGE GRIFFITH, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," and "The Syren of the Skies.")

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 299.—Vol. XI. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 22, 1894. [Price One Penny.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS

4/- LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. 4/-

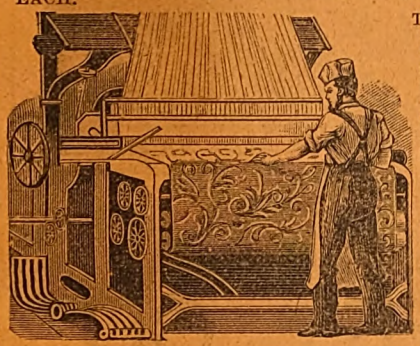
EACH. EACH.



THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of SHORT STORIES only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 Stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY SIZED ROOM. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.

GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says "Unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our customers.

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.
M. Lock writes: "I received the Carpets. Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.
Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this Paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. HARGREAVES.

ESTABLISHED 1872.

Address—The British Carpet Weaving Company,
31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH AND LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.
MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.
SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH,
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.
Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S Strengthening SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from
THE INFANTINA COMPANY,
London, S.W.

THAM'S
WORLD FAMED
CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,
M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists,
CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

Digitized by Google

ENAMELLED COPPER ✦ LETTERS

FOR

TRADESMEN'S WINDOWS, FASCIAS, SIGNS, OR TABLETS.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

Most Effective Medium

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

ENAMELLED IRON PLATES.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

Call and see our Stock, or send for Price Lists.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

Only Address—

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 299.—Vol. XI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 22, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

The Kaiser's Tree

IT was in the year of grace, 1511. Two men were crossing the turf of the quiet Minster Square in Breisach; one was somewhat advanced in years, with fine, aquiline nose, full blonde beard verging on grey, and long hair that escaped in heavy locks from under a red velvet berretta. He walked with so majestic a tread that it was very evident he was no common man, but one on whose broad shoulders rested an invisible world. Handsome, tall and noble, he was indeed a King among men—a Kaiser—a German Kaiser from crown to toe; a poet too, he was, and a hero in the true sense of the word—Anastasius Grün's "Last Knight," Maximilian I.

Here in Breisach—his city as he called it—the Kaiser escaped from all affairs of State, and here he wrote those tender letters to his daughter Margaret, in the Netherlands. But in 1511 threatening clouds hung low and shadowed the Kaiser's brow, for they presaged a storm that was to carry him away for ever from the quiet spot of earth he loved so well. His eyes swept sadly over the bright landscape that lay at his feet; and suddenly turning to his companion he asked:

"Whose children are those?" pointing as he spoke to a niche in the wall, where a boy and girl knelt and with great industry were planting a rose-bush. The girl was about eight years old, and the boy some four years her senior, and so absorbed were they in their work that they did not hear the Kaiser's approach. When he stood beside them the boy looked up and exclaimed:

"Why, it is the Kaiser!"

"What are you doing there?" asked Maximilian, his artistic eye feeding the while upon the charming little pair.

"We are planting a rose-tree to the dear God," said the lad fearlessly.

"And do you think the dear God will be much pleased?"

"It is the best we have," he said, shrugging his shoulders.

The Kaiser smiled, as he asked: "What is your name?"

"Hans Liefrink."

"And is the little girl your sister?"

"No, she is our little neighbour, Councillor Ruppacher's Mailie."

"Ah, indeed! And you love each other very much?"

"Yes, when I grow up—and have a knife—I am going to marry her." The Kaiser looked astonished.

"Must you have a knife to get married?"

"Yes, certainly," answered the lad. "Without a knife I cannot cut, and if I cannot cut I cannot earn money, and I must have a great deal to marry Mailie, because she is a Councillor's daughter."

All Rights Reserved.

"But what will you cut?" the Kaiser inquired.

"I will cut wood."

"Ah, I understand now, you want to be a woodcarver. Was that your father's art?"

"Yes. When I was little I watched him carve, and now I want to learn myself; but father is dead, and mother cannot buy me a knife."

"Will this do?" And the Kaiser drew a magnificent many-bladed one from his pocket.

The hot colour rushed into the boy's face, and one could almost see his heart beat with joy through the coarse, torn shirt.

"Yes, yes," he stammered; "it is splendid!"

"It is yours; be diligent with it," said the Kaiser.

Hans took it timidly. "Thank you very, very much," was all he could say, but a bright fire glowed in the dark eyes that showered sparks of love and gratitude upon the Kaiser.

"Now you can go to Nuremberg."

"I should love to go there to Dürer's, for I will never carve plates. I can't bear such flat work; I mean to carve figures that are natural, and that one can take hold of."

"The genuine sculptor!" exclaimed the Kaiser. "You are right, Hans Liefrink; hold to what is natural, and you will never fail." He drew a leathern purse from his doublet, and handing it to the lad, said: "Only have patience, Hans; keep these guldens until you are old enough to travel, then go to Dürer and tell him that as his Kaiser once held the ladder for him, so shall he hold it now for you to mount as high as he. Will you promise me all this?"

"Yes, dear Herr Kaiser," cried Hans enthusiastically, and he took the Kaiser's hand and kissed it in his sudden joy. "If I ever carve the dear God," he exclaimed, "I will make him look just like you."

"Farewell," laughed the Kaiser, as he strode down the mountain with his companion.

The boy stood as in a dream, while Mailie chewed a hole in her apron. A maid came in search of her, and to her Mailie told the story of the Kaiser and the knife. It soon became the gossip of all Breisach. "Hans Liefrink was such a bold fellow; it was no marvel that he should have been prattling to the Kaiser," and everyone wanted to see the wonderful knife and the contents of the leathern purse. But the latter Hans was prudent enough to show to no one.

Years passed. Hans Liefrink lost his mother—Mailie hers, and the orphaned children were drawn closer together. In the evening, after work, Hans would break through the hedge that separated the gardens, and would carve lovely figures for Mailie, such as no child in all Breisach possessed; and she listened in open-eyed wonder and admiration while he told her of the wonderful pictures and wood-carvings he had seen in the Freiburg Cathedral. Whenever they could they ran up to the Minster and watered the rose-tree—the "Kaiser's tree," Hans had named it—and there they loved to linger, hoping always that their kind friend might come again. Often they called aloud: "Herr Kaiser, dear Herr Kaiser, come again"; but the childish voices echoed and re-echoed in vain under the blue sky—and the Kaiser came no more.

Digitized by Google

The little ones grew up, and the "Kaiser's tree" grew with them, and they seemed more and more drawn to it and to each other, as though its tender roots had reached out silver threads of love into each heart, and bound them close with ties that held them fast. But, alas! this one true friend was not strong enough to hold together what men would keep apart.

The lovely, stately Ruppacherin, the Councillor's daughter, dared no longer be friendly with the poor wood-carver; her father strongly forbade it, and put a high wall between the two gardens, so that Hans and Mailie lost all chance of meeting, save at the "Kaiser's tree," and here, but rarely, when the Minster was deserted.

But this only made the stream of love that coursed in their hearts overflow their lips; and one evening when Mailie had long been absent from the "Kaiser's tree," Hans sang his first love song under her window that overlooked the little garden:

"My heart is mine no longer,
'Tis stolen quite away
By a maiden, sweet and lovely,
Who listens to my lay.

"There grows a slender rose-tree
Within the Minster's shade,
And underneath its branches,
A sign of love is laid."

Early the next morning Mailie came to the rose-tree, and found a tiny golden heart hidden in the moist grass; she listened with sparkling eyes and burning cheeks to Hans' words of love, and laid the tiny golden heart on her own fast-beating one, and swore never to let it go, while Hans, half mad with joy, cried: "Ah, if only the Kaiser would come now"—but the Kaiser came no more.

The autumn passed, winter came, and the young people saw each other more rarely than ever, but Hans often sang the "Song of the Rose Tree," and many another, all telling of his love for Mailie, till at last her father noticed it and threatened her with his curse if she did not stop all intercourse with the "good-for-nothing artist."

So one day Hans and Mailie stood for the last time beside the rose tree they had planted many years before. Mailie had told Hans of her father's threat, and now she stood silent, her hand resting in his, while tears coursed slowly down her cheeks.

"Mailie, tell me that you do not think me such a worthless fellow."

Her blue eyes looked full into his brown ones, and a smile of love and trust crept over her face.

"No, Hans, indeed I do not; no one shall ever make me think that. They do not know you as I do; you have taught me all that I know that is great and beautiful; you have moulded me and made me what I am, even as your artist-hand forms an image from a shapeless piece of wood," and she took his strong hand and pressed it to her soft, warm lips, then folded her white fingers over his brown ones and added: "I will believe in you always, for you honour God with your art, and whoever does that cannot be evil."

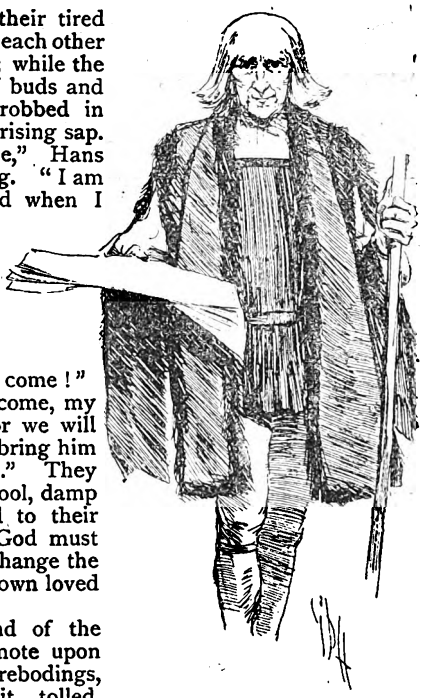
"And will you be true to me, Mailie, till I have brought my art and myself to honour, and till I come back to claim you for my bride?"

"Yes, Hans, I will never leave my father's house but to go to you—or to the cloister. And if I should die before you come, I will ask them to bury me here, under the Kaiser's tree, where we have been so happy. Then, if you come back and lie here in the sunshine to rest you from your toil and sorrow, every rose-leaf that falls on you shall be a kiss from me," and she wept on his breast, their tired hearts beating against each other in the pain of parting; while the promise of spring—of buds and roses—pulsed and throbbed in the rose-tree with the rising sap.

"Don't cry, Mailie," Hans said, trying to be strong. "I am going to Dürer's, and when I have learned to do something of worth, I will seek the Kaiser and ask him to use his influence with your father."

"Oh, yes, if the dear Kaiser would but come!"

"He will certainly come, my love," said Hans, "for we will pray the good God to bring him to us—or me to him." They knelt together in the cool, damp grass, and it seemed to their trusting hearts that God must work a miracle and change the Kaiser's tree into his own loved presence.



The kindly old messenger left.

Suddenly the sound of the great Minster bell smote upon their ears—full of forebodings, mournfully, slowly it tolled. People began to climb the hill that led to the church, and Hans ran to them with eager inquiry.

"Where have you been?" they said, "Have you not heard that our Kaiser is dead?"

The Kaiser dead! Poor Hans stood as if turned to stone. Where were all his hopes? He rested his burning brow against the cool stem of the rose-tree and groaned aloud.

The knell ceased, and all nature was so still and dead, it seemed as though spring and life could never come again. A light hand rested on his bowed head; Mailie had come to be his comforter.

"Oh, Mailie, the Kaiser will never come again!"

"But God is with us," said Mailie softly. As she stood before Hans in her maiden purity and beauty, the light of inspiration overspread his face, and he whispered low:

"Mailie, God is truly with us. He shows me now—as in a vision—the Queen of Heaven surrounded by holy angels, and if I can but carve all that He shows me, I shall be great myself and need a Kaiser's help no longer."

Next morning at daybreak Hans set out. As he passed Ruppacher's house loud and clear his voice rang out:

"My heart is mine no longer,
'Tis stolen quite away——"

Softly one of the lower windows was raised and a white handkerchief waved a last farewell through the dusky light; the song went on, but the voice grew trembling and uncertain—full of unshed tears—then ceased, and all was silent once more.

Years passed and nothing was heard of Hans Liefrink, and no one thought of him, save Mailie, in whose gentle, loving heart he was ever present and ever dear, and who watched for him till at last hope was almost dead, and the roses faded in her cheeks, and a dumb sorrow looked out of the sweet blue eyes.

Her one pleasure was the care of the little rose-tree, and tenderly she watered it each day and saw with loving pride that it repaid her care, for it grew stronger and taller till it reached the very top of the niche where it was planted, then fain would go beyond, but she bent its budding top and bound it fast within the niche. She could do her work without hindrance from her father, for he was buried deep in political matters brought about by the Reformation, and paid but little heed to his daughter.

Breisach was trembling much for its old faith, and Duke Ferdinand, Kaiser Maximilian's nephew and successor, counselled her children to do all they could to strengthen the Catholic faith, by means of votive offerings and ideal paintings and sculptures in their churches. The Minster had long lacked a high altar worthy of it; and notices were sent broadcast bidding all German artists to send in their best plans, that the best might be chosen and the work began.

Digitized by Google

Mailie heard but little of all this, for she never went among the people, and lived alone in her little bay-windowed room, waiting for Hans to come. But she was growing weak and weary with waiting, and the eyes she turned toward the Christ that Hans had carved for her were often full of tears. Five long years had passed since she had seen him, when one evening—.

"There grows a slender rose-tree
Within the Minster's shade," echoed softly as a summer zephyr under her window. She sprang to the casement and looked out, but could see no one in the darkness. Love lent wings to her feet, and like an escaped bird she flew up the mountain-side to the Kaiser's tree, where two strong arms clasped her and held her close, while her head swam, and it seemed as if the waters of the Rhine were closing in about her. They held each other long in silent embrace, for true love needs no words to tell its depths. Hans was the first to speak.

"How pale you are, sweetheart; are you ill?"

She shook her head with a happy laugh. "Oh, no; not now. But you were gone so long. Why did you not come sooner?"

"I could not, little one. If I had come back a poor, unknown fellow, your father would have dismissed me again. So I stayed and feasted my eyes on all the art treasures of the great cities, and worked in Dürer's studio till my name was mentioned with honour among his pupils, and I said to myself, 'Now you may woo the lovely Mailie.' And when I heard there was to be a new altar put in our Minster, I hastened here to make application, and, if I am found worthy to do the work, what can your father have against me then?"

Mailie shook her head doubtfully, but Hans was full of joy.

"How the Kaiser's tree has grown!" he cried, in wonder; "it seems to have taken all the warm blood out of your cheeks, its roses are so red. Give my love's roses back to her," he said, playfully brushing her cheek with a flower, but they were pale and white. "That is not good paint; let us try this," and he pressed a kiss on her cheek. "Ay, that is better," he laughed, and laid her blushing face against his breast. "Bloom out, my little rose; the spring is almost here."

The next morning the usher of the high-gabled town hall came into the Council Chamber with hesitating steps.

"Your honourable body will be graciously pleased to pardon, but there is one without who insists upon coming into your presence."

"Who is it?" asked the Burgomaster.

"It is Hans Liefrink," said the usher, "but so much changed I hardly knew him. He wants to compete for the new altar, and submit his plans."

"What have we to do with such a scrapegrace as he? Let him go back where he came from," was the decision. "We want no such bunglers as he."

The kindly old messenger left the room with a somewhat crestfallen air, but returned almost immediately, bringing a paper of draughtings with him, which he presented with many bows and apologies.

"Liefrink begs you will examine these, your worship, and you can inquire of Dürer, in Nuremberg, as to his ability."

"If the fellow don't take himself off we will have the jailor after him," cried Ruppacher in a rage.

"Softly, softly, Master Ruppacher, the draught represents the coming of the Mother of God in Heaven, and is right fancifully thought out, it seems to me."

"But to imagine a thing is much easier than to do it. Liefrink never could do such a thing," said one of the Councillors. "Besides, it was simply ridiculous to give such a work into the hands of a Breisacher child, whom some had even looked askance upon." So Hans was summarily dismissed.

The authorities finally decided to send their plans to Albrecht Dürer and to let him be their judge; and, at the same time, with the letter from the Council went a letter from Hans to his great teacher and good friend.

Weeks slipped by in alternate anxiety and sweet stolen happiness for the lovers; they met as formerly at the Kaiser's tree, for the struggles of 1524 drew Ruppacher's attention from his daughter, and Mailie grew bright and rosy in this spring-time of love. At last Dürer's answer came; but who can describe the amazement of the Council when it was found that the letter contained Hans Liefrink's despised plan and these words: "I can recommend nothing more beautiful than this plan of my friend and pupil, Hans Liefrink, whose ability to execute it I fully guarantee."

Half-an-hour later a crowd of people pressed up to the narrow street and stopped before Hans Liefrink's little house. He came to the door, and, to his astonishment, saw a deputation from the Council, one of whom stepped up and told him with great pomp that his plan had been approved by Dürer, and he had been chosen by the Council to execute the high altar for the Minster.

Hans almost shouted for joy. Was it really true, or only a beautiful dream! When the deputation had departed he hastened over to Ruppacher's, for this was his time to speak.

Mailie opened the door for him—a low cry of happy fright, a quick kiss—and she disappeared into her own room, where, with beating heart, she sank before her crucifix and implored the Blessed Virgin's help. Hans stepped fearlessly into Ruppacher's presence, who cried with flaming eyes:

"What do you want?"

"Herr Ruppacher, I know an honest man who loves your daughter and who would marry her, and I want to bring him to you."

"So——and who may he be?"

"Myself, Herr Councillor."

"You! Did anyone ever hear such impudence. The beggar dares——"

"Herr Councillor," Hans cried out, "I never was a beggar. My father was poor, but he supported us with his wood-carving, and after his death my mother took care of herself and me by the honest labour of her hands. The only things I ever received in my life were the knife and the purse from Kaiser Max, and those I did not beg—he gave them to a poor boy in whom he recognised an aspiration for better things. I have worked hard with the knife and educated myself with the money, and both have yielded me good interest. I am no beggar, Herr Councillor, and for the next two years the commission I have just received will enable me to abundantly provide for a wife."

"Carve an altar that is higher than the church in which it stands, and you shall have my daughter."

Digitized by Google

"Two years, and what then?" sneered Ruppacher.

"Then new commissions will come!"

"Oh, you think you are something fine, no doubt, but you belong to a race of star-gazers and loafers, who do nothing but spin dreams and are too lazy to work."

Hans was burning with indignation, but he controlled himself for Mailie's sake, and only said:

"A Kaiser held the ladder for Albrecht Dürer—the ladder on which he painted—and a town councillor of Breisach, whose dust will soon be scattered to the winds, insults his best-loved pupil. There, I tasted all the honour of my reputation; here, I must be insulted and trampled upon!"

"Then go back to your honour. Why did you come here with your silly art?"

"Because I love your daughter so truly that no sacrifice is too great to be made for her; and because I want her for my wife."

"Well, then, I will tell you that you are as likely to marry a wife as far above you as my daughter is, as you are to build an altar in the Minster higher than the Minster itself."

"Is that all you have to say, Herr Councillor?"

He laughed contemptuously. "Carve an altar that is higher than the church in which it stands, and you shall have my daughter—not before—so help me God!"

A piteous cry came from the next room. Ruppacher opened the door; Mailie lay unconscious before the crucifix. Hans hastened to her, but the angry man raised his hand against him.

For a moment it seemed that the sacred knife must leap from his pocket; but he struggled with himself, and rushed out of the house, up the hill to the Minster, to his old friend, the "Kaiser's tree."

It was a perfect noonday. A cloudless sky arched the shadowless earth; the castle of Sponeck was outlined against a background of gold, like some fairy-palace, and the Rhine broke in foaming surf on her steep rocks. But the beautiful picture before him wounded Hans, for it seemed to him that nature was unsympathetic with her child's grief, and he sat in the niche, under the rose-tree, for the first time failing to find happiness there.

He could never win Mailie now, no one could help him, not even Kaiser Max, if he should come back from the grave, for had not Ruppacher sworn a terrible oath that he should never have her till he had made an altar higher than the church?

This was impossible, unless God should work a miracle for him; perhaps he might never see her again, and tears of longing and pain coursed down his cheeks, and he buried his face in his hands like a helpless child, and none came to comfort him; all was silent around him, save the chafers humming about the roses.

Suddenly something struck him sharply on the back; he started and turned quickly, but it was only the little rose-tree that had at last, by its own strength, broken forth from the niche where Mailie's hand had bound it, and in escaping, had struck him as if in greeting. There it stood, tall and straight, and he saw for the first time how much higher it was than the niche in which it grew. Quick as lightning a thought shot through his tired brain. A moment of reflection—a cry of triumph—then he fell on his knees in joyful thanksgiving. "Lord God, Thou art great, even in Thy small things, and Thy wonders never cease!"

What was it that the little tree had taught him? What was it that made him kiss its rough bark in a wild transport of joy?

Hans saw Mailie no more; her father had sent her to the convent at Marienau, yet her prison walls were not so strong but that a song, a greeting from Hans, sometimes reached her. He, too, lived like a hermit in his cell, working from early dawn till the last faint streaks of light tinged the western sky. Curiosity ran high, but every request to see his work received the same answer: "That was not included in the contract; you must wait."

At last, after two long, weary years of patient labour he declared the work done, and three days later, on the Feast of the Assumption, the new altar was to be dedicated. Great was the excitement, and that morning an unusual crowd of worshippers climbed the Minster-hill. Joyfully the bell rang out across the Rhine, and Hans, who had been in the church since daybreak, gave one last glance of love at his work, and with bowed head and bent knee said: "God, bless Thou the work of my hands," then disappeared behind the altar to watch the effect of his work upon the people.

The doors were opened, the crowd entered, and a cry of admiration echoed through the church. The altar lay in the full rays of the morning sun and the whole glorious vision stood out before their eyes in perfect rounded forms. In the centre was the Blessed Mother with her arms crossed over bosom, and head meekly bowed, to receive the crown that God the Father, and God the Son, held above her.

When the service was at an end everybody pressed forward to see the creator of the great masterpiece. He came from behind the altar, modest and deeply moved, but so handsome and so full of unconscious pride that every eye hung on him in admiration.

"Is not the Ruppacherin like the Blessed Mother of God?" whispered one in the crowd.

"And God the Father is like Kaiser Max," said an old man. "'Tis his face exactly."

Like a train of fire it ran through the crowd that Liefrink had put Mailie Ruppacher and Kaiser Max in his work.

"Yes, dear friends," said Hans quietly, "you are right, and I have done it because I know of nothing in the world more beautiful and good than the Ruppacherin and our dear dead Kaiser."

"Well said. He is right," was heard on all sides. Now Hans went fearlessly to where Ruppacher stood.

"Herr Ruppacher," he said, "two years ago you promised me your daughter for my wife when I should have fulfilled a strange condition made by you. I was to build an altar higher than the church—an impossible thing you thought; but look up, Herr Ruppacher, the altar is a foot higher than the place in which it stands. I have only bent the top."

The Councillor looked up and grew pale. He had not thought of that. A murmur of applause ran through the crowd.

"I have done my part, Herr Councillor, now do yours, and give me your daughter for my wife."

"It was the Kaiser's tree that taught me that."

Ruppacher tottered as if struck by a heavy blow. Hans had taken him at his word, and he was not the man to trifle with his oath. He took Mailie's hand and placed it in her lover's.

"A Ruppacher has never broken his oath. Take my child," he said drily, "since I have sworn."

"Mailie, my wife!" cried Hans with exulting joy.

After seven long years of alternate hope and despair he had won her for his own. Words cannot describe Mailie's look of happiness as she was folded in his strong arms.

Some of their old companions ran out and hastily wove two crowns from some twigs of the rose-tree, and amid loud applause they crowned the master and his bride. But Hans laid his crown on the steps of the altar, and said:

"Let them be God's roses, for through them He saved me. Look, Mailie," he whispered, pointing to the bent summit of the altar, "it was the Kaiser's tree that taught me that."

Three weeks later Hans and Mailie were betrothed before the altar. Breisach had never seen so magnificent an affair, and Father Ruppacher was no longer so testy as one might think, for he had now more respect for the worthless art of his son-in-law.

Digitized by Google

OLD BARNABY'S BESS.

BESS had been put to a great deal of trouble this day. There was always plenty to do at Freshwater Ranch, and she also had to do it all, for the old man, Barnaby, had ceased to be of any particular use in this world long before Geronimo had become the war chief of the Chiricahua Apachés.

Bess, his daughter, managed the ranch, milked the cows, cooked the food, did the washing, attended to the modest little garden that she had coaxed from the arid Arizona soil, and even gave the two cayuse ponies that belonged to her father all the grooming they ever got. Besides that, she had to attend to the selling of water from the artesian well that was the only excuse for Freshwater Ranch's existence.

There was not so very much traffic on the road that ran by Mount Graham down to the dusty Gila Valley, but there were forty miles at a stretch of it, and Freshwater Ranch had the only water that was to be found upon it.

And so, when the freight-teams and the army ambulances made the trip from Fort Grant to Fort Thomas, the teamsters were very glad to pay a shilling a bucketful for water and double rates for forage. And that is how Bess made a living, a wretched, lonely, almost outcast living, for her father and herself.

But there was plenty to do this day, and plenty of excitement. For the first time in all her memory a whole troop of handsome cavalrymen, with a bright-cheeked and still handsomer young lieutenant at its head, had come to Freshwater Ranch to actually camp over night, and perhaps stay even longer.

A body of White River Apachés, getting over the effects of a tiswin drunk, had crossed the reservation, and started on a murdering and thieving raid after their usual manner. Quite after their usual manner, also, two troops of cavalry had started in pursuit, following their trail with the faint hope of catching up with the fleet-footed Apachés; while the remainder of two regiments of cavalry and twice as many of infantry had been put at patrol duty, and at the guarding of waterholes, springs, and mountain passes.

It is the young lieutenant who is sent on this patrol duty as a rule. The more experienced officers are sent in pursuit. And it is a hard grind, indeed, on the nerves of the impatient young lieutenant to sit for days in his camp watching the surrounding country through his field-glass and receiving the reports of his scouts, always the same monotonous: "Didn't see no signs of 'em, sir."

It is his ambition to get under fire. It is the height of a young lieutenant's wildest dream to capture or kill a raiding Apaché. And so the poor fellow gnashes his teeth and swears at his luck, and looks through his field-glasses until he can see all sorts of things with his tired eyes—except Indians.

But woe to him if Mr. Crazy Bear, with his family and relations and intimate friends, happens to slip through his lines during the night and the trail is not discovered promptly the next day. Woe to him if it is the grinning captain of the pursuing troop that tantalisingly informs him, while he is still rubbing his sleepy eyes, that not only Crazy Bear, but he with his whole troop of tired cavalry has been able to steal upon him and past him.

On the other hand, though, what glory if, by a rare piece of good luck, one of his men dashes breathlessly in while the dew is still heavy on the lean bunch-grass of the mountain with the exciting report that he has happened upon the raider's trail, and that it is but an hour or two old!

Then it is "Boots and saddles!" and mount and away, and ten to one the lieutenant is able to cut in ahead of the troops that are pursuing, and, with his fresh horses, and his wild anxiety to "get there," able to catch up with Mr. Crazy Bear, and capture him and all his retinue, after a nice little skirmish, in which he gets a hole through his hat, we hope, and not his heart.

And then he is one of the regiment's heroes. The old captains talk about how young Smith of "ours" cut in ahead of grumpy old Blank, of some other regiment, that never could ride, nor fight either, for that matter. And he sends his campaign hat, with the identical hole in it, back to his mother, who almost faints, and surely sobs for a whole day, and has to pray more fervently than ever that her boy will not be killed by some awful Apaché.

Such was the precise situation of young Mr. Barstow, second lieutenant of the —th Regiment of United States Cavalry, on this day when Bess was at her wits' end with work and excitement.

Chilcauno and his band had crossed the reservation at San Carlos, after murdering a freighter and stealing his horses, and all Southern Arizona was in a state of excitement. To be ordered out to guard a watering station is bad enough, but when you are quite persuaded that the miscreants have gone in another direction, and that you have no chance whatever of being in or near at the death, the situation is almost unbearable.

And that was why Lieutenant Barstow fumed and fretted, and walked up and down in front of the half log, half adobe house called Freshwater Ranch all the long afternoon, and did nothing more important than swear at a trooper, much after the manner of several captains he knew, and then apologise to the trooper and make himself ridiculous, just because he had some of those higher ideas of a soldier.

And so Bess caught but few glimpses of the lieutenant as he occasionally passed the door, but she saw that he was young and handsome, and her woman's heart was in a flutter. It was all that she could do to think up something unusually good for supper.

Besides the regular menu of biscuits, bacon, beef, and potatoes, she had some carefully treasured tinned corn and some tinned peaches. She got out her very brightest and newest calico dress, and braided her unruly hair for the first time for months. She did not even scold the sly trooper whom she caught stealing some milk, for fear the young lieutenant would come round to that side of the house—which would be dreadfully embarrassing. And yet she wanted to see the lieutenant and hear him talk—oh, so much!

She had read in novels some mysterious things about how young people fell in love with each other and married, and—well, everything is possible in this world.

It was at supper that they really met.

The lieutenant made a polite bow. He was a little bit surprised. He had heard some of the other officers of the garrison say laughingly that the only pretty woman in Arizona was Barnaby's Bess—excepting always, from regimental courtesy, the ladies of the regiment.

But he had forgotten all about it in the excitement of his first experience in the field. It occurred to him now, but she was prettier than he had imagined she could be. His ideas of beauty were framed in civilised landscapes, and his divinities had been dressed in costly stuffs and wore diamonds and were buds from mature New York family trees.

But he had not seen a pretty woman for several months, and he was just a little bit embarrassed himself. He hardly noticed the calico. He was quite charmed by the white apron. He concluded at once that, perhaps, this first scout of his would not be so monotonous after all. He would flirt a little—only in fun, of course. It would be rather a relief from the dulness of the post.

So he ate in silence, and stared so hard at Bess that her cheeks flushed a deeper crimson than they had ever known before. And to her amazement and delight he insisted on calling her Miss Barnaby. In her day-dreams she had often imagined some handsome young man addressing her respectfully as Miss Barnaby. Here was the delightful reality. She spilled the coffee, and could not eat a mouthful of supper, although she was tired and hungry.

Digitized by Google

And after supper the young lieutenant insisted on helping her wash the dishes. He said it would be great fun, and quite a relief from the rough life of a soldier. Poor youngster, he had become so used to war's alarms. In fact they had become quite a bore. And it seemed to Bess that he stood awfully close to her.

Once or twice their hands touched—an accident, she was quite sure. And then, when all her work was finished, the dishes cleaned, the cows and horses fed (in all of which duties the young lieutenant helped)—delight of delights! he actually asked her to take a little walk with him.

As for him, well—she was a girl, and she was pretty. Her calico dress looked sweet in the moonlight, and she had taken off the apron. They strolled up the road a little distance, and then branched off on a winding trail that led down to a little valley flooded with the rich moonlight that broke through the clear Arizona atmosphere. There was an intersecting trail at the foot, and when they reached it Bess gave a little start, and the lieutenant, with all his old college days promptness, took advantage of the opportunity to place his arm round her waist.

"Don't be afraid," he whispered.

"Oh, I am not afaid," she answered demurely.

And then she stooped down quickly and seemed to pick something up from the trail.

"Did you drop anything?" he asked with mock politeness. "Why didn't you tell me? It was my duty to pick it up, you know."

"I did not drop anything," she answered. "Let's sit down on this rock."

They sat down on the rock, and the young lieutenant put his arm round her waist again and took hold of her hands, and found himself unconsciously looking for rings, in the manner of young men who wish to hold a young lady's hand, and feel in duty bound to offer some slight excuse to the fair one.

They did not talk very much. There was not much to talk about. Their mutual friends were few, and, therefore, there could be no gossip. Theatres, books, fashions, everything were barred, from necessity. Nevertheless, it was not long before the lieutenant's brown moustache drew gradually near to Bess's pretty lips, and not long after that Bess received the first kiss she ever had from a young man. She did not struggle. She was utterly unaware of the arts of her fair sisters in the East. But she did turn squarely round and look the lieutenant very earnestly in the face.

"Do you mean anything by that?" she asked him.

He was surprised at the question, and he was gentleman enough to perceive that what was a mere evening's diversion to him might be something infinitely more serious to a lonely girl on almost a western desert. He took his hand from her waist and moved away a little.

"No," he answered frankly, "only that you are pretty—and I didn't think you'd mind."

"I didn't mind," answered Bess, "and I wouldn't mind if I thought you cared for me. In fact," she added, with alarming candour, "I would like it if I were sure you were not making fun of me."

The lieutenant was silent.

"Tell me," she said, clasping his hand excitedly, "if I should do something that would be a great benefit to you, would you think more of me—would you love me?"

"No," he answered quickly, standing up and looking at her a little curiously. "You are too serious. I want to be fair. The fact is, I am engaged—to a young lady in New York. We are going to be married in a year or two, when I get more pay. And perhaps sooner—if I could do something to distinguish myself, you know. Her father has enough influence to get me promoted to the staff, or something like that, so we could live in the east and have more pay. Perhaps I owe you an apology."

She was clutching the rough edges of the rock.

"Is she very beautiful?" she asked.

"I think so," he answered. "See, here is a picture of her. You can see what she looks like in the moonlight."

She looked at the photograph a long time.

"Does she always dress like that?" she asked.

"No," he answered laughingly. "That is a ball-dress—an evening dress. It would hardly do for her to go out of doors in a dress like that. She might catch cold. But she is just as pretty in other dresses; and I love her very much."

Bess handed back the photograph, and looked for a long time at the yellow trail. She had bit her lip to repress a sigh, but she had been too long alone and friendless to lose her self-control.

"Look here," she suddenly asked, "if you were to catch these Indians would that be what you wanted to do to be able to get your promotion and marry her?"

"I should say it would," he answered bitterly, "but that isn't my luck."

"It is! It is!" she cried, falling upon her knees by the trail. "See, I give her to you. Look here—and there—and there!" She held up to him the thing she had picked up when he was mockingly polite. "It is the lash to an Indian quirt—worn through. They are riding hard and their horses are tired. To arms! To arms! I tell you, you can catch them before morning! To arms!"

He had started before she had finished, and was bounding up the trail with long, athletic strides, leaving her alone on her knees at the intersection of the trails.

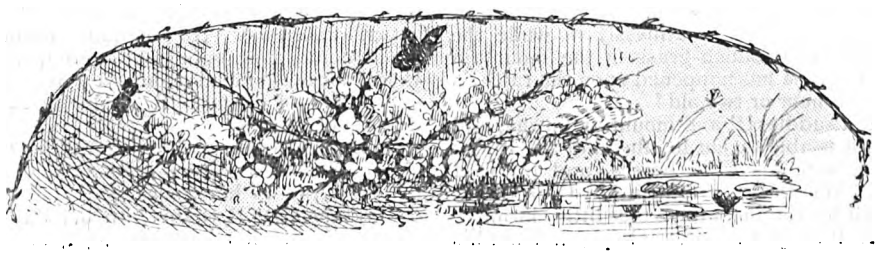
She was still there when the troop rode silently by with the anxious but silent young lieutenant at its head. He bowed to her as he passed, but she did not see him. After the last pack-mule had passed out of sight down the valley, she rose and walked slowly up the mountain.

"I was very foolish," she said. "He has known her a long time, and he never saw me before. Besides, she wears silk dresses all the time and is rich. But that should not make any difference in love. He kissed me! Why should he kiss me if he did not care for me? It is queer. She is a great lady, and I——"

She burst into tears and cried for a long while as she sat on the yellow trail at the top of the hill. It was far into the night when she rose to go.

She heard, far off in the distance, through the clear air, the faint popping of carbines and rifles.

"I have given her to him," she muttered, as she made her way uncertainly to the ranch. "She is a lady, and wears silk; and she will never know about me, for he will be ashamed to tell her; and—and—I am going to ask Father José, when he comes here next year with his little Mexican donkeys and his candles and white robes, why it is that God has never sent anyone to love me."



Digitized by Google

THE GOOD FORTUNATE ONE.

A FAMOUS TALE OF JAPAN.

MANY years ago there lived in Tokio a certain nobleman, renowned for his wealth and his great philanthropy. It was his delight to wander about the streets at night, unattended, and disguised as a simple samurai (knight, or retainer), and so, untrammelled by rank or dignity, enter the theatres and tea-houses of all classes.

One night he was sitting in a tea-garden, in a humble portion of the city, when three young men, dressed as labourers, sauntered in, and, seating themselves near him, called for refreshments of the cheapest kind.

"Will you not honour us by joining in our humble repast?" said one, addressing him with the courteous humility which distinguishes all classes of Japanese. "I see by your two swords that you are a samurai, and far above us in rank, but you seem lonely, and we should feel honoured if you will join us."

The nobleman, pleased with this cordial invitation, immediately left his solitary square of matting and seated himself near the speaker.

"What Daimyo (feudal lord) do you serve?" they asked him, when the formalities of welcome were at an end.

"None," answered the nobleman. "I am a roin (wandering knight), a free and independent samurai, having left by my own will the service of the Duke Itsu," mentioning his own name.

"I have heard that he was a very kind master," said one of the young men. "Why did you leave him?"

"Oh," said the Duke, "he had many strange and undignified habits which kept me in a state of constant mortification. He would wander about the streets of Tokio at night, entering into the commonest tea-houses, and talking familiarly with persons of the lowest rank. I do not doubt that he has been on this very spot."

"Oh, no!" cried his listeners, in some excitement; "he surely would not come to this cheap place."

"I wish that he would come," said one of the three, with a sigh; "I would beg a favour of him."

"What is it that you would ask?" said the nobleman, with great interest.

"My one wish," answered the speaker, "is to ride a horse. I have dreamed many times of being on horseback, and it was delightful beyond words, but I expect to die without ever gaining my desire."

"And what would you ask, if the Duke were here?" said the nobleman, turning to the second youth.

"My great wish," answered he, "is to eat a dinner exactly like the one the Duke eats every day. If I could have one such dinner, I would ask no more."

"And now tell us your desire," said the nobleman, addressing the young man who had first given the invitation for him to join their party.

"I would not be satisfied with either of their wishes," said the young man slowly. "I would desire to live a whole day and night as the Duke lives; to eat from his dishes, to ride in his kago (palanquin), and, at night, to sleep in his bed. Then would I be contented and happy."

"The Duke's slumber is not the happiest," said the nobleman, with a sigh. "Spies and secret enemies lurk, as poisonous serpents, under the castle walls."

For some time longer he conversed with them, learning the name and abode of each; then, bidding them a cordial farewell, he left the tea-house, and made his way to his stately castle.

In the morning a body of servants, carrying heavily adorned kagos, were sent to invite the young men to the castle. Their surprise and delight knew no bounds, and when the mighty Daimyo welcomed them as friends, and seated them in the place of honour, they were ready to burst with pride.

For the one who had wished to ride, he ordered his finest steed, caparisoned in white and gold; but when the young fellow was placed upon it, fear seized him, and he pleaded for mercy.

"No, no, you shall ride!" cried the Duke, in high good-humour; and the horse was made to prance and plunge about the court-yard, until the wretched rider fell to the ground, and had to be carried to his home.

The second guest, who had wished to eat as the Duke ate, was now conducted to the banquet-hall, where such a bewildering and tempting array of strange dishes was set before him that he soon made himself ill, and was borne away groaning and racked with nausea.

The third young man was now the object of attention.

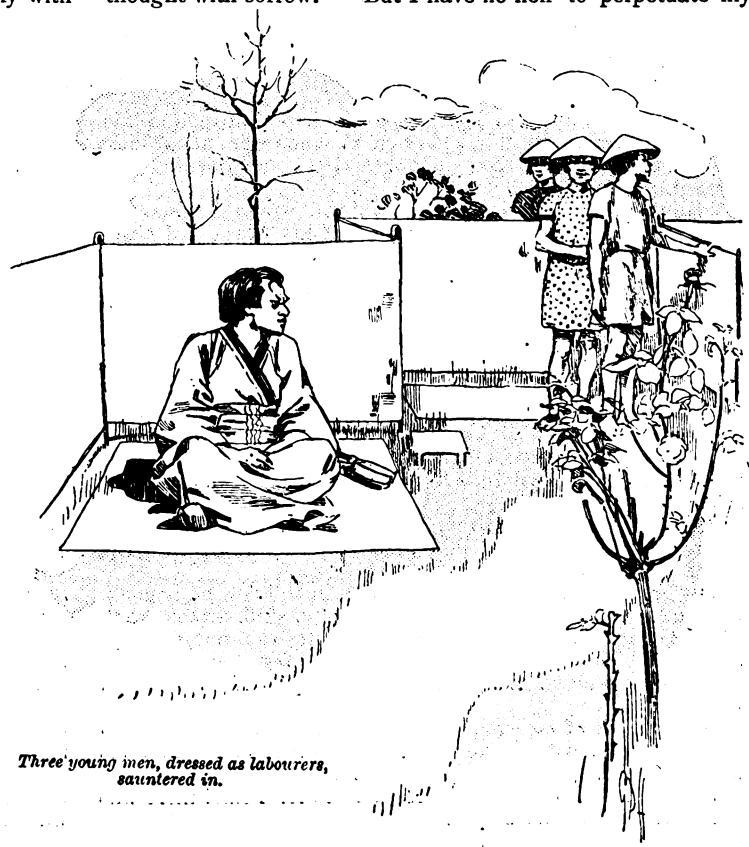
All eyes were upon him as he watched his two friends taken away in misery and disgrace; but his head was set proudly, and he turned with composure toward the Duke.

"I have no fear," he said, in tones which were almost haughty. "I still wish to live one day and one night as thy equal; then I am content."

"Lead him to my richest bath," said the Duke to his servants, "and then attire him as my son."

When the young man re-appeared, his thick hair oiled and perfumed after the manner of noblemen, his tall form robed in silks of heaviest texture, and the two swords of rank thrust through his gold-embroidered sash, he made such a picture of manly beauty that the Duke's heart yearned toward him.

"Would that the gods had granted me such a son," he thought with sorrow. "But I have no heir to perpetuate my



Three young men, dressed as labourers, sauntered in.

Digitized by Google

name; I shall fall like a lonely pine tree beside the river, and none shall come after me."

For that day, the young plebeian was given the name of Yomei (Yo-may), which means one-day-spending, and through all of the ceremonies and observances of rank he conducted himself with such modest dignity that all of the court officials were filled with wonder, and whispered among themselves, "He is born to a high position."

That night he was given the ducal sleeping apartment.

After the castle was still and dark, he cautiously arose, and lighting a candle, prepared to examine the wonders and beauties of the room. Hanging in the toko-mono (shallow alcove) he found a bow of ancient workmanship and a sheaf of arrows such as the old heroes once used. Fitting one to the bow, he gave it a backward pull, when, to his dismay, it slipped from his grasp, and went whizzing through the rich and painted mado (inner sliding walls).

He heard a low cry, followed by the thud of a falling body, and then all was silence again.

"Unhappy wretch!" he cried to himself. "My day of triumph has ended in murder. I have killed some one with my ignorant stupidity, and in the morning I shall be beheaded."

He blew out the candle, and went to bed, where he lay shivering and trembling until the day broke.

Then the sound of the moving servants came to him, and the coldness of despair filled his heart, for he knew that the discovery of his deed might come every second.

Presently he heard a cry of alarm, and then, indeed, did he give himself up for lost.

"Here is a dead man!" exclaimed one, in frightened tones. "Where is he?" "Who is it?" "Who killed him?" came a mingling of voices, as other servants ran crowding in.

"Why, it is the traitor Gujiwa, who has thrice attempted to kill our master." "Oh, blessed deed!" "What a beautiful shot. The arrow has pierced his left eye to the skull." "It is an ancient arrow from the Duke's chamber."

"The young stranger sleeps there to-night; he must have sent the deadly shaft." "Ah! a hole in the mado! He must have shot through the mado." "What skill! What wonderful power; to shoot an enemy without seeing him!" "Wonderful! He has saved the master's life."

Yomei, listening to all this, became almost crazed with delight.

The sudden transition from despair to hope intoxicated him like strong wine. He threw his rich kimono (robe) about him, pushed aside the pierced mado, and strode towards the servants.

"Have you found the traitor Gujiwa, whom I slew last night?" he asked haughtily. "Cut off his head, and carry it to your master with my compliments. I suspected that this attempt would be made, and obtained an entrance to the castle by disguising myself as a labourer."

The servants grovelled at his feet.

"But, honourable lord," implored one, an old man who had been in the family for half-a-century, "how could you take such aim when the mado were closed?"

"Tut!" said the young man with a gesture of contempt, "I do not need both sight and hearing to take good aim. I can shoot any portion of the body by hearing alone. This time I selected the villain's left eye, just as he was winking it."

"Wonderful! Wonderful!" they whispered in awe-struck tones, and he walked through their cowering ranks with the air of a conqueror.

The gratitude and admiration of the Duke knew no bounds. Indeed, so pleased was he with the beauty, skill, and courage of his young protégé that he took measures to formally adopt him; so Yomei was raised from the rank of a bamboo-cutter to that of son and heir to one of the most powerful Daimyo of the empire.

He led a life of ease and luxury, and improved from day to day, so that his fame went abroad to other cities, and his adopted father grew to love him deeply.

But no life can be all happiness, and so for Yomei there was the thorn, the one dark spot.

This was in the person of his adopted mother, the Duke's wife, who from the first had been his bitter enemy. Having no children of her own, she was ungenerous enough to hate the innocent adopted son, who by his very presence reminded her that she had given no heir to the Duke. She also suspected that his skill in slaying the robber was not entirely genuine; and she had learned, beyond all doubt, that his antecedents were of the humblest. At first she tried in every way to turn her husband against him, but, finding this impossible, she set to work to find other means of deposing him.

Soon there came a rumour of a band of robbers who infested a hill in the suburbs of Tokio, and were so fierce that even the soldiers dared not attack them. The Mikado had offered a title and great wealth to anyone brave enough to attempt their capture, but up to this time none had been found.

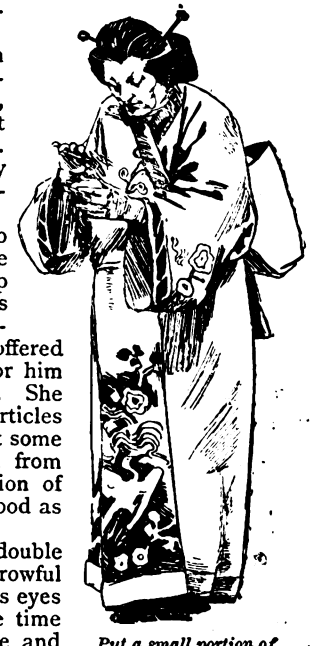
The evil step-mother, without consulting her husband, sent a letter to the Court saying that her noble son Yomei was thirsting for the opportunity to display his skill and courage, and declared that he was able to vanquish the band single-handed.

The Mikado, highly pleased with so much bravery, immediately despatched a royal document to the young man, accepting his services, and ordering him to start forth the following morning.

Poor Yomei was again in despair.

"Alas! the end of my dream has come," he mourned to himself. "There are eleven arrows, and eleven robbers, and so I must kill a robber with each arrow. Oh! why did I not keep to my bamboo-cutting, and leave ambition for the rich!"

His father grieved deeply to see him set forth, but, in spite of his sadness, was buoyed up by his evident anticipation of his son's success. The envious step-mother, affecting equal regret, offered to arrange a basket of lunch for him with her own aristocratic hands. She prepared all of his favourite articles of food, and then, for fear that some lucky accident might save him from the robbers, put a small portion of deadly poison in each piece of food as she laid it in the hamper.



Put a small portion of deadly poison in each piece of food.

Yomei, unconscious of this double danger, bade them all a sorrowful farewell, and rode away with his eyes bent upon the ground. At one time he thought of turning his horse and making his escape, but then he reflected that death would be no worse than disgrace and the old life of toil, and so listlessly kept on toward the haunted mountain.

He had reached the foot of this, when he heard loud, hoarse shouts, as if of triumph, and, filled with terror, he sprang from his horse, and rapidly climbed a tree. In a few moments the robbers were upon him. "Where is the rider?" called out one, looking about him with an aspect of such fierceness that Yomei well nigh fell to the earth.

"The horse is mine!" cried another.

"This is my saddle!" exclaimed a third. "See! It is heavy with silver."

"Ah!" from a fourth, as he tore open the hamper. "I have found the dainty fellow's lunch. Let us feast upon it before we find and kill the owner."

Yomei, knowing nothing of the hidden poison, thought these moments his last. With the apathy of despair, he gazed upon them as they portioned out, with many a rude jest and remark, the food which had been destined for him.

"What carrion the aristocrats do eat!" cried the Captain, throwing from him the remains of a small devilfish stuffed with rice, sugar, and vinegar. "The thing is filled with medicine! It is bitter! By all the fiends of earth and sea, it is poison! We are tricked!"

Digitized by Google

"It is poison! It is poison!" they all shrieked, running frantically past one another, with horrible exclamations and contortions of physical agony. "Where is the man?" they cried. "We are poisoned like frogs in a well! Where is he who has tricked us?"

"There he is!" called the dying chief, who had just caught sight of the cowering Yomei, "Shoot him! Up after him! Burn the tree! Ah-h-h!" But it was too late. They lay about on the lush mountain-grass, in various attitudes of violent death, and their glassy eyes were all turned upward toward Yomei. The fears of that valiant youth, however, were at an end. He descended with a bold and careless air, and, walking from one to another, stuck an arrow deep into the left eye of each. Then, mounting his horse, he rode home.

The first person to meet him was his step-mother. At the sight of him she fell to the ground, faint and stricken with fear.

"Are you not pleased to see me, mother?" he asked brightly. "I must thank you for the delightful lunch you prepared for me. See!" opening the hamper, "every morsel has been eaten!"

His father's joy at seeing him alive was deep and sincere.

"Why, my son," he said, after the ceremonials of welcome were through, "your armour is untouched, your hair is as smooth as when you left the house. How did you slay such a fierce body of men with so little exertion?"

"Oh, it was a simple matter!" said Yomei proudly. "When they caught sight of me, they came toward me running side by side. I took the eleven arrows, fitting them all to my bow which I held horizontally, instead of in the usual manner, and the arrows were placed so exactly that, as they flew, each was pointed towards a robber, and struck him directly in the left eye. You will find them all there now, each with the arrow sticking upright"

"Your skill is more than mortal!" cried the happy father. "Now you are a nobleman in your own right, and will be given a daughter of the Mikado in marriage. I foresee that you will add lustre to the ancient name which you bear." And he fell upon his son's neck and wept with pure joy.

After this the step-mother ceased in her evil designs, fully convinced of Yomei's supernatural powers.

He married a princess, built a great castle for himself, and to this day his name is a synonym in Japan for shrewdness and luck.

THE ALPINE INN.

LIKE many of the wooden hotels found in the rocky crevices which abound among the white summits of the high Alps, the Inn of Schwarenbach offered refuge to any tired traveller who followed the Gemmi Pass. The inn was open for six months, and kept by the family of Jean Hauser, but as soon as the snow began to fall, filling the valleys, and rendering the descent to Loëche impracticable, the women, the father, and the three sons departed, leaving the old guide, Gaspard Hari, with the young guide, Ulrich Kunsi, and Sam, the big dog, to take care of the house.

The two men and the dog lived until spring in this snow prison, having before their eyes nothing but the white slopes of the Balmhorn, and surrounded by peaks buried under the same blankets of snow which almost crushed the little house, heaped on its roof, walled up its door, and blocked up its windows.

It was the day that the Hauser family was to return to Loëche—winter was approaching, and the descent would soon be dangerous. Three mules, loaded with baggage, and driven by the three sons, led the way; on a fourth rode the mother, Jeanne Hauser, and her daughter Louise; following them came the father, accompanied by the two guides, who escorted the family to the end of the pass. This made up the little procession.

They passed the lake, now frozen, which lay at the foot of the rocks, extending before the inn; then they followed the valley, white as a winding sheet, and about which towered all the snow-clad mountains. A ray of sunlight fell across this shining and frozen desert, lighting it with a cold and blinding flame; no living thing was visible in this ocean of mountain summits, no movement in this vast immeasurable solitude, not a sound in this profound silence. Little by little, the young guide Ulrich Kunsi, a tall Swiss, with long legs, left behind him Father Hauser and old Gaspard Hari, and joined the mules on which the women rode.

The younger one saw him coming and watched him with wistful eyes. She was a little blonde; her milk-white cheeks and her very light hair looked as if they had been bleached by living in this ice and snow. When he had reached the beast upon which she was mounted, he put his hand on the crupper, and walked slowly. Mother Hauser talked to him, repeating over and over the innumerable details for the winter's work. It would be the first time he had stayed up there, whereas the old Hari had spent fourteen winters under the snow in the Inn of Schwarenbach.

Ulrich Kunsi listened without noticing a word, constantly watching the young girl. From time to time he replied, "Yes, Madame Hauser," but his thoughts were far away, and his calm face was unmoved.

They reached the Lake of Daube, whose long frozen surface lay at the foot of the valley. At their right the Dauberhorn rose, showing the tall rocks which crowned its peak. As they approached the Gemmi Pass, they commenced to descend to Loëche, and all at once was opened up to them the immense horizon of the Valois Alps, which separate the large and small valleys of the Rhone.

As far as one could see, white summits rose, irregular, flat, or pointed, glistening in the sunlight; the Mischabel with her two peaks, the powerful Wisschorn, the ponderous Brummeghorn, the high and pyramidal Cervin, that slayer of men, and the monstrous coquette, the Dlut-Blanche. Below them, in a deep valley, at the foot of a very steep precipice, lay Loëche. The houses looked like grains of sand, thrown into this enormous crevice, which finishes and shuts in the Gemmi Pass, and opens below on the Rhone.

The mule train stopped on the edge of the serpentine path, which wound zigzag down the mountain side, reaching at last the little village almost invisible at its foot.

"Good-bye, and good courage till next year, my friends," said Father Hauser.

Old Hari repeated, "Till next year."

They embraced each other, Madame Hauser offered her cheek, and the young girl followed in her turn.

When Ulrich Kunsi kissed Louise, he murmured in her ear, "Don't forget us up there," and she replied, "No," so faintly that he had to guess what she said.

"Good-bye," said Jean Hauser again, "keep well."

He passed in front of the women, and began the descent. Soon all three had disappeared at the first turn in the road, and the two guides wended their way toward the Inn of Schwarenbach.

They walked slowly, silently, side by side, realising fully that the summer was over, and that now for four or five months they should see only each other.

Finally, Gaspard Hari began to tell some of his experiences of other winters. He had lived with Michel Canol, who was now too old to try it again, as some accident might happen during this long solitude. They were not lonely, he said. The only way to do was for each one to have his regular work, and then for amusement they played cards, or threw dice—anything to pass the time. Ulrich Kunsi listened, his eyes on the ground, and his thoughts following the little winding path which descended to the village.

Digitized by Google

Soon the inn came in sight, a little black spot in the immense snow cloud. When they opened the door, Sam, the big curly dog, played and jumped about them.

"Come, son," said old Gaspard, "we have no women to help us now, we must get the dinner. You pare the potatoes."

Sitting down on the wooden bench, Hari began to prepare the soup.

The next morning seemed long to Ulrich Kunsi. Old Hari smoked and spat in the hearth, while the young man looked at the glistening mountain in front of the house. In the afternoon he went out and retraced the steps of the day before, hunting for the footprints of the mules on which the two women rode—and when he reached the Gemmi Pass, he lay flat on his stomach on the edge of the precipice and looked at Loëche. The village in its rocky well was not yet buried under the snow which was all around it. The pine forests protected it. The little houses from that distance looked like stones in a field. The young girl was there now in one of those little grey houses. In which? Ulrich Kunsi was too far away to distinguish one from the other. How he wished he could go down there while he might. But the sun had already disappeared behind the high peak of Wildstuebel, and the young man went home.

Gaspard Hari still smoked. When he saw his companion enter, he proposed a game of cards, and they seated themselves opposite each other at the table. For some time they played a game called "La Brisque," then, having had their supper, they went to bed. The following days were like this one, clear and cold, without snow. Old Gaspard spent his afternoons hunting eagles and other rare birds which ventured up to these frozen heights, while Ulrich went regularly to look at the village in the valley. Then they again played cards, dice, dominoes, gaining or losing a little to add interest to the game.

One morning Hari, having risen first, called his companion. A moving cloud, light as foam surrounded them, and noiselessly buried them little by little under a mantle of froth. This lasted four days and nights. They had to break open the doors and windows, and dig a path so that they could get out of the house. The snow in twelve hours had frozen as hard as granite. They lived like prisoners, not venturing beyond their threshold. They divided their daily work. Ulrich Kunsi took the washing and housework, and also cut the wood, while Gaspard Hari did the cooking and tended the fire.

These monotonous and regular occupations were only varied by a game of cards. They never quarrelled, each being calm and placid; they did not even have sharp words, or show any temper, or grow impatient, for they had philosophically resigned themselves to the winter on the mountain top. Once in a while old Gaspard, being the bolder of the two, went in search of chamois. Occasionally he shot one. Then there was great rejoicing in the little inn—a festival with fresh meat.

One morning he went out. The mercury was 18 below zero—the sun had not yet risen, and the hunter hoped to find the chamois near Wildstuebel. Ulrich, remaining alone, stayed in bed till ten o'clock. He was naturally a good sleeper, but he never had dared indulge himself in his fondness for rest while the old guide set him such a good example by being very prompt. He breakfasted slowly with Sam, who passed most of his time, day and night, sleeping by the fire. Kunsi felt sad, frightened by the solitude. Seized by the desire for human companionship, he went in search of Gaspard, who should return by four o'clock. The snow had levelled all the valley, filling up the crevices, effacing the two lakes, covering the rocks. It was blinding to the eyes—a glare of ice.

It was now three weeks since Ulrich had been to the precipice where he could see the village of Loëche; he wished to see it first before cutting a path toward Wildstuebel. Loëche was completely covered by snow, and the houses could not be seen at all, buried under this white mantle.

He turned to the right and reached the Glacier of Loemmern, walking with the long, steady strides of a mountaineer, hitting the snow with his steel-pointed staff, and looking with his strong, far-sighted eyes to discover a moving body on this immeasurable sea of ice. Reaching the end of the glacier, he stopped, wondering if Gaspard had come this way, and, feeling anxious, began to run.

The day was dying, the snow gradually became pink. A dry and chilling wind blew over the crystal surface. Ulrich gave a shrill and prolonged cry. His voice echoed in the death-like stillness. It ran along over the icy billows of the glaciers, like the cry of a bird over the waves of the sea. At last it was heard no more. There was no response.

He resumed his steps. The sun had set. The crests of the mountains were still purple, though in the valley it was dark as night. The young man felt afraid. It seemed to him that the silence, the cold, the solitude of these wintry heights, entered into his very soul, and would stop or freeze his blood, stiffen his body, and make him into a man of ice. He ran as fast as he could, flying toward the Inn. Gaspard must have come home during his absence. He had undoubtedly taken another route; he should surely find him seated in front of the fire, with a chamois dead at his feet.

Soon the inn came in sight. No smoke issued from the chimney. Ulrich ran faster, and threw open the door. Sam curled about his feet to welcome him. Gaspard was not there. Alarmed, Kunsi turned round and round, as if he hoped to find his friend hidden away in some corner. Then he lighted the fire, put on the soup-pot, and waited, hoping to see the old man come in at any moment. From time to time he went to the door to watch for him. Night had fallen, the dark and gloomy night of the mountains. At the edge of the horizon, a dim, new moon was sinking behind the hills.

Ulrich came back, warmed his hands and feet, and thought of all the accidents which might have happened. Gaspard might have broken his leg; fallen in some ravine; made a false step and sprained his ankle; and there he was in the snow, stiff with cold, distressed, lost, crying for help with all his strength, in the awful stillness of the night. But where? The mountain was so vast, and so dangerous at this season, that it would take ten or twenty guides, walking for a week, to find a man in this immense space.

Ulrich Kunsi, however, resolved to take Sam and hunt for Gaspard if by one o'clock in the morning he had not returned. For this purpose, he made all his preparations—putting in his bag food for two days, taking his hob-nailed boots, twisting about his waist a long, strong rope, looking to see that his steel-pointed alpenstock and his hatchet, with which he cut steps in the ice, were in order. The fire burned brightly on the hearth, and the big dog warmed himself in the firelight.

The clock, in its sonorous wooden box, ticked like the beating of one's heart. His ear was sharpened to hear any distant sound, and he started when the wind rattled the roof or the door. Midnight sounded. He trembled. Feeling faint with apprehension, he put some water on the fire, so as to have some hot coffee before starting out. When the clock struck one, he got up, called Sam, opened the door and set out in the direction of Wildstuebel. For five hours he climbed, scaling the rocks, cutting the ice, always advancing, only halting occasionally when the dog hung back, at the foot of some very steep precipice. It was nearly six o'clock when he reached one of the summits where Gaspard often found the chamois, and then he waited for day to break.

The sky was pale over his head. Suddenly a gleam of light, born no one could say where, illumined the immense ocean of white peaks which surrounded him. Little by little, the most distant summits became pink, and the red sun appeared behind the heavy giants of the Bernoise Alps. Again beginning his search, like some hunter who sees the footprints of the chamois, he called to Sam, "Hunt, old fellow, hunt;" and as he descended the mountain, his restless eyes searched every crevice, and he cried shrilly, the cry dying in the awful silence.

Toward noon he seated himself in despair and ate his breakfast, giving the poor dog some food. Having finished, he again began his quest.

By the time night came he had covered thirty kilometres of the mountain; he was too far from the Inn to go home, and too tired to walk any longer, so he dug a hole in the snow, and lay down with his dog, under a cover which he had brought with him. There they rested, the man and the beast warming their bodies against each other, and still frozen to the marrow. Ulrich could not sleep. His mind was full of visions, and his body was shaking with cold. The day was breaking when he rose, his legs stiff as iron, his mind filled with anxiety, his heart beating so loudly that he imagined he heard noises all about him. Suddenly he felt as if he should die of cold in this solitude, and the horror of this thought aroused his energy and re-awakened his vigour. He hurried toward the inn, followed by Sam, limping on three legs.

Digitized by Google

It was four o'clock when they reached Schwarenbach. The house was empty and cold. Ulrich made a fire, ate, and fell asleep—so exhausted that he could not keep awake. He slept a long time—a heavy sleep. Suddenly a voice, a cry, a name, disturbed his slumbers. "Ulrich," it called. Was he dreaming? or was it one of those uncanny sounds which come to those who are losing their minds? No—he listened intently—this shrill cry came through his ears—and penetrated his whole being, to the very end of his nervous finger-tips. Certainly, it had called him, "Ulrich"—it was near the house—he could no longer doubt it. Opening the door, he shouted "Gaspard!" with all the strength of his lungs. No reply, no sound, no murmur, nothing. It was night. The wind had risen, the icy wind which leaves no living thing on these frozen, abandoned heights. It blew in gusts, more deadly and destructive than the hot winds of the desert. Ulrich called again, "Gaspard! Gaspard! Gaspard!" All remained silent on the mountain.

With one bound he re-entered the inn, shut the door, pulled in the blinds, and fell trembling on a chair, certain that his friend had called to him as his soul was leaving his body. He was as sure of this as he was that he lived and breathed.

It had cried its last farewell, its last reproach, its last malediction, to the man who had not hunted until he found his friend—and Ulrich found that it was there—near him, behind the wall, outside the door, which he had just closed. It roved and hovered about like a bird which flutters its wings against a lighted window. The young man was filled with horror. He wanted to escape, and yet he dared not move. The spirit was ever present, day and night, while the body of the old man lay unburied in consecrated ground.

With the return of the sun Kunsi gained a little assurance. He prepared his own breakfast, and made some soup for the dog—then he sank inertly into a chair, his heart tortured at the thought of Gaspard out there in the cold. When night came new terrors again seized him. He walked up and down the dimly-lighted kitchen, pacing from one end to the other of the room, listening for the cry which should break this silence. He felt so alone, this poor miserable man!—more alone!—more alone than any man had ever been, alone in this white desert of snow, alone two thousand metres from human beings, from the life that burns and palpitates—alone in the frozen sky!

An insane desire filled him to go somewhere, no matter where, no matter how; to go to Loëche—throwing himself down the abyss; but he did not even venture to open the door, certain that the other, the dead man, would block his way.

Toward midnight, weary with walking, filled with anxiety and fear, he threw himself on his chair, for he dreaded his bed, as one dreads a haunted spot. All at once, the shrill cry which he had heard the other night filled his ears. So piercing was the sound that Ulrich put his arms out to repulse the unseen form, and with such force that he fell over, chair and all. Sam, wakened by the unusual noise, began to whine, as frightened dogs whine, and turned and looked all about the inn to see where the danger came from—smelling under the door, snorting and breathing very loud, his hair bristling, and his tail between his legs; he kept on growling.

Kunsi meanwhile had risen, and, holding his chair in his hand, said, "Do not enter; if you do, I will kill you!"—and the dog, excited by this means, barked furiously at the invisible enemy who defied his master's voice.

Sam little by little grew calmer, and came and lay down by the fire; but he was nervous and restless still, and growled low between his teeth. Ulrich, in his turn, regained his senses, but, feeling weak, he looked for a bottle of brandy in the buffet, and rapidly drank several glasses. His thoughts became vague, his courage left him, and a burning fever filled his veins. The next day he ate nothing, living wholly on alcohol, and for several days he remained drunk as a beast. The moment he thought of Gaspard Hari he drank until he fell on the floor intoxicated.

When the effects of the alcohol wore off and he had digested the heating and feverish liquid, the same cry, "Ulrich!" would pierce his brain. He sat up, rose tottering, stretching out his hands for support, calling Sam to help him.

In three weeks he had consumed all the alcohol he possessed, and this continued drunkenness only increased his fear, which grew more and more intense. The fixed idea, exaggerated by a month of idleness, grew and penetrated his very being. He walked up and down the Inn like a wild animal in a cage—occasionally putting his ear to the door to listen if Gaspard was there, and defying him through the wall. No sooner would he fall asleep than the voice would rouse him, and he would jump with a bound to his feet. At last, one night he gained some courage, and with a slow, cowardly step, he stole to the door and opened it.

Shivering, he threw some wood on the fire, and sat down to warm himself. He started—someone had hit the door. He called out, "Go away!" and a long and plaintive cry answered him. Ulrich's few remaining senses deserted him, and he was paralysed with fear, turning round and round to find some corner in which to hide himself. The dog, wandering about outside the house, moaned constantly, and scratched with his paws the woodwork.

Ulrich lifted the heavy wooden buffet, which was filled with dishes, and with superhuman force put it against the door as a barricade, and piling up everything that was left, the mattress, the chairs, the bench, he blocked up the windows as if for a siege. The dog gave long, low groans, to which the young man replied with similar sounds. Days and nights passed in this way, the one outside pawing and biting the wall, and growling low; the one inside following all his movements, his ear against the wall, and replying to his moans by dreadful inhuman cries.

At last Ulrich heard no sound, and he lay down, so exhausted that he slept. When he awoke, he could remember nothing.

. . . . .

The long winter was over, and the Hauser family prepared to go up again to the little Inn.

As they approached the mountain-top, the two women on their mule talked of the two men whom they were to find there, and wondered that one of them had not come to meet them, as the pass had been open for several days. Soon they saw the house covered with snow. The doors and windows were closed. A little smoke came from the chimney, reassuring Father Hauser. But as they drew nearer, they saw on the door sill the skeleton of an animal, the flesh having been picked from the bones by some wild birds. All examined it. "It is Sam," said the mother, and she called, "Gaspard!" A cry answered from the house, a piercing, wild cry, which sounded like the call of some tortured animal. Father Hauser repeated "Gaspard!"

The three men tried to open the door. It would not move. They got from the stable a long beam, which they used for a ram. With all their might they forced open the door. The wood cracked, the panels broke in many pieces, then a loud noise filled the house, and they discovered, curled up behind the buffet, a man. He had long white hair, which fell on his shoulders, a shaggy white beard, and his clothes hung on his thin body in rags. No one recognised him until Louise Hauser said, her voice trembling, "Maman, it is Ulrich," and they all agreed that it was he, although his hair was white. They went in, touched him, asked him questions, but he answered not a word, and they carried him to Loëche, where the doctor pronounced him insane. No one ever knew what became of old Gaspard. The little Louise died that summer of a malady which the doctor attributed to the cold air of the mountain top.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY OF PROLOGUE AND CHAPTERS I. & II.

Max Renault, the leading spirit of the Anarchist "Autonomie Group No. 7," meets his colleagues in a club near the Caledonian Road on the eve of President Carnot's assassination. He shoots a traitor who has almost betrayed the Group and so saved Carnot's life. Then he tells them that he is about to emigrate with a society of Socialists, one of whom, Frederick Austen, a wealthy engineer who has been converted to Socialism, takes out with him a working model of an aerial vessel which is to enable the colonists to enforce a reign of peace on earth. This air-ship Renault determines to steal when complete, and use for the purpose of bringing about an Anarchist reign of terror instead. Meanwhile, Franz Hartog, another member of the Group, is to carry out a plot he has formed to steal a very fast torpedo boat destroyer, which is to be built at Elbing for the Russian Government, and, with her, to levy blackmail on the Atlantic, and so raise funds to build an Anarchist aerial fleet when the time comes.

On Christmas Day, 1898, the Calypso, a steam yacht belonging to Sir Harry Milton, a young and wealthy landowner, having been disabled in a gale and then becalmed, sights an island in the South Pacific, from which an electric launch, the Mermaid, puts off and tows the yacht in. Frank Markham, in command of the launch, tells Sir Harry, with whom are travelling his sister, Violet, and Herbert Wyndham, a lieutenant in the British Navy, on sick leave, that the island is Utopia, a Socialist colony, founded some three years before by emigrants from England.

CHAPTER III.

OLD FRIENDS AND NEW.

As the Mermaid came alongside in obedience to a hail from Markham the gangway steps were lowered, and Violet, Sir Harry, Lieutenant Wyndham and the young Utopian went on board the launch leaving the sailing master to see the Calypso into dock.

Under the forward awning the introductions were repeated in more formal fashion, and as Violet shook hands with the Utopian girls, which she did with mingled feelings of slightly strained propriety and irrepressible admiration, she said, with a laugh:

"I see that in Utopia, at any rate, the vexed question of rational dress has been satisfactorily settled."

She spoke almost in an undertone, but her brother caught her words, and exclaimed with more enthusiasm than discretion:

"Settled, I should think so! It's a perfect triumph of art and convenience over Mrs. Grundy and conventionalism. I hope you'll take some patterns home with you, Violet."

His sister stole a sidelong glance, not at him, it must be confessed, but at Lieutenant Wyndham, and said, with just the faintest possible flush on her pretty cheeks:

"Oh, of course, it would be delightful, but—I am afraid you are forgetting the difference in climate. Miss Dora, here, for instance, looks entirely irresistible in Utopia at Christmas, but for her own sake I should be very sorry to see her shivering in the Park in the severity of the British June."

"I should think so," said Dora also, with the faintest suspicion of a blush and a smile, that made Sir Harry wonder why he had never seen as pretty a girl as this in England. "Why, quite apart from the shivers, which would be uncomfortable enough, the people would think that I was one of the girls out of 'Utopia Limited,' trying a new sort of advertisement, and then, I suppose, some one would call a policeman and give me in charge for outraging public decency."

"Very probably," chimed in Wyndham drily, "and the first to do it would be one of the women who go to a dance or a theatre, well——"

"Thanks, Lieutenant Wyndham," almost snapped Violet, this time blushing in real earnest. "You seem to forget the last time that you and Harry took me to the theatre. Suppose we change the subject. I ought to have known better than raise such a purely feminine question in the presence of unregenerate males. No, don't apologise I deserve what I got. If you say another word I won't speak to you for the rest of the day."

Anywhere else a certain amount of awkwardness might have followed this little scene, but Dora promptly came to the rescue by saying very demurely:

"Well, it's only about three years since we left England, and I have not forgotten the weather yet. I don't think there can be any more comparison between your dress and ours than between the British climate and this one. At any rate I can promise that when you have succeeded in reforming your climate, we girls of Utopia will form a mission and go and try and reform your dress."

By the time the laugh that followed this sally had died away, the Mermaid had run alongside a jetty which ran out from a platform of rock at the head of the basin and was made fast.

"Why, bless my soul! surely that can't be Mr. Austen—and yet I'll be hanged if it isn't either him or his double. How do you do, sir? Who on earth would have dreamt of finding you in Utopia!"

By the time he had uttered the last words of his somewhat disjointed exclamation Sir Harry had cleared the gangway between the Mermaid and the jetty with a couple of strides and was shaking hands with a man of spare figure and medium height, with a keen, intellectual, clean-shaven face and close-cropped grey hair, who was standing on the jetty, forming a somewhat commonplace contrast in his easy-fitting brown holland Norfolk jacket and trousers and grey solar topee to the picturesquely-clad little group about him.

"How do you do, sir?"

Digitized by Google

"And equally who in Utopia would have dreamt of having the pleasure of wishing a merry Christmas in the Southern tropics to Sir Harry Milton and his charming sister?" said the old gentleman, returning the Baronet's grip with equal heartiness, and then letting go his hand to hold his own out to Violet, whom Lieutenant Wyndham had just handed ashore.

"For such pleasure as there is in that, Mr. Austen, you must thank a combination of good and bad fortune, which has brought us out of the matter-of-fact world that we sailed from into—well into some realm of romance which really doesn't seem as though it were on the surface of the same planet," said Violet, in response to his greeting.

"This has really been a morning of wonders for us, and, finding you here after your mysterious disappearance from London, is certainly the greatest wonder of all. I can tell you I feel even more than the usual feminine curiosity to know how it has all come about. For my own part I feel something like Alice in Wonderland, only the Wonderland is a very much nicer one"

"And all the wonders shall be explained in due course as far as I can explain them, I can assure you," said Mr. Austen; "but our first duty is to make you feel a little bit at home in Wonderland, so you must come and be introduced to some of its inhabitants. Me, you know already, and you seem to have made friends with the Mermaids too. This is Edward Adams, who would be first President of Utopia if we had any Government or politics, which I thank Heaven we have not. He is the man who conceived the ideal of which Utopia is the realisation."

As he said this he presented her with a gesture which included her brother in the introduction to a tall, well-built, grave-faced man of about thirty-five, with crisp curling brown hair and a blond close-clipped beard and drooping moustache which was not quite thick enough to conceal the gravely-pleasant smile with which he bade them welcome to Utopia.

"And this is Max Renault, our chief engineer and electrician, to whose genius the existence of the Mermaid is due," continued Mr. Austen presenting the man whose acquaintance the reader has already made under such different circumstances. Like Adams, he was dressed in the Utopian costume; but distinguished and even handsome as he looked in it, Violet somehow found herself unable to return his readily offered handclasp as heartily as she had returned those of Adams and Mr. Austen. The man seemed to her to have a reserved or rather a concealed power about him which to her woman's swift intuition seemed to strike her with a vague sense of deceit. When Lieutenant Wyndham was presented to him, after being introduced to Mr. Austen, he looked at him keenly for a moment and then said:

"I'm afraid I can't claim the pleasure of your previous acquaintance, Mr. Renault, but somehow your face seems familiar to me."

"It is quite possible that it is sufficiently commonplace for you to mistake me for someone else," replied Renault, with a smiling politeness that contrasted but ill with the vision of recollection that flitted before his mind's eye as he shook Wyndham's hand.

"And now," said Mr. Austen, when the introductions had been completed, "if you like we'll have a turn round the dockyard while they are getting your yacht on the slips, and then we can go on board the Mermaid again and run round to the settlement and get some lunch and find you quarters."

During the inspection of the dockyard, which occupied the next hour or two, both Sir Harry and Lieutenant Wyndham were amazed to see how much had been done in the three years that they were told the Utopians had spent upon the island.

There were three basins, partly natural and partly artificial, which had been fitted with sluice-gates moved by hydraulic power, the largest of which, the one the Calypso was being put into, would have taken a vessel twice her size, while the other two would amply have accommodated a craft of three-hundred tons.

On the opposite side of the main basin, on a rocky plateau about thirty feet above the water, there were two blast furnaces of the newest design in full operation, and water-power engines, actuated by penstocks and turbines under a five-hundred foot head of water, were running a plant of machinery capable of performing all the processes of steel ship-building, and were also operating a powerful installation for the extraction of aluminium from earths and clay by what seemed to be a highly improved and very economical process of electrolysis.

"This is Edward Adams."

From the interior of a large oblong wooden shed, that stood on a plain of rock sloping at an angle of about fifteen degrees down to the water's edge, came the sound of hammering, drilling, and rolling, which told the lieutenant's practiced ear that some vessel, probably the three thousand ton forty-knot cruiser of which Markham had spoken, was being constructed within it.

He would dearly have liked to have been admitted within the enclosure to see what manner of naval marvel it concealed, but good manners and his recollection of the pledge Sir Harry had given compelled him to possess his soul with patience and hope for a future invitation. None was given, however, for Mr. Austen, on passing the shed, merely nodded towards it, and said:

"We are trying an experiment in ship-building in there. Perhaps Markham may have told you of it, but as it isn't in a fit state for criticism yet, and as we're not quite sure about its ultimate success, I'm afraid I can't ask you to go and look at it."

After that, of course, nothing could be said on the subject by any of the visitors. By the time they had seen what they were shown at the dockyard the Calypso was safely shored up in the dry-dock, and the hydraulic pumps were throwing the water in tons into the outer basin, and then, after Sir Harry had told the sailing master not to allow any of the crew to leave her until he received word from him, the party went on board the Mermaid again and were soon speeding across the green waters of the lagoon to the settlement.

Then more introductions were gone through, everyone according a simply-worded and yet hearty welcome to the voyagers, and then Mr. Austen, insisting on the privilege on the ground of old acquaintance, carried off Violet, Sir Harry, and Lieutenant Wyndham to his house to lunch. Adams and Renault excused themselves from joining the party, saying that they would have plenty to talk about at first without them, but promised to come and smoke a pipe on the verandah after lunch and hear all the news from the outer world.

During the meal the host did nearly all the talking in satisfying the curiosity of his guests as to the origin of Utopia, and the reason for his own presence in the colony. He told them in a simple circumstantial narrative how the death of his son had led him to become a member of the "Brotherhood of the Better Life," and how the change in his social views together with his determination to retire from the business that had brought him into commercial relations which ended in friendship with Sir Harry's father, and devote the whole of his fortune, amounting to over half a million, to the practical development of the scheme which he had heard Edward Adams propound at one of the meetings; how they had bought a steamer, loaded her with everything that could be of use in the new colony, from a spade to the elaborate machinery they had seen working at the dockyard, and had brought out the first party of five hundred colonists to this island, which had been discovered twenty years before by one of the members of the Brotherhood, named Ambrose Miller, an old salt who had been captain of a South Sea whaler.

Digitized by Google

Then he went on to tell how the colonists prospered exceedingly during their first year in their island paradise, how they had escaped the fate of all similar ventures by rigorously excluding everything that savoured of politics and political economy from the primitive and purely domestic system which alone existed on the island, and how at the end of a year they had sent the steamer back to England with invitations to the best of their friends and kindred to come and join them at any rate for a year's visit on trial; and, lastly, how, at the end of that year every man, woman, and child of the six hundred souls who had accepted the invitation elected to renounce for ever the world that they had left, and become citizens of Utopia.

"So far," said Mr. Austen, bringing his story to an end, "the experiment has been a distinct and undeniable success, and that, I think, is chiefly due to the fact that we have only tried to make ourselves comfortable, and have not played the fool with constitutions or theories of government. We are simply a collection of about two hundred families, each perfectly independent of all the others, and only acting with them where common interest prompts them. As a matter of fact, we get on very well together, and the one law that we have all solemnly agreed to effectually prevents any unpleasantness arising from personal ill-nature."

"For pity's sake, tell us what it is—we want a law like that so badly in London!" broke in Violet, in a tone of eloquent mock entreaty.

"With pleasure," smiled Mr. Austen in reply, "though I'm afraid English society is too hopelessly complicated to allow of its application. It is simply this: If any Utopian of responsible years meddles with the personal or domestic concerns of any other in word or deed, he or she is to be at once turned out of the colony and banished for a year to a small islet about four miles off the eastern coast. A second offence would mean being set adrift in a boat with a month's provisions outside the reef and being forbidden to return on pain of death."

"Capital!" exclaimed Sir Harry. "What havoc a law like that would make with some of our most cherished institutions. Has it ever been put in force?"

"No," said Mr. Austen smiling and slowly shaking his head, "and I don't think it ever will be. We are too busy in Utopia to be busybodies. But here are Adams and Renault, and you must get your news ready."

"And especially the news of this mysterious nineteenth century pirate with no name and a red flag that Markham has been telling us about," said Renault, stepping in from the verandah as he spoke.

Settled themselves in their easy lean-back chairs.

CHAPTER IV.

THE STORY OF THE RED PIRATE.

"LIEUTENANT WYNDHAM is the freshest of the party as far as news is concerned," said Sir Harry, when they had settled themselves in their easy lean-back chairs on the verandah and had lighted their pipes charged with fragrant Utopian-grown tobacco, "and added to that, there's just a chance he may let some naval state secret out in the course of his yarn, and that will make it all the more interesting."

"I don't know any naval state secrets," laughed Wyndham, in reply, "and therefore I can't tell any. The British Admiralty doesn't communicate its official secrets to lieutenants of British gun-boats. Of course, if you happen to be an officer in the German Navy with a handle to your name, and the favour of the Kaiser behind you, it is a very different matter. However, that's not the story.

"The story itself," he continued, settling himself in his chair and blowing a long contemplative whiff of smoke up towards the verandah roof, with all the air of a man who knows how not to spoil an interesting story by an undue plunge in medias res, "is something so strange and unheard-of that when the news was first published from some unknown source of information in the Pall Mall Gazette, it was received with about as much incredulity as you'll remember the Pall Mall's story about the retirement of Mr. Gladstone was, but I'm sorry to say it proved every bit as true as the other.

"To begin at the beginning. You remember that about five years ago the British Admiralty, in some queer freak of common sense and patriotism, gave orders for the construction of a flotilla of forty-two torpedo boat destroyers, and bargained for a speed of twenty-seven knots.

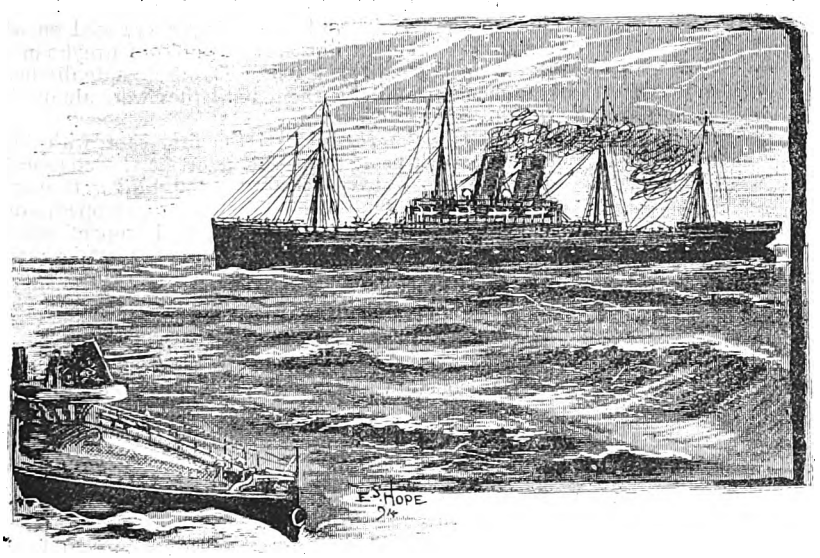
"The first of these boats was the Havock, and the second was the Hornet, both built by Yarrow. The Havock did a trifle over twenty-seven knots, and the Hornet a bit over twenty-eight. This put the Russian Government on their mettle, and, as it is considered good business, and correct commercial patriotism for loyal British firms to sell the deadliest possible weapons to our likeliest enemy, there was no objection to the builders of the Havock and the Hornet undertaking to build a twenty-nine knot boat for the Tsar.

"Then, no sooner had the order been given than Thornycroft, of Chiswick, who, by the way, has said that if the money was forthcoming he could build a boat that would do forty knots, went one better, and, in June '94, turned out the Daring, which astounded everybody by doing twenty-nine and a quarter knots over the measured mile at Maplin. This, of course, woke Yarrow's people up like a shot, and they turned out the Tsar's boat, and rushed her over the measured mile three times running in a shade under two minutes, and that of course meant a speed of nearly thirty-one knots an hour.

"We all thought the limit had been reached, at any rate, for some time, but six months later, that is to say towards the middle of '95, Thornycroft turned out the still celebrated Ariel, which knocked all the other records into a cocked hat by running the mile twice each way in less than a minute and fifty seconds. The average speed worked out at thirty-three knots an hour, and common consent seemed to take this as the maximum.

"The Ariel remained unbeaten until the Pall Mall Gazette startled the world in the beginning of April last by publishing the news that Schichau, the crack torpedo boat builder of the Continent, had built a destroyer for the Tsar with a guaranteed speed of thirty-six knots an hour, engined on quite

Digitized by Google



"The 'Alberta' had been stopped in mid-Atlantic."

a new principle by a German engineering genius called Franz Hartog, and that she had gone out for a trial run on the Baltic and had just vanished into space, taking Hartog among others with her.

"All sorts of speculations of course began to fly about as soon as it became impossible to keep the affair secret, and the Pall Mall's story was confirmed by the German press. Some people said that she must have run full tilt in to a rock or a sand bank and gone down with all hands; some said that they had tried to over-drive her and had blown her up, and this certainly seemed the most feasible explanation. Some again said that she must have been stolen by the Nihilists, but this was laughed at as impossible.

"For all that, however, it turned out to be very much nearer the truth than any of the other guesses. Four nights after she disappeared, the lieutenant in command of a Danish torpedo-boat coming through the Sound from Copenhagen to Kronborg went ashore as soon as he got into port, and stated that a grey painted boat about the size of the missing destroyer, that's to say, about two hundred feet long, had passed him during the night at a tremendous speed with no flame or sparks coming from her funnels.

"He said that his own boat was travelling over twenty knots at the time, and yet the unknown vessel ran away from it as though he had been standing still. This, combined with the fact that she showed no lights, certainly made it look as though she had really been the runaway. The lieutenant's story leaked out, and of course the papers jumped at it, and then they seemed to plunge into a contest of invention to see which could get the wildest and most ridiculous answer to the problem: What had become of the lost destroyer?

"I don't know whether any of you remember it, but there was a highly imaginative book published, I think, in the early part of '94, the author of which put a most curious combination of buccaneer and sentimentalist on board an equally curious cruiser worked by gas engines which stopped at the most critical moment for want of oil, and brought her piratical raidings on the Atlantic to a timely but ignominious end.

"Well, the general belief was that those who had stolen the lost destroyer had done so with the intention of emulating this gentleman's exploits in a really practical fashion, for I ought to have told you that the boat, with that excess of technical detail which the Germans sometimes indulge in, had been sent to sea for her trial fully equipped in fuel, stores, arms, and ammunition, just exactly as though she'd been going straight into a fight.

"Affairs were rather strained just then between Russia and England, in consequence of the old row about Korea, and there was a rumour that the Russian Government had requested this to be done in case of emergencies.

"A little over a month passed, and nothing more was heard of her. The rumours were beginning to die away and give place to fresh sensations when, like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky, came the news that the Alberta, one of the new fast Canadian line from Halifax to Liverpool had been stopped in mid-Atlantic by a long wicked-looking grey painted vessel, with a turtle-back deck for'ard, three funnels and one mast, and flying a plain blood red flag from a flagstaff astern, and plundered of every ounce of specie, and all the portable valuables that she carried. The Alberta brought the news herself, and so there was no doubt about its truth.

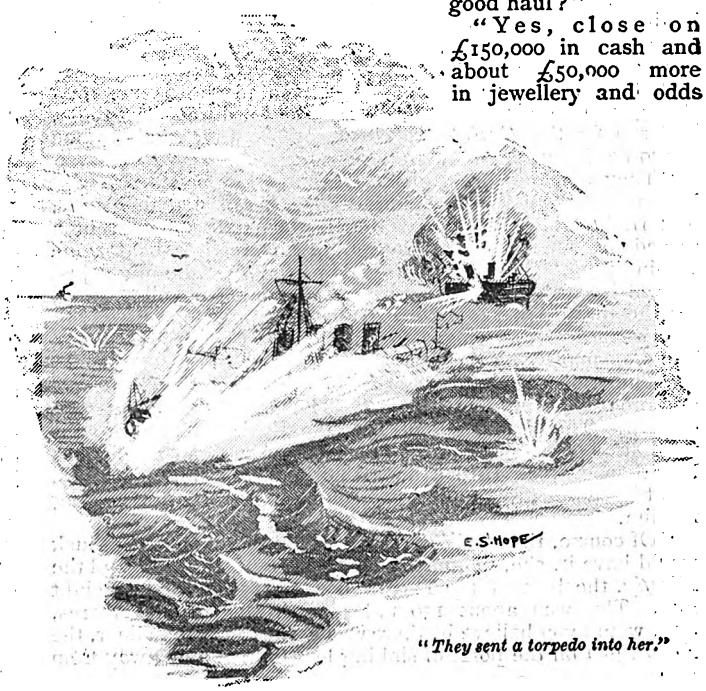
"The pirate, for he couldn't have been anything else, came up at day-break one morning at what the captain of the liner described as a perfectly incredible speed, fired a six-pound shot through her bows, and then ordered her to stop under pain of being torpedoed. Then a small launch put off, a dozen men, armed to the teeth, boarded the liner, while the Destroyer, as they called the stranger for want of a better name, lay to and covered her with her machine guns and a couple of torpedo tubes ready for action.

"Of course the skipper of the Alberta could do nothing but submit. He had nearly a thousand people on board, and there was no mistaking that the pirate meant business. Resistance would have meant being blown out of the water in five minutes, so there was nothing for it but to make the best of a bad job.

"No one was hurt except a Yankee, who got blustering with a revolver, and he was shot. When the looting was over, the pirates went off in high good humour, leaving a message that in future all mail-boats crossing the Atlantic would have to pay toll to the Red Flag."

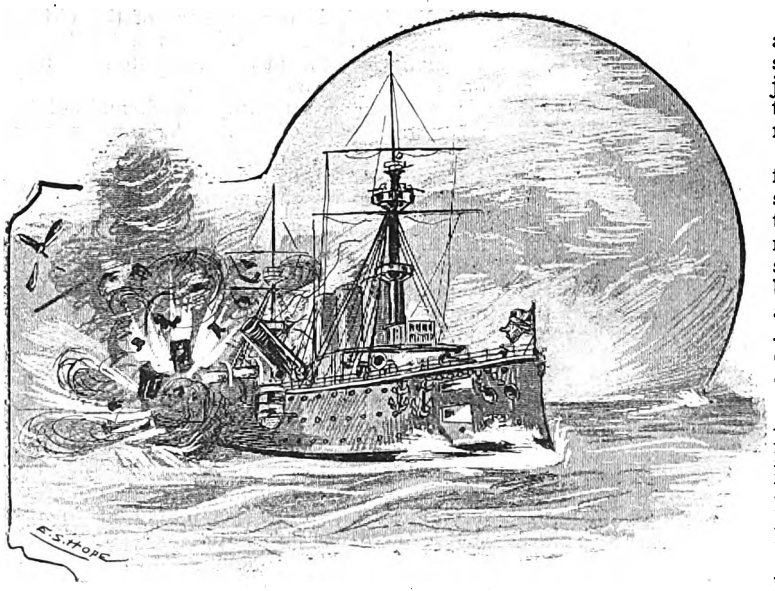
"Very neatly done, blackguardly and all as the robbery was of course!" said Renault, as the Lieutenant paused for a minute to relight his pipe, which had gone out for lack of attention during the narrative. "I suppose they got a pretty good haul?"

"Yes, close on £150,000 in cash and about £50,000 more in jewellery and odds



"They sent a torpedo into her."

Digitized by Google



"Literally blew her stern off."

and ends. Not a bad morning's work, I must confess, even for a quite up-to-date pirate," replied Wyndham, noticing with some curiosity a faint flush that deepened the bronze of Renault's cheek as he spoke.

"I suppose an outrage like that produced a tremendous excitement as soon as the news was known?" said Adams, who had been following the story with the most intense interest.

"Sensation! I should think it did," said Wyndham, with a short laugh. "The newspapers raised a howl that you might have heard almost here. Politics and divorce were discounted to nothing in the way of interest, while broadsides of questions were fired into the First Lord of the Admiralty. Standing Orders were suspended to discuss the pirate, and even the Admiralty itself began to wake up and rub its eyes, and wonder what the deuce it was all about when, five days later, a much more terrible story was brought to Plymouth.

"The American liner New York had been stopped in mid-Atlantic, just as the Alberta had been, and while the usual looting was going on, an American gun-boat, the Albany, appeared on the scene, and the New York signalled for assistance. The pirates that had boarded her opened fire with their magazine carbines, and cleared the decks, then they got into their launch as fast as the Lord would let them, and ran for the Destroyer, which, by the way, really turned out to be the proper name of the pirate.

"They were no sooner on board than they opened fire with half a dozen quick firing guns, and a lot of machine guns, and riddled the New York like a sieve; then they sent a torpedo into her, and blew her up just as the gun-boat came within range. She opened fire right away, but she might just as well have shot at an express train a couple of miles away, for the pirate spun round on his heel, clapped on full speed, and went away, as one of the officers of the Albany put it, like a locomotive on the loose.

"The gun-boat saved about half of the New York's people and brought them into Plymouth. Then the row began in good earnest. The pirate had outraged the British lion, and, as it were, fired point-blank in the face of the American Eagle. In less than a week British and American cruisers, gun-boats, and torpedo-destroyers were swarming on the Atlantic looking for him.

"Of course, the Ariel was foremost in the hunt, and as luck would have it, she, in company with the cruiser Medea and the Firefly, the best of the Yarrow boats, was the first to sight him. This was about 150 miles north-west of the Azores, and, would you believe it, there was a North German liner, the Lahn, just on the point of sinking less than a mile away from him

"He was only about five miles ahead of our boats, and so the Ariel and the Firefly cracked on all steam and went at him like a couple of greyhounds just slipped from the leash. The brute actually had the cheek to wait for them until they were almost in range.

"Just as the Ariel fired the first shot with her forward quick-firing twelve-pounder, he slewed round, slipped like a streak of greased lightning through the water for about five hundred yards, stopped, and returned the shot. The Ariel's shell dropped about six hundred yards astern of him, and his burst squarely between her and the Firefly. Then he rushed away again on a wide curve trending round to the old Medea, who might as well have been motionless as doing the sixteen knots that was all they could grind out of her.

"My cousin, Charlie Curzon, who was on board the Ariel, and who told me the story, said the excitement for the next half hour or so was something indescribable. The two boats dashed at him to head him off, the Ariel doing all her thirty-three knots and the Firefly a good thirty-two, but they were just too late.

"The fellow tore through the water—incredible as you may think it—at a speed that must have been very nearly forty knots an hour. In fact, Charlie told me they could see nothing but a cloud of spray with the boat's nose in front of it and her red flag showing through the after part of it. Do what they could they couldn't stop him getting the Medea between them and him.

"This forced them to separate. As they did so the Medea opened fire and blazed away like a floating volcano, but it wasn't a bit of good, they no sooner got the range than they lost it again, the brute was moving at such a frightful speed. He ran up to within a mile of her, stopped dead, spun round on his heel, fired his two stern torpedoes at her, and away he went again, sending the spray flying thirty feet into the air on each side of him.

"One torpedo missed, but I'm sorry to say the other took the old Medea under the quarter, and literally blew her stern off. The Firefly stood by to give what assistance she could, and the Ariel took up the chase again, with every ounce of steam her boilers would stand. From what Charlie said, she might just as well have tried to chase the Flying Dutchman.

"She stuck to it the whole afternoon, and in six hours travelled over two hundred miles to the north-west—but all that her crew ever saw was that cloud of foam away ahead of them, always getting smaller and smaller, and at last night and a fog came on together, and it faded away into the darkness and the mist and they lost sight of it.

"That," said the lieutenant, knocking the ashes out of his second pipe, "is the last that I heard at first hand of the pirate with the red flag, for the day after Charlie told me the story I was ordered out to the West Coast. That was nearly nine months ago, and, from the accounts we saw in the Australian papers, which you will be able to read at your leisure, he is still at large, looting a liner every now and then, as the fancy takes him, and laughing at every attempt to catch him."

"Then, if no one else can catch him, we will!" said Mr. Austen, almost passionately, rising from his chair with a flush of anger on his thin cheeks. "It is an outrage on humanity and civilisation that such things should be! I'm afraid we must give him three months' more license, but, after that, we'll hunt him down and sink him, if we have to chase him round the world to do it! Renault, we must have the Nautilus afloat in three weeks!"

(To be continued next week.)

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

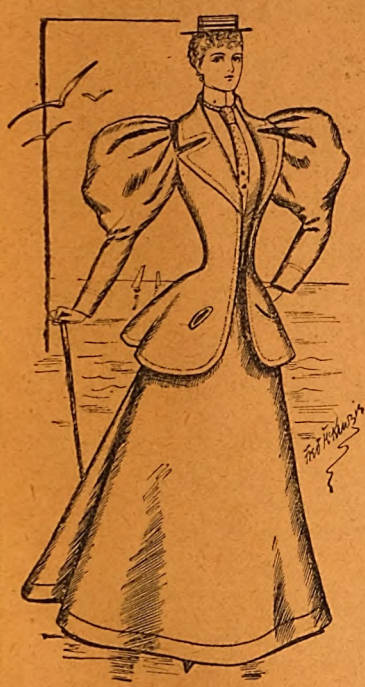
Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ANOTHER GREAT SUCCESS!

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the World, AT LESS THAN HALF ORDINARY PRICES.

OVER EIGHT HUNDRED WORKERS EMPLOYED.



The most remarkable of all the costumes that have ever been produced is the one here illustrated; it is undoubtedly the most popular style of the season, and has been generally adopted as

A LADY'S HOLIDAY SUIT.

15/-

These Suits are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge (Regd.) in Navy Blue or Black. Also in fashionable Grey or Drab Homespun mixtures, and Navy or Drab Twill Drill, each suit consisting of a smart shape open coat or jacket—stylishly cut, beautifully made with two pockets, and finished all round edge of coat with special quality silk cord—together with a wide bell-shape costume skirt trimmed to match jacket. The jacket fits closely to the back of the figure, and remains gracefully open in front. These two garments, viz.,

JACKET AND SKIRT COMPLETE

form at once a smart, stylish, and yet most useful outfit for wearing with a blouse or cambric shirt, and are offered for the amazingly low price of 15/-. Ladies are asked to consider what this means: A really well-made fashionable outfit that any lady might be pleased to wear, made without the slightest approach to sweating, and yet supplied complete

FOR FIFTEEN SHILLINGS.

Every garment is made in the firm's large, airy, and perfectly appointed workrooms, and is surely value that will please every lady in the land.

When ordering please state measurement across back from shoulder to shoulder, also length from neck to waist at back. The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 ins. round bust under arms. Larger or special sizes 1/6 extra. Each suit is packed in strong leather board box, and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

10/6

made from the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete for the ridiculously low price of 10/6 each. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Reseda, Tan, Ruby, Grey, or Drab. The Costume consists of extra wide Bell Skirt (40 ins. long) and improved Blouse Bodice, well made and finished, the Bodice pleated back and front, with full fashionable sleeves and belt. The lower part of skirt, and cuffs, and collar, and saddle of bodice are trimmed rows of narrow Russia Braid, the whole thus forming a Lady's Complete Costume for 10/6. The Half-Guinea Costumes are also supplied in Brown Linen Holland, and in Navy or Drab Twill Drill, at the same price. Sizes kept in stock fit any figure up to 38 ins. round bust under arms. Larger sizes 1/6 extra. Each Costume packed in box, and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES,

8/9

Made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, or Brown Linen Holland, and consisting of stylish Blouse Bodice and extra wide Skirt, trimmed Russia brade, are now offered at the low price of 8/9. Packed in box and sent carrage paid for 9d. extra. The skirt is made in two sizes—viz., 33 ins. or 36 ins. long. Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Ruby, Reseda, or Tan. When ordering please state whether skirt is required 33 ins. or 36 ins. long.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS

From 1/6 each.

FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, or Brown Linen Holland, with saddle top, long full sleeves, belt and pocket, at the following low prices:—

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45	ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6	each.

Postage 4½d. extra. The lengths stated are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

☞ PATTERNS, also Illustrated "Book of the Serge," and Fashion Sheet of other Costumes for Ladies' and Children's Wear sent POST FREE to any reader of Short Stories on application.

NOBLE'S NOVELTIES IN DRESS FABRICS For early Autumn wear. New and exclusive designs, fabrics, and colourings, specially produced for wear during the Autumn of 1894. Hundreds of novel and artistic effects, double widths at prices ranging from 7½d. to 4/6 the yard. Large Box, containing over 1,000 New Patterns sent post free on approval to any address. Every lady who would dress well at the smallest cost should certainly see these patterns, and when writing ask for a Large Box.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD
RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.
A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

Patronised by Royalty.

SILK UMBRELLAS

Direct from the Manufacturer, 2/6 each.

Ladies' or Gents' Plain or Twill Silk. Parker's Hollow-Ribbed Frames, Carved and Mounted Sticks.

"THE PARKER" UMBRELLA REGISTERED.

Sent Parcel Post Free, 2/9 Postal Order (or 36 Stamps).

Re-covering neatly done, Plain or Twill Silk, Ladies' or Gents', 2/6 each, returned next post. List and Testimonials Free.

J. B. PARKER, Umbrella Works, Broom Close, SHEFFIELD.

Adresse de M. SUEZ, 9, Rue de Prony PARIS

VINAIGRE LACTÉ de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE

EAU de SUEZ

VACCINE for the MOUTH
Strengthens the Gums
Perfumes the Breath
The only Dentifrice securing
BEAUTIFUL TEETH

POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICES DE SUEZ

London Agents: WILCOX & Co., 239, Oxford Street.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET,
LIVERPOOL.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS

FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

If you have ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND, 1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from
THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms.

Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

HAIR REMOVED

permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' CO.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myer. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

MELVILLE'S NEW UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, Charing Cross Road, London.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL—"THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR"
(By GEORGE GRIFFITH, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," and "The Syren of the Skies.")

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 300. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 29, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH AND LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH,

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BEETHAM'S
WORLD FAMED
CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,
M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists,
CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

THREE HALF CROWNS

IT IS A STARTLING FACT

that Three Half-Crowns (7/6) will purchase a beautiful SERGE DRESS LENGTH in any of the following colours:—Black, Blue, Brown, Green, Claret, Nut Brown, Chestnut, Mulberry, Ruby, Red, Moss, Olive, Myrtle, Bronze, &c., also several very pretty and effective mixtures.

Full Dress Length (Carriage Paid) FOR 7/6

Money returned if not approved.

20,000 Sets of Patterns now ready, write at once. Patterns are sent Post Free and need not be returned.

These beautiful Serges are specially manufactured for Autumn and Winter wear, elegant in appearance and are not heavy as most Serges are. They will not spot with rain or wear threadbare.

£5,000 to be Given Away in Presents to Purchasers.

Thousands of Testimonials from all parts of the World.

Cloth Table Covers, 2 yds square, 4s. 9d. each, in Crimson, Claret, Tan or Emerald. Remnant Bundles of Serge, 5s. and 10s. each, carriage paid. Write to-day for Patterns of Dress Materials, post free to any address.

LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 21, The Dress Warehouse, Armley Leeds.

PREVENTS COLDS AND CHILLS

BOVRIL

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST STOCK FOR SOUP.

Digitized by Google

A HAIR PIN

WITHOUT POINTS
HAS GOOD POINTS!!!
SEE THE POINT?

Hinde's
"Pyr Point"
Hair Pin.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

£10,000 IN PRESENTS.

ONE MILLION BEST SILK

HANDKERCHIEFS

1/- ONLY. ONLY 1/-

I must clear my overstock of about one million pure Silk Handkerchiefs, direct from the looms. To do this quickly I will give to each of the first 100,000 postal customers a valuable present; please mention if a lady's or gentleman's prize is required. The Handkerchiefs are of large sizes, and well worth 2s. 6d. each. Suitable for Ladies' or Gentleman's wear. LIGHT, SOFT, WARM, and DURABLE, as only a Silk Handkerchief can be. I have reduced the price for the Special Sale to 1s. each, or 13 stamps; 2 lots for 2s., 6 for 5s., 12 for 9s. 6d. Prize and a free insurance coupon for £100 with each handkerchief.

A Living Testimonial worth a Thousand Recommendations from me.

"105, Boundary Lane, Liverpool, "March 16, 1894.

"Dear Sir,—Sample Handkerchief and present to hand this morning, with which I am both exceedingly pleased and absolutely astounded at the price you are putting them in at. You are worthy of patronage. With all possible despatch please forward me to above address 14 more as follows: 10 Ladies', and 4 Gentlemen's. Enclosed you will find P.O.O.'s as per your quotation, 11s. 6d. Sincerely hoping you may have an extensive sale of the Handkerchiefs.—Yours faithfully, JOHN D. COSTA."

P.O.O.'s payable at Rugby. Letters addressed to

H. BUTCHER, Clifton Mill, Rugby.

PLEASE MENTION THIS MAGAZINE.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

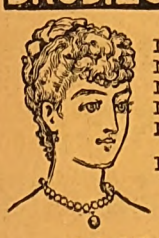
HAIR REMOVED permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

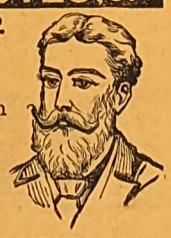
FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES & C°

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID



No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' CO.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

MELVILLE'S
New Upright
GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

THOUSANDS OF TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

PATCHWORK FOR THE MILLION.

Never was such a thing offered to the public before.

As we are now Clearing our Enormous Stock of SUMMER PRINTS, we will send Free, per Parcels Post, on receipt of 15 Stamps,

FIFTY Splendid Pieces of PRINT for PATCHWORK.

Now is the time to Make Cheap and Warm Quilts for the Winter. This is thoroughly Genuine.

SELLICK & COMPANY,
FREEMANTLE ROAD, COTHAM, BRISTOL.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and

OBSTINATE CASES,

NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,

GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

If you have
ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 300. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 29, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A LAST RESORT.

A DARK night in Tennessee, and the sky hidden by a mass of hurrying clouds. A raw, chilly wind, the ground all mud, the tall trees and grasses dripping from heavy rains. Just emerging from still darker woods, a young man, his clothing drenched and mud-stained, his face haggard and desperate, and his whole attitude, as he leaned heavily against the rail fence, telling of utter exhaustion. He was worn out. For more than two hours he had been flying for life over a country imperfectly known to him, though familiar to his pursuers.

More than once he had been compelled to retrace his steps, when every moment was precious, and every step through the yielding mud required an effort. Worse yet, there was no possibility of throwing the followers off the trail. Every step left its plain impression, to be followed as fast as horse could trot, and capture meant sure and swift death—no wonder he was desperate.

Turn which way he would, Gilbert Hazelton could see nothing before him but speedy and disgraceful death. Never to see the sun again, nay, not even a friendly face! Was this the end of the bright hopes with which he had kissed his mother good-bye only two short months before? It seemed like a far-away dream now. He had lived ages of fear and agony since then, gone through unspeakable humiliation and dread.

He had been accused of murder, tried for his life, found guilty, and sentenced to death. His letter to his friends must have miscarried, for they had not come to his relief. Poor, and alone among strangers, who persisted in believing him identical with the tramp who had murdered poor David Westford, Gilbert had yet fought bravely for his life. Some few had been convinced of his innocence, and his lawyer had succeeded in obtaining a new trial, in which new witnesses might at least prove an alibi.

But when this word went abroad, the townspeople were furious. They had seen more than one undoubted criminal escape through some technicality. Were they now to see the murderer of poor David Westford escape through the easily bought perjury of some worthless companions in crime? They vowed it would not be so. Last night at dusk groups of stern-looking men stood before the gaol talking grimly together, and a whisper in the air warned the Sheriff what was coming.

The gaol was old and rickety. He could not defend it, and his resolve was quickly taken. In the early dusk the prisoner was sent out by a side door, under charge of the Sheriff's son, while the Sheriff himself remained to make sure mob violence did not make a mistake and seize some other victim. But treachery carried the word to the mob, and they were soon in hot pursuit of the fugitives. In this emergency the boy, who was firmly convinced of the prisoner's innocence, released him, demanding only a promise to rejoin him at a place appointed, and himself turned back to throw the pursuers off the trail, if possible.

Gilbert fully intended to keep his promise, but in the darkness he missed his way, and the bloodhounds in the rear caught his trail.

Now, for two hours, which seemed two eternities, he had been running for life, and the unknown country and horrible mud had completely exhausted the little strength that two months of confinement and terrible anxiety had left him. Nothing but utter desperation could have driven him another yard. But when a shout came faintly from the rear he pushed forward with a great effort across the strip of corn-field, through the fence, and out on a well-travelled road.

To one less utterly exhausted this would have given a glimmer of hope, for here at least the mud had become liquid ooze, which retained no footprint. The pursuers would not know which way to turn, and must watch both roadsides to see that he did not turn aside. But he was too tired to use the advantage, and when, after running a few yards, he slipped and fell, he lay there a full minute, too utterly exhausted to rise. What was the use, when his utmost endeavours could only put off death for a few moments? Why not take one moment for rest and thought before the end came?

A farmhouse stood a quarter of a mile farther on, and as he lay there panting, exhausted, waiting only for death to overtake him, his hopeless glances fell upon its light. How placid and peaceful looked the lamp, shining serenely through the parted curtains! Doubtless a happy family were sitting round it, father and mother, sturdy sons and pretty daughters, laughing and talking, and never dreaming of the dark tragedy being enacted so near.

Would they care if they did know? Would they come to his aid if some instinct should tell them? And then he suddenly scrambled to his feet, resolving to make one last

Groups of stern-looking men stood before the gaol.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

effort for his life. He would struggle on to the farmhouse and appeal to the quiet family circle. They might give him concealment. It was but death if he failed, and it would be no less if he did not try.

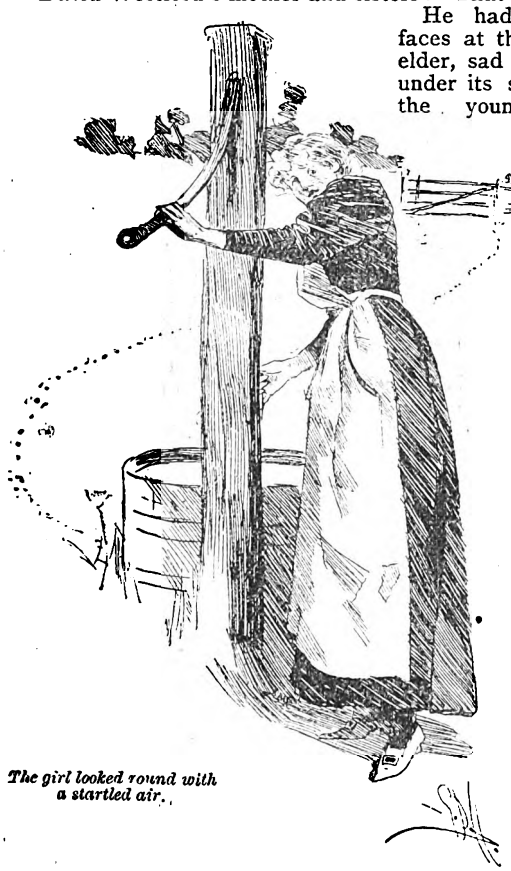
It took all the strength this last faint hope gave him to carry him to the gate and up the cinder walk, whose hard, dark surface would betray no footstep. Yet his heart failed as he reached the door, and leaned, utterly exhausted, against the doorpost.

"If I could know there were women inside! A woman would be merciful. But it may be some stern old farmer, who will only order me off and set the dogs on me."

The window was but a step away. He crept to it, and looked between the curtains. A plain, neat farmhouse kitchen, and two women, evidently mother and daughter, sitting by the table before the fire, the mother sewing, the daughter reading aloud. No one else in sight, yet Gilbert gave a smothered gasp and fell back in despair.

"David Westford's mother and sisters! That settles it!"

He had seen both faces at the trial—the elder, sad and patient, under its silvery hair; the younger, pure, pale, and clear-cut, thrown into strong relief by the dark eyes, long jet lashes and heavy black braids.



The girl looked round with a startled air.

He stood there still, hopeless and helpless, when there came a sudden break in the clear voice within. The girl had ceased reading. He looked in, and saw her pick up a pitcher and come toward the door. A moment more and she had come out, all unconscious of the man so near, gone straight to the pump, on which the lamplight shone, and was filling her pitcher. Nerved to desperation, Gilbert stepped toward her.

"I will appeal to her. Why shouldn't I? I did not kill her brother. She may pity me. She is a woman, and they are half Quakers I have heard," he muttered—and aloud, "Miss Westford, help me for pity's sake!"

The clanking of the pump ceased. The girl looked round with a startled air. "Who spoke?" she demanded.

"A fugitive, utterly exhausted with flight from a bloodthirsty mob. They are close at my heels. I can't go farther, and I am doomed unless you have pity and give me help or concealment!"

"Who are you?" she inquired; and with a dreadful sinking at his heart he gave his name, "Gilbert Hazelton."

She uttered a sharp cry and looked away towards the distant cornfields—the pursuers on his track.

"I must ask mother," she said, and snatching up her pitcher swept past him into the house.

He heard her quick voice, and Mrs. Westford's startled outcry, and in very desperation followed her in.

The old mother met him, white-haired and venerable. "So thee can seek shelter here, of David Westford's bereaved mother?" she said bitterly, wonderingly.

"Why not? I have never harmed you or him," he urged, desperately. "As true as there is a heaven above us, I am innocent of what is laid to my charge. It will be proved when my friends come. But that will be too late unless you help me."

"But I do not know it now," Mrs. Westford wavered. "Thee speaks fair, but do not all criminals the same? A trial was given thee, and thy innocence was not proved. Why should I save the murderer of my boy?"

Gilbert fell into a chair, too exhausted to stand. "You will know when it is too late if you refuse me aid. Madam, will you risk it?—risk feeling that you might have saved an innocent man, but instead let him go to his death?"

"Ernestine," cried the old mother piteously, "what ought we to do? How can we risk a life-long remorse, or how can we risk letting David's murderer go free to break other hearts as ours are broken? What does thee say?"

The girl stood in the open door, her glances alternating between the pleading face of the fugitive and the lanterns coming along the roadside.

"We must decide quickly, mother," and her clear voice quivered with feeling. "He may be innocent. It hardly seems as though a guilty man would come here—to David's home—for shelter. And if we are accessory to his death—mother, it is murder for them to take the law into their own unauthorised hands. Our choice lies between one man, who may or may not be a murderer, and a score who will surely be if we do not hinder.

"Then thee says save him!" Mrs. Westford asked doubtfully.

"I dare not refuse it, mother. Do you?"

The old lady hesitated, then, opening a corner cupboard, took a pair of handcuffs—relics of the days when David had been deputy-sheriff and earned the enmity of tramps and evil-doers—and held them toward Gilbert.

"If thee will put these on, that we may have no fear from thy violence when the mob are gone, we will conceal thee safely, and, when the search is over, send thee back to thy lawful guardian. That is all. I cannot place myself and my daughter at the mercy of one who may have none. Will thee consent?"

She was only prudent. Gilbert bowed silently and extended his hands. It was his only chance for life, and it would be the height of folly to object. Yet a faint colour came into his face as the cold steel snapped on his wrists, rendering him helpless—yet scarcely more so than fatigue had already made him.

The hesitation of both was over now. Ernestine bade him remove his muddy shoes, while she swiftly closed the door and drew down the blinds, and the mother hurried into another room. Thither Ernestine beckoned him to follow, pausing only to thrust the shoes out of sight.

At the door she turned. "It is David's room," looking keenly into his face. "Come in."

Did she think he would draw back? Guilt itself would hardly have done that now, with the pursuers so near.

"If David can see, I know he is willing," Gilbert answered quietly.

It was a small, plainly furnished room. Mrs. Westford had drawn the bed from the wall and thrown back the last breadth of carpet, revealing a tiny trap-door. At his entrance she opened it, and motioned him down.

"It is only four feet. You can drop that far," said Ernestine encouragingly. "There is no outer door. You will be quite safe."

Her mother smiled sadly: "How many frightened fugitives have slept there in safety! But that was years ago—before the war. Thee need not fear. Now—but stay, thee must be faint. I will bring thee food and drink."

Digitized by Google

She hurried away, and he swung himself down. It was not very easy with his manacled hands, and Ernestine helped him. His heart thrilled at the touch of her cold, trembling hands.

"She shrinks from my touch. She thinks my hand stained with her brother's blood," he thought bitterly.

But another glance at the pure, pale face relieved him. She was listening anxiously, and said with hurried kindness, "There is an old bed down there. Look, while I hold the light down. There! Even half-an-hour's rest will help you. But you must eat and rest in the dark, for this cellar extends under the kitchen, which is carpetless, and has cracks in the floor. Here comes mother."

Very hurriedly Mrs. Westford passed the well-filled dish and pitcher to him, reporting that the mob were almost up to the house.

"Cover up quickly, Ernestine. I am going to wake Harry."

That was her youngest son, still sleeping soundly upstairs.

She hurried away, and Ernestine quickly lowered the trap-door, and pushed back the bed.

Shut down in the darkness, Gilbert groped his way to the old bed, and sank down on it in utter exhaustion. He could do no more, be it life or death. He heard the girl's quick steps, the closing door, the louder steps directly overhead, and a slender spur of lamplight came down through a crack.

She was back in the kitchen—and there were stern voices indistinctly to be heard without. Ernestine heard them more plainly, and stood with clasped hands and pale face, praying silently, but oh, so earnestly, that the innocent, if he were innocent, might be saved, when her young brother came rushing downstairs, just as there came a thundering knock at the door.

Mrs. Westford had told him no more than that a crowd of men with lanterns were approaching, and it was in perfect good faith that he flung open the door and angrily demanded their business. They soon satisfied him.

"The tramp that murdered your brother is at large, and we are hunting for him. We have looked all up and down the road, for we know he came this way, and it looks mightily as if he had slipped into your premises and hidden somewhere. Your folks will have no objection to our searching, I reckon."

"Not a bit. I don't think he would stop here, but if he did I hope you will catch him and hang him to the nearest tree," the boy answered fiercely.

The fugitive, plainly hearing every word, shuddered, but he had no idea how many times that old house had been searched in vain for hunted souls, or he would not have feared. Harry knew the secret of the long unused cellar, but never dreamed that his mother and sister could know anything of the hunted tramp-murderer, and so had no idea that he could be in the house. So the outbuildings and premises were thoroughly searched, while Ernestine and her mother looked on with pale, quiet faces and wildly beating hearts, and the fugitive lay and listened in the darkness.

Then the men rode on, grumbling and cursing the Sheriff for letting the prisoner escape. Harry fretted a little, never guessing that his every word reached the ears of the man whom he would willingly have surrendered to his murderers, and then went back to bed.

Silence settled on the old farmhouse, and Gilbert actually fell into a light doze, from which Mrs. Westford's soft call roused him. Half asleep, he made his way to the trap door, and was helped up. Ernestine, in cloak and hat, stood waiting.

"Mother thinks it best that you should be back in safety before daybreak," she said simply. "I can drive you over very soon."

"I hate to let thee go, dear," her mother said anxiously.

"It is only for an hour, mother," reassured the girl; "and we can hardly trust Harry. He is only a boy, and so impetuous and bitter."

Mrs. Westford sighed. "It seems to be a duty, and surely our Father will not let thee suffer for doing thy duty. Well, go. My prayers shall go with thee. But be careful, child."

The light cart and bay pony stood at the door. The prisoner was helped into the back seat, and Ernestine sprang in before. The big watch-dog followed at her call and curled up under her seat, and Gilbert felt that however kindly these women might feel, they were not disposed to run any useless risks.

"Good-bye, mother; don't fret," was Ernestine's parting word, and Mrs. Westford's earnest "May God protect thee" showed her uneasiness. Yet she added a kindly word to the prisoner: "And may He bring out the truth. I hope we shall see thee free before all the world right speedily."

Then they drove away in the darkness. Ernestine spoke little; her heart beat too fast. She half apologised for taking the dog.

"The roads would be so lonely, coming back," an apology which he readily accepted. Could he resent her prudence when she had given him his life? But he could not help being intensely thankful that the dog had been asleep in the barn when he approached the house.

"You must come and see us."

Their trip was about half done when lanterns gleamed ahead, and wheels and voices were heard approaching. "The mob!" was his first thought, and Ernestine whispered hurriedly, "Down, under your seat, till they pass!" Then with a sudden joyful change in tone and manner, "Oh, it is the Sheriff! Thank heaven!"

The Sheriff it was, looking anxiously for his charge, but with little hope of ever seeing him again alive. Ernestine turned quickly.

"Your wrists, please," and the manacles fell off. "There! You need not tell that part unless you wish. It was only—but you understand. Mother had a right to be cautious, you know."

And then the Sheriff was hailing them, and as much surprised as delighted to find his prisoner in such hands. The transfer was soon made, and with a kindly word of farewell Ernestine hastened back to her anxious mother.

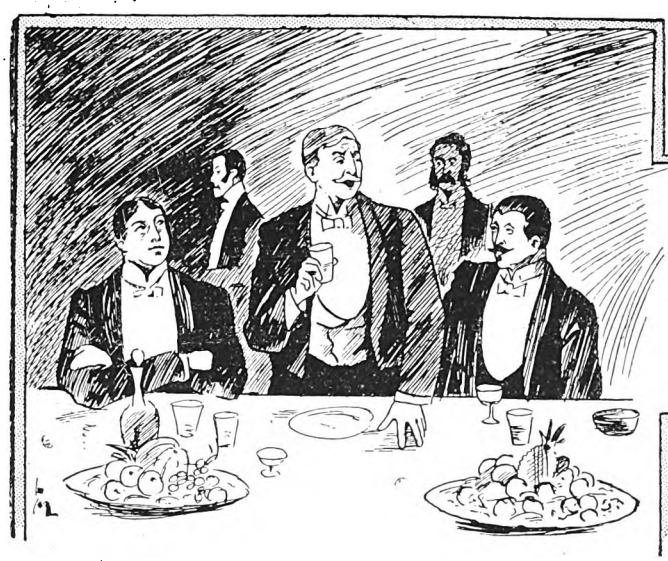
At the new trial, Gilbert Hazelton had no difficulty in proving his own identity, and after a short hearing, was triumphantly acquitted.

Of all the warm handclasps and congratulations he received, none gave him more pleasure than those of Mrs. Westford and her daughter.

"You must come and see us," Ernestine said blushing. "I know we were not over polite to you, mother and I; but come again, and you will find that we can be civil."

And he did come—not once, but many times—and at last carried sweet Ernestine away as his bride.

Digitized by Google



COINING HIS BRAINS

THE dinners of the Dolce Far Niente Club were as far above ordinary club dinners as the music-hall symphony concerts are above average theatrical overtures and interludes. The uneducated palate could no more appreciate their delicate savours than the uncultured ear can appreciate Listz's scores executed by Paderewski. The vulgar ideal of a club dinner is one which costs enough per plate to support a country clergyman's table for a week; one like those which aldermen and councilmen enjoy at the city's expense, and from which they rise with overloaded stomachs and apoplectic faces.

The president, Mason Macknight, had been chosen, not on account of any special executive ability, but simply because he was the most agreeable and popular fellow, and the best after-dinner speaker in the club—albeit he was so poor in worldly possessions that he could have ill afforded to retain his membership if the club had not frequently presented him with liberal testimonials of their gratitude for his inestimable services. He was bright looking and handsome, he sang a sentimental or a humorous song with effect, and he was not only an entertaining talker, but, what is even more essential to popularity, an appreciative listener.

At the closing dinner of the season, in his valedictory and introductory remarks, before presenting the speaker of the evening, he outdid himself, and so deepened the general admiration that he was unanimously re-elected, in spite of a prevailing sentiment in favour of rapid rotation in office.

I have a vivid recollection of that dinner, not only on account of the brilliant appearance which the president made, but because I was down for a speech, and more particularly because of the strange events which followed.

I am a little crotchety about always occupying the same seat at table. Even when I take only two successive meals at an hotel I feel imposed upon if the seat assigned me at first is changed at the second. This foible of mine was pretty well understood at the club, so, excepting for a little temporary joke, one particular chair was as sacredly reserved for me as the president's and distinguished guests' chairs were reserved for them. Upon entering the hall on this occasion, however, I found a stranger in my accustomed place. I glanced quickly round for the sly wink or the guilty look which should reveal the joker, but no one responded, and I took the next chair with as good a grace as possible. The stranger soon opened conversation with me and proved exceedingly affable, although no one in his vicinity seemed disposed to acknowledge acquaintance with him. His personal appearance was striking to a degree. He was pale even to ghastliness, the effect being greatly heightened by coal-black hair and moustache, and the most piercing black eyes I have ever seen.

In a little while a note was handed me from the president, requesting me to send him the name of my "friend." I replied that I did not know; that the gentleman was not present by my invitation.

While I was refolding the paper, the stranger handed the waiter a card, which, with my reply, was delivered to the president.

I saw a look of surprise and perplexity pass over Macknight's face, but he gave the stranger a most courteous bow, which fairly satisfied myself and apparently several others who had been casting inquiring glances in my direction. Still, I could not help wondering who and what my neighbour was, and why he should be present at a strictly private—I may say, exclusive—gathering, under such very singular circumstances.

As I have said, I was down for a speech. This fact prevented me from sustaining my share of the conversation with my neighbour in a manner satisfactory to myself, however it may have been to him. I had made two or three speeches on previous occasions. I had elaborated them with much trouble, committed them thoroughly to memory, word for word, and, much to my surprise and secret satisfaction, had won the reputation of being an easy, off-hand speaker. If my club-mates had only known what those "off-hand" remarks had cost me, their applause would surely have been changed to pity!

"And now, gentlemen," said President Macknight, rising with the genial smile with which he habitually haled his helpless victim to the rostrum, "I have the pleasure of presenting to you one who, etc., etc.—one, in fine, who loves to talk, but not so well as you love to listen. 'If you have tears, prepare to shed them now'; if you have laughs, prepare to laugh them now. Gentlemen, our esteemed secretary, Mr. Wilkins Dobson."

With expectations thus aroused, all turned their beaming faces towards me, prepared to laugh or weep at my first sally. From the beginning of the feast I had been so ill at ease at the certainty of what was in store for me, that I had now only made, I fear, but a poor impression upon my brilliant neighbour as a conversationalist; but I had really enjoyed none of the various dishes which had been set before me. So far as my consciousness was concerned they might have been the plainest of fare instead of the daintiest.

All through the president's introduction my heart had been thumping so obstreperously that I thought it must be heard above his resonant voice, and I felt sure that my face must betray my inward agitation. I had carefully committed my remarks, however, and I arose with what I felt was an air of entire self-possession. I was received with generous applause. Several witticisms which I had laboriously contrived, and which fortunately seemed inspired by what the president had just said, evoked satisfactory responses.

Once only did I hesitate. Oh, what a moment was that!

Digitized by Google

For the life of me I could not think what I had arranged to say next, and such was the paralysing effect of the lapse that I could no more substitute anything than I could fly.

The smoke-filled hall, the president, the long tables, and the smiling or coldly critical faces round them, began to spin before my eyes. My tongue cleaved to the roof of my mouth. I took my glass of water, and was in the act of putting it to my parched lips, when I heard a whisper from the stranger at my side. Though it was doubtless inaudible to others, it reached my ear clearly and distinctly, uttering the very words with which my forgotten sentence began! In the joy of my rescue I did not stop to think of the seeming miracle, but, satisfying myself by a swift glance round me that my dilemma had not been generally discovered, I forged ahead, and finally took my seat amid even louder applause than that which had greeted the beginning of my address.

"Dobson, my boy," said my friend Knowlton, who sat at my left, patting me facetiously on the back, "you spoke your little piece well. How many rehearsals did you have?"

"You give me credit for wonderful prophetic power," I retorted scornfully, "if you think I knew what the president was going to say in introducing me!"

And yet my conscience did not wince.

"You did turn it cleverly, old fellow," answered Knowlton, "and all on the spur of the moment, too. I would give a thousand pounds this moment if I had your gift of impromptu speech!"

"Bah! You would do nothing of the sort. It's easy enough, if one only thinks so. It's just like swimming—all you have to do is to strike out boldly, not caring whether you sink or swim."

"But suppose I should sink?"

"Oh," said I carelessly, "there's no danger, if you only keep on kicking."

Here, I confess, I began to feel some inward prickings, as well as some slight embarrassment, lest the stranger on my right might have overheard my complacent words. Suddenly the recollection of the assistance he had so mysteriously given me rushed into my mind. In my elation at my success I had entirely forgotten it. I felt my cheeks turn scarlet. Facing him shamefacedly, I said:

"I beg to thank you, sir, for the service, the—ah—a wonderful service, you rendered me in my extremity. I must confess that it entirely passes my comprehension. May I ask you how you knew so exactly what I wished to say?"

"You did not say all you had prepared, even with my help," he replied coolly, watching my face to note the effect of his words. "You omitted two whole pages of your manuscript—those in which you combat the popular notion that the dolce far niente tends to the atrophy of real strength and energy."

So I did! And yet I was absolutely sure that no eyes but my own had ever seen my manuscript. I had, of course, heard and read a good deal about what is called mind-reading, but I had always relegated the whole matter to the limbo of fortune-telling and all other superstitions or fraudulent nonsense. I stared at the stranger in helpless amazement.

"Sir," I said at length, "will you have the goodness to explain this most astonishing mystery?"

He smiled, displaying a row of narrow, glistening white teeth.

"This is hardly a favourable opportunity," he replied. "If you and your president will invite me to one of your little rooms after the banquet, I may be able to interest you."

. . . . . .

"Oh, ah, yes," said Macknight, taking the stranger's hand, "I remember you now, Mr. Pilgrim, and the standing invitation I gave you to the hospitalities of the Dolce Far Niente Club."

Mr. Pilgrim bowed and smiled. "And do you remember a certain bargain you said you would like to make?"

"No; I don't recall anything of that sort. What is it?"

"You made no definite proposition. You merely expressed a desire to exchange some things you possessed for others which you did not possess."

"Oh!" laughed Macknight, "there's nothing strange or unusual in that. I'm always expressing desires. I'm one of those uneasy mortals who never are, 'but always to be blest!'"

When we three were cosily ensconced in a little card-room in the third story of the club-house, and were discussing our champagne and cigars, we began to speak about various indifferent matters, although both Macknight and I were burning with impatience to hear our guest's explanation of his apparently miraculous power.

At length Macknight said to me, "So that brilliant effort of yours was not impromptu after all?"

The consciousness that any attempt at concealment would be futile before the piercing black eyes of our strange guest, caused me to throw all reserve to the winds. I made a clean breast of my vain pretensions to the easy self-possession of the born extemporaneous orator. I told how, on receiving my invitation to address the club a week before, I had lost no time in beginning the preparation of my "desultory remarks"; how I had studied my encyclopædia for the pat allusions which had won me so much applause, and a collection of modern Joe Millers for the best of the jokes which had evoked so much laughter.

"But those admirable turns you made to my best points in introducing you," urged Macknight—"those were impromptu, at least?"

"Not at all. I weighed very carefully the probabilities. I knew that you would allude to every one of those little incidents connected with my secretaryship, and I thought it more than likely that you would indulge in just the flattery you did indulge in. If you did not happen to do so, I had so worded my speech that I could omit those special replies without in the least interfering with the connection of thought."

"Well, you did take pains!" exclaimed Macknight, setting his glass down on the table with dangerous force. "I shouldn't suppose you would attach importance enough to a mere after-dinner speech to put so much work into it. After all, what is there depending on it?"

"Heaven only knows! I only know, as Mr. Pilgrim doubtless does also, that the very prospect of speaking in public sets me into a shiver of dread. At the same time I feel an irresistible impulse to respond to every call, and to shine among the best of them. I have often wondered whether others who succeed as I sometimes do, are affected as I am. How is it with you, Macknight, who always succeed so immeasurably better than I, or, for that matter, than any other man in the club?

"Don't you ever feel any trepidation when you are about to face hundreds of critical auditors, who will note every little lapse of logic or wit, and every little faltering of speech?"

Macknight reflected. "Well, no, Dobson, to be perfectly candid, I can't say that I do."

I glanced involuntarily at Mr. Pilgrim. As if in reply to my unspoken question, he said instantly:

"Your president is right. Not that his words need confirmation, of course, but, as he seemed a little in doubt himself, I will say in his behalf that he is as perfectly at his ease before any audience, however large or critical, as he is at this moment before us two."

Macknight looked at him as if uncertain whether to be surprised or only complimented. At length he said:

"Thank you. Mr. Dobson has told me of the mysterious and very opportune assistance you gave him. We are both waiting with the utmost impatience to hear your explanation of your marvellous power."

Again Mr. Pilgrim displayed his glittering teeth, scarcely more white than his face. "You do not believe in the power of mind-reading, which many quite respectable persons of to-day claim to possess?"

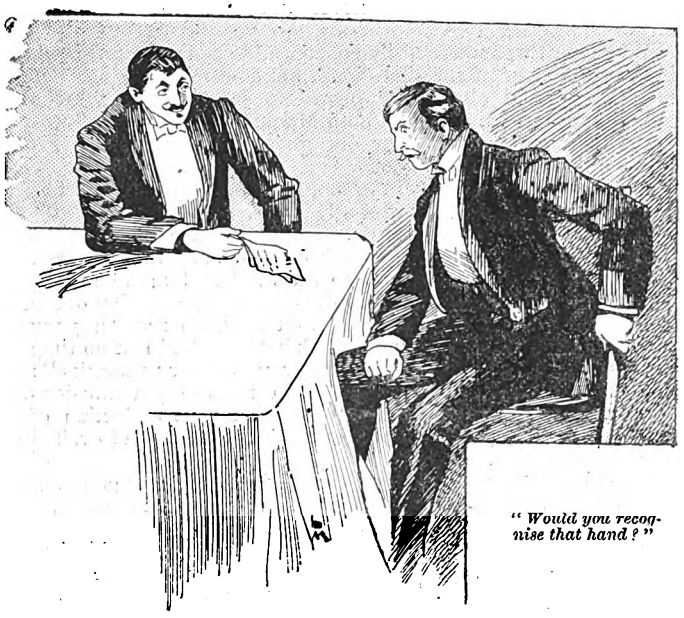
"I had not believed in it—until to-night, at all events," I answered.

"No," added Macknight, "I never could believe in it more than in any other supernatual power claimed by mere mortals."

"But who has the right to say that there is anything supernatural in it?" retorted Mr. Pilgrim.

He then proceeded gravely to expound the general theory and practice of hypnotism as taught by its professors;

Digitized by Google



"Would you recognise that hand?"

arguing that the art of mind-reading was closely allied, and finishing with the emphatic declaration that both were accomplished facts, and that he was simply one of their exponents.

"But," I objected, "what you did in my own case was not mind-reading. That which you read was not in my mind at all. I would have given a hundred pounds, at that fearful moment, if it had been there!"

"Shall I consider you in my debt to that amount?" asked Mr. Pilgrim, with his sinister smile. "You mistake, however, in saying that it was not in your mind," he went on, gravely. "It was there. The only trouble was that the electric current, so to speak, of association was for the instant broken. All I did was to close the connection."

"A new explanation of memory-lapses," observed Macknight, "and a very good one."

"No," replied Mr. Pilgrim, "not new. It is as old as the science of psychology."

"Well, a new illustration, then."

"No, not even that."

Notwithstanding Mr. Pilgrim's apparent earnestness and sincerity, neither Macknight nor I was convinced, either of the soundness of his conclusions or of his own actual belief in them. His appearance and manner were so uncanny, especially his smile, that, in spite of our reason and common sense, we could not avoid an uneasy feeling that there was something in our guest either above or below Nature.

"If Knowlton had possessed this wonderful power," I remarked to Macknight, "he would scarcely have told me that he would give a thousand pounds for my gift of impromptu speech. I can truly say, however, that I would give more than that if I really had what he thinks I have."

"And what would you give," asked Mr. Pilgrim quickly, "for the oratorical talents of your president?"

"Five thousand," replied I, bringing my fist down on the table, "this instant!"

"You would be a fool!" exclaimed Macknight. "I would sell what little knack I possess at spouting for a quarter of that sum!"

"I only wish I could take you!"

"I only wish you could!"

"You place rather a low value upon your intellectual gifts," said I.

"On the contrary, I think I have set the price exorbitantly high. Twelve hundred and fifty pounds may mean very little to you, but think what it means to me! Comfort, independence, perfect serenity of mind, for a whole year! How often I have wished that I had been allowed some choice in the gifts which Nature and Fortune bestowed upon me! There would have been a different assortment, I can tell you!"

Mr. Pilgrim bent forward eagerly. "Suppose Nature and Fortune should grant you your choice now. What would you choose?"

"Ah! 'Goods exchanged on application at the office,'" laughed Macknight. "Very good. Well, the very first thing I should ask for would be money—and plenty of it."

"And what would you be willing to exchange for money?"

"Let me see. Well, there's the knack of impromptu speaking which you have credited me with. I would give up that without the least hesitation."

"Yes, and what else?"

"H'm! Well, to tell the truth, I don't know of much else that would be worth offering."

"Phew!" exclaimed I, seizing the opportunity to praise my friend's versatility, "what of your conversational and epistolary powers, your genius for music and painting, your knack at verse-making, your natural skill at billiards, whist, and chess, your—your elegant penmanship?"

At this feeble anti-climax both my auditors burst into a laugh.

"I would be willing to throw in that last article gratis," said Macknight.

"A man who appreciates his gifts so little as you do doesn't deserve to have them!" I retorted indignantly.

"Pshaw! Even granting that I possess all the elegant accomplishments you have just inventoried, what are they worth to a poverty-stricken wretch like me? Will they pay my landlord, my tailor? Doesn't every successful man—successful, I mean, in the financial sense, the only sense recognised—look down on me with indulgent pity so long as I don't owe him a shilling, and with dislike and contempt when I do? There's that last precious accomplishment you mentioned, for instance—my 'elegant penmanship.' Of what earthly value is that to a man who can't draw his cheque for a hundred pounds. The chicken-track style, which usually ornaments your ten thousand pound drafts, is far more to my taste."

"What would you sell your elegant hand for, in cash?" asked Mr. Pilgrim, in a business-like manner.

"For anything I could get."

"Would you take two hundred?"

"Would I? Give me the chance and see!"

Mr. Pilgrim produced a note-book and a fountain pen, wrote rapidly on a leaf, tore it out, and handed it to Macknight.

"Will you sign that?"

Macknight read:

"London, June 6th, 1890.

"In consideration of the sum of two hundred pounds, received from Peter Pilgrim, I hereby consent to give up all grace and beauty in my style of penmanship—retaining only its present legibility."

"I'd sign it in an instant if it would do any good," he sighed. Mr. Pilgrim laid a couple of bank notes on the table. "There's your money."

We both stared. My flesh began to creep.

"Look here," blurted Macknight, "I don't know how Dobson feels. He stood the mind-reading test with a good deal more equanimity than I could, but this is——. Who are you, sir, anyway?"

"It doesn't matter who I am. You have made an agreement. Are you going to stand by it?"

Macknight swallowed another glass of wine. "Hang it, here goes! Macbeth boasted that he dared what man dared. Macknight will beat Macbeth!"

He took the pen and wrote. As he did so, his face, which had been flushed, turned deathly pale, and his eyes seemed starting from their sockets.

Mr. Pilgrim took the paper. His teeth gleamed in a satisfied smile. "Would you recognise that hand?" he asked handing it to me.

I could have sworn to it at a court of justice. And yet it was the most awkward scrawl I ever saw outside of a schoolboy's copybook.

Digitized by Google

"Would you mind signing your name as witness?" pursued Mr. Pilgrim, addressing me.

My power of resistance seemed paralysed. Mechanically I signed my name, half expecting to see the miracle repeated; but, barring a little tremulousness due to my agitation of mind, my chirography was no poorer than usual.

"Thank you," said Mr. Pilgrim, carefully replacing the paper in his note-book. "Should Mr. Macknight wish any further business transactions with me, all he has to do is to write to the address on the card I sent to him."

When I awoke the next morning the whole affair seemed so unreal—so absolutely impossible, in fact—that I made up my mind it was either a hallucination attributable to too liberal an indulgence in champagne, or a cleverly-arranged hoax played upon me by Macknight and his friend. The more I thought of it the more I felt inclined to the latter view of the case; although, of course, I was still mystified by the remarkable feat of mind-reading which had been performed in my behalf.

A note received from Macknight by the morning's post in the same horrible hand I had seen last would not have shaken my conviction in the least, if it had not been for one thing—it contained his cheque for £20, a sum he had been owing me for more than a year. I confess I was considerably staggered by this circumstance, but vastly more so, a few days later, by the news that he had bought, for cash, a handsome cottage in the suburbs. After some further perplexity my mind settled down upon the only reasonable conclusion possible. He had received a legacy and was continuing his hoax upon me.

The summer vacation passed, and the evening came for the first club-dinner of the next season. Macknight, in a new evening suit, was in his place at the head of the table, but it required only a few moments for those in his immediate vicinity to discover that something unusual was the matter with him. Instead of keeping everybody in a tingle of exhilaration at his sallies, as usual, he was taciturn and sombre.

"Come, Macknight," said the vice-president at last, "what ails you? You haven't said ten words since you came."

The reply was so clumsy, so utterly stupid, that his neighbours all looked at him and then at one another in astonishment. I left my seat, went to him, and said in a low tone:

"Don't, for heaven's sake, keep up this thing any longer!"

I confess I was considerably staggered.

"Keep up what thing?"

"Acting like an idiot!"

"Don't insult me, Dobson!" he returned, with a blank stare. "I can buy you out, and a dozen more like you!"

I returned to my seat in disgust.

The cigars were lighted, the secretary's and treasurer's reports were read and approved, and the president arose to make his opening address.

"Gentlemen," he began, "I thank you for re-electing me as the president of the Dolce Far Niente Club. I will try to discharge the duties of the position as well as I can. As an example of what I intend to do for you, I will ask the treasurer to read this."

Here he actually broke down.

The treasurer took the slip which the president handed to him, glanced at it, raised his eyebrows with an expression of great surprise and pleasure, and read:

"London, September 28th, 1890.

"National Bank. Pay to the treasurer of the Dolce Far Niente Club five hundred pounds.

"MASON MACKNIGHT."

Amid the hand-clapping that followed, the president sat down with a smile of imbecile complacency. When quiet had been restored, Knowlton moved that "The honoured president's extremely liberal gift be accepted with the most cordial thanks of the club."

A dozen voices seconded the motion.

"And now," said a member at the foot of the table, "we are eagerly waiting for the rest of the president's speech."

"I have made my speech," replied Macknight. "I should suppose that five hundred pounds would—would——"

Here he actually broke down, unable even to finish his sentence coherently. Quivering with shame for him, I rose in my place and said:

"The president would imply that 'figures talk.' I think we will all agree that they have spoken eloquently to-night. Your secretary will record the inaugural of this season as the most acceptable and weighty in the archives of the Dolce Far Niente Club."

. . . . . .

"Have you heard the latest about poor Macknight?" Knowlton asked me the other day.

"No. But I can imagine. Has he gone crazy altogether?"

"Worse than that. He is in the W—— Lunatic Asylum."

Ah, well, if the rest of us had the opportunity to transmute ourselves into gold, where should we stop? Many a man coins body, heart, and brain without the help of Peter Pilgrim.

Digitized by Google

MME. JAMBE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

PERHAPS you are going to find that this name is somewhat ridiculous. Do not hurry yourself to smile at it, however, for not only was she who bore it a brave woman worthy of all respect, but she was besides, on a memorable and tragic day, a true heroine.

You must first know that Mme. Jambe, or Mother Jambe, as she was called, had for a long time been canteen woman in a regiment of the line. Officers and soldiers alike venerated her, and during the quarter of a century she passed in the army there was never a day when she could have complained of having been the victim of an impertinence or a brutality.

When thirty she married a quartermaster, who was getting ready to leave the service, and who remained in the army to help his wife keep the canteen. The couple prospered.

Mother Jambe had more than one string to her bow, and knew how to employ her leisure hours profitably. She was a very clever pedicure. She had also learned to dress hair, and was able to do a service to the ladies of the officers.

After a year of marriage Mme. Jambe had a son. Agreeing with her husband, she decided that he, too, should be a soldier. At sixteen he enlisted. Already trained in the habits of military life, he had besides intelligence, judgment, a heart full of uprightness. Everybody was convinced that he would have a brilliant career.

Then her husband died and the war broke out.

During this terrible time of 1870-71 she did not succeed in sleeping more than three hours out of twenty-four. She passed weeks without knowing hardly anything, either of the progress of the war or her son.

Then, blow by blow, she knew of the defeats the French had met with, and at last she learned that the child—become a sergeant, although he was not yet eighteen—was assigned to make part of the Army of the East which was being formed under the command of General Bourbaki.

From that time, and in all kinds of weather, they saw her every day cross the few kilometres which separated Pontarlier from the village of La Cluse, or go up to the fort of Joux, which dominates the Swiss frontier. She was going for news. Unfortunately news was scarce or contradictory. The hope of a victory or deliverance was little by little extinguished.

But about the last of January suddenly the report spread abroad that the Army of the East was coming near, after having lost a battle and vainly attempted to relieve Belfort.

Here I ought, and wish, to let Mme. Jambe speak, for what follows was received from her. She related it to me some months after the event.

. . . . . .

One morning at daybreak, being still in bed, I heard some noise at the door, and then a fall of window-panes which were broken. I jumped out of bed, putting on my dress, and hurried to the door. I gave a cry, my boy was before me and behind him three of his comrades; but in what a condition! Emaciated, their cheeks hollow, their skin chapped with cold, their clothes in rags, their boots without soles.

"Ah, my poor child," said I, opening my arms.

"Mother, we must hide," he replied. "My general has charged me with carrying an order to the commander of the fort of Joux. But the Prussians bar the road; they have seen us; they are pursuing us. They must not find me."

"Eh, parbleu; give me your order: I will carry it myself, while you will stay here. An old woman, she can go anywhere."

I had no time to finish. A fusillade was heard and a man entered, crying:

"There are the Prussians!"

I pushed my boy and his friends into a carriage house, at the end of which, under the hay, opened the little cellar where I kept my wine. The Prussians entered. Through the open door I saw others on the road. There were more than a hundred. A young officer commanded them.

He came to me, arrogant and brutal.

"You are Mme. Jambe?"

"I am."

"Your son has just gone into this house."

"My son! He is far from here, bandits, if, however, you have left him alive for me."

"He is here. I am sure of it. Come, where is he?"

"Look for him."

He motioned, I was surrounded, unable to budge, and the soldiers began searching the house, while I was asking myself who was the miserable coward who had informed against my boy.

At last the brigands found him—him and his friends. I saw the poor children come back, pale but resolute, all covered with hay in which they had been hidden. And my son, so handsome, such flames in his eyes. Ah, he was really of my blood, that one. They searched their clothes to find the order which the general had charged them with. But the order was verbal. They could not find anything.

The officer threw himself about, fretted, mad with rage. Suddenly he said to me, covering the prisoners with a gesture of fury:

"Is your son among them?"

"He is not there. And if he were there I would not acknowledge it."

He raised his sword to me. Then they pushed us pell-mell into the road. Then he asked:

"Where is the man who informed us?"

"One of his companions has just killed him, captain," said a sergeant, pointing to a corpse I had not seen, hidden as it was by a bush.

It was the traitor, a freeshooter, who, to save his own life, had not feared to give my child's secret to the enemy. Besides, he had not waited a long time for his punishment.

"The assassin shall be shot," said the officer.

Then looking in a terrible way at some inhabitants of our village, who were trembling under the lowered bayonets, he went on:

"Does anybody know the boy Jambe? Come, answer, or I set fire to your houses."

Of all the brave people nobody answered.

"Then we are going to see," said the officer.

He gave an order in a low voice.

They bound me against the wall, while they were putting arms into the hands of my son and of his comrades.

And the officer said to them:

"You are going to obey my order and shoot that woman for me, and if you do not obey it is you who will die."

A cry of horror was raised, to which a great silence succeeded. I committed my soul to God, saying to myself that I would show these people how the French die, and I looked at my son. But he did not see me. His eyes were turned towards his comrades as if to exchange a sign.

"Lower your arms!" ordered the officer.

They obeyed.

"Aim."

They took aim at me.

"Fire!"

They faced about. A report sounded which shot five Prussians down, and among them their officer. And this report was dominated by the voice of my boy, who sprung up:

"Yes, fire, brigand, but on you and yours."

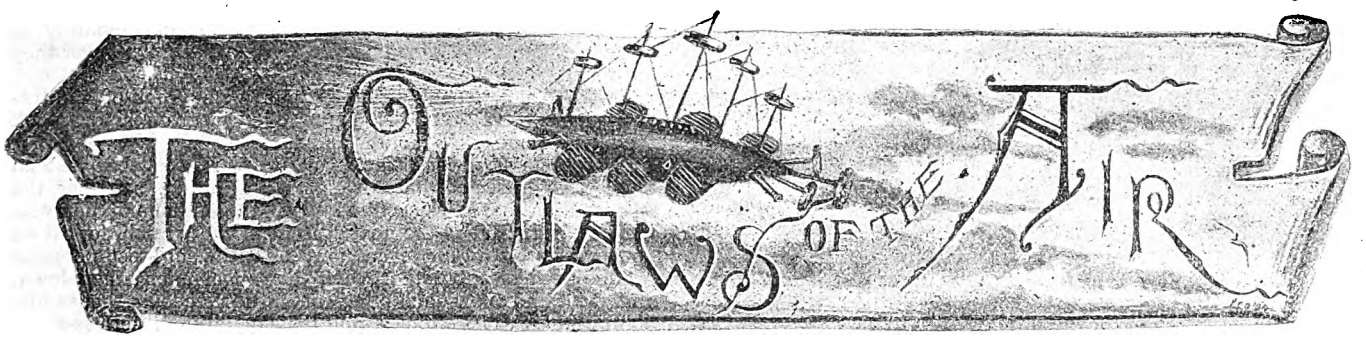
A general discharge from the exasperated Prussians replied to this stroke of audacity, and it was then that I fell struck by a bullet in my shoulder. But before fainting I had time to see that my boy was still standing.

I learned later that at the moment the guns of the fort responded. The sun, in rising, had all at once illuminated the helmet points, and the commander of the fort, judging by this mass of men seen in the distance that something was happening, had sent some balls into the crowd and dispersed the enemy. It was, besides, the guns of the fort which, some hours later, covered the retreat of the Army of the East when it passed into Switzerland.

. . . . . .

Mme. Jambe died some years after these tragic events. I recalled them the other day on learning that the son of this heroic woman, prosperously pursuing a career begun with so much brilliancy, has just been appointed commandant.

Digitized by Google



By GEORGE GRIFFITH,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies, &c."

SUMMARY.

MAX RENAULT, the leading spirit of the Anarchist "Autonomie Group No. 7," meets his colleagues in a club near the Caledonian Road on the eve of President Carnot's assassination. He shoots a traitor who has almost betrayed the Group and so saved Carnot's life. Then he tells them that he is about to emigrate with a society of Socialists, one of whom, Frederick Austen, a wealthy engineer who has been converted to Socialism, takes out with him a working model of an aerial vessel which is to enable the colonists to enforce a reign of peace on earth. This air-ship Renault determines to steal when complete, and use for the purpose of bringing about an Anarchist reign of terror instead. Meanwhile, Franz Hartog, another member of the Group, is to carry out a plot he has formed to steal a very fast torpedo boat destroyer, which is to be built at Elbing for the Russian Government, and, with her, to levy blackmail on the Atlantic, and so raise funds to build an Anarchist aerial fleet when the time comes.

On Christmas Day, 1898, the Calypso, a steam yacht belonging to Sir Harry Milton, a young and wealthy landowner, having been disabled in a gale and then becalmed, sights an island in the South Pacific, from which an electric launch, the Mermaid, puts off and tows the yacht in. Frank Markham, in command of the launch, tells Sir Harry, with whom are travelling his sister, Violet, and Herbert Wyndham, a lieutenant in the British Navy, on sick leave, that the island is Utopia, a Socialist colony, founded some three years before by emigrants from England. On the island Sir Harry finds Frederick Austen, an old friend of his father's, who introduces the visitors to Edward Adams and Max Renault and the rest of the Utopians, and after lunch tells them the story of Utopia. Later on, Lieutenant Wyndham describes the outrages committed by the pirate Destroyer—the vessel Hartog has stolen from Elbing—on the Atlantic, and Mr. Austen vows that if no one else can sink the Destroyer the Utopians will.

CHAPTER V.

ANARCHY AFTER DINNER.

A BRIEF and somewhat uncomfortable silence followed Mr. Austen's outburst of righteous indignation. Adams looked at him with an expression of surprise not unmingled with regret, and a dark flush and a most unmistakable scowl passed over Renault's swarthy features. Only for an instant, however, did he suffer his feelings to betray themselves. Even before Mr. Austen had time to notice it, the scowl had passed, and he turned to him and said in a tone that seemed intended to convey more meaning than the words he used:

"Three weeks! I'm afraid it will hardly be possible to have the Nautilus ready for sea by that time, and, of course, you can't refer to anything but her."

"Oh, no, of course not," replied Mr. Austen hastily, and, as Wyndham thought, rather confusedly, "Of course I referred to her, and," he continued, turning to Adams, as if for corroboration of what he said, "I certainly should have thought that she was sufficiently far advanced for us to have had her ready for sea within a month from now, and then, allowing two months for the voyage and the search for this miscreant, we surely ought to be able to run him down within three months."

"I really don't see why we shouldn't, Renault," said Adams in reply to this. "And I don't see why I shouldn't tell you, gentlemen," he went on, turning to Sir Harry and Wyndham, "now that Mr. Austen has partly let the cat out of the bag, that the naval experiment which was mentioned down at the dockyard is a new type of sea-going warship which we are constructing, not, I can assure you, for offensive purposes, but purely for defence should it ever be necessary, and for swift transit in the meantime.

"She is a sort of combined submarine ram and torpedo boat, designed and engined on a new principle by our friend Max here. She is not submarine in the sense that she will be able to plunge entirely under the water, but if she turns out a success and ever goes into action there will be nothing of her to be seen but a small oval platform carrying her machine guns and the conning tower.

"Everything else will be from ten to twenty feet under water, and therefore beyond the reach of shot, and even if the platform got knocked to pieces she could still get away, for the engineers and crew will not be dependent on ventilation for fresh air, and she can be steered by compass, though of course not by sight, from the interior of the hull ten feet below the surface of the water. But when I say that we expect her speed to be quite forty knots an hour, you will see that there will not be very much chance of her getting knocked about."

"Forty knots an hour!" exclaimed Wyndham, sitting bolt upright in his chair and bringing his hand down on his knee with a sounding slap, "why, if I only had command of any boat that really would do forty knots an hour I'd stake my life on running the Destroyer and her red flag off the sea within ten days of the time I got fairly on to the Atlantic; and with a cruiser such as you have just described, I'd fight the fleets of the world and sink them ship by ship, if there was any necessity for me to do so. Thank heaven, she doesn't belong to any of the possible enemies of England."

"There's no telling," said Max, laughing, but not, it struck Wyndham, in a very pleasant fashion. "You know, although we have not published any declaration of independence or any theatricals of that sort, we Utopians owe no

"Forty knots an hour!" exclaimed Wyndham.

Digitized by Google

"But surely, Mr. Adams, you are not going to defend those dreadful wretches."

allegiance to any of the Governments of the world, and I suppose we should resent interference from the British Foreign Office just as readily and as forcibly as if it came from any other quarter."

"Very possible," retorted Wyndham, a trifle nettled, more at the tone than the words; "but that, if you will pardon my saying so, is hardly the question at present. Of course, I have not the slightest right even to suggest, much less to dictate in any way, to you gentlemen who have given us hospitality and are helping us out of a very considerable hole. But if you will allow me to express my candid opinion, as a man whose business it is to know something about such things as these, I should like to say that, granted that this wonderful cruiser of yours does what you expect her to do, you alone of all the people of the earth will have in your hands the means of tackling this enemy of Society—part of whose story I have been able to tell you—on equal terms, or even at some advantage, and if that is so, surely it will be your duty to Society——"

"Stop there for a moment, please," interrupted Adams a trifle warmly. "To Humanity perhaps, to Society, as you call it, no. We owe no duty to Society, and we will pay none. Society made use of us and our labour as it suited its convenience, caring less for us personally than it did for its horses, and when it had no further use for us, would have left us to starve in the gutter or the garret as the Fates might have willed it.

"That is why we are here; that is why Utopia exists. If the Brotherhood of Man which is preached about in your churches and prattled about in your parliaments were a fact instead of the mockery that it is, we should never have come out here to the ends of the world to seek the possibility of living a healthy human life without the necessity of being somebody's slave or somebody's tyrant.

"The enemies of Society are those of its own household, bred up in its own midst. Take the Anarchists for instance, those much-abused Ishmaels——"

Here Adams in his turn was interrupted, and Violet broke in:

"But surely, Mr. Adams, you are not going to defend those dreadful wretches. They are murderers of the basest sort, for they kill the innocent, who have never harmed them, for the sake of frightening those they hate. Surely people who do that are enemies, not only of Society, but of humanity at large, and ought to be stamped out like vermin wherever they are found."

Before Adams could reply, Renault, with a look of admiration in his eyes, and a just perceptible sneer on his lip, took the parable out of his mouth, and said:

"And has it never struck you, Miss Milton, that just on those very grounds there is something to be said for the despised and hated Anarchist? Will the millions of men who will be confronted in the next European war, which, for all we know, may be raging even now, have the slightest personal grudge against each other when they shoot each other down, and slash and blow each other into little pieces by thousands, making their wives widows, and their children fatherless?

"Not a bit of it! That is Anarchy by wholesale, and is called honourable warfare, waged at the call of patriotism. The work of men like Ravachol, Vaillant, and Santo, is only Anarchy by retail, a handful of men at war with the whole world, and therefore it is called outrage and murder. I can assure you, my dear young lady, that it is a difference only of name, and the proportionate strength of the two sides."

"Just so," said Violet in a tone of chilly disdain that took Renault almost as much by surprise as her words did, "I am not sufficiently sentimental to wish to deny that what we call life is a game—and a brutally played game sometimes, if you like, for the prizes which we call the good things of this life. But Society, even in warfare, plays the game according to the rules and the Anarchists do not. I can understand Mr. Adams's position; those who do not like the game can get out of it—if they can—and play what they think a fairer game among themselves; but there is neither excuse nor forgiveness for criminals like the Anarchists, who remain in Society and play the game with marked cards and loaded dice."

"I am not defending the tactics of the Anarchists," said Max in an apologetic tone, somewhat disconcerted by this unexpected facer; "I was only suggesting that there is some excuse in the very constitution of Society to be found for desperate and despairing men and women who see no hope of getting fair play——"

"And so use foul play," interrupted Sir Harry bluntly. "No, it won't do, Mr. Renault. Your case is hopeless. I hate argument and discussion, because one never gets anywhere with them, but it doesn't want any arguing to show that Society is in the right in crushing the Anarchists at any price. They are vermin, and we must kill them before they kill us. That's the first law of nature, and we must obey it.

"It is simply a matter of self-preservation, and there is no right or wrong about it. If you have a house, and another man wants to blow you and it sky-high because he hasn't one, you have to kill that man or lock him up to save yourself, and there's an end of it—at least, that's what I should do if I could."

"And then again," said Wyndham, returning to the charge, "you are hopelessly out in your analogy between warfare and Anarchy. Your Anarchist murders without mercy and strikes without warning. What do you suppose would happen to, say, France if, in a time of profound peace, a French fleet turned up off Brighton or Eastbourne, and proceeded to bombard it without any declaration of war?

"Why, even in time of war, an act like that would put the nation that was guilty of it outside the pale of civilisation; but to do it in time of peace would be a crime against international law that every other nation in Europe would combine to punish, just as we punish piracy or slave-trading.

"Let us suppose that this Destroyer has been stolen and is manned by Anarchists, as I daresay she is after all——"

"Very likely," said Renault quietly. "I always wondered why they didn't do something like that; it would all be in the game, as Miss Milton calls it."

"Certainly," retorted Wyndham, who was just on the point of losing his temper, "from the sharper's point of view——"

"Look here, Wyndham," said Sir Harry, getting up and indulging in a modified stretch, "don't you think we've had about enough of this academics and Anarchy? We've something a lot better to do than fire syllogisms at each other while we've got Utopia to explore and the Calypso to look after. Hang pirates and Anarchists, metaphorically as well as literally. Wouldn't it be more to the purpose if, instead of jawing here, you were to place your professional skill and experience at the service of these gentlemen in getting the Nautilus ready for sea?"

Digitized by Google

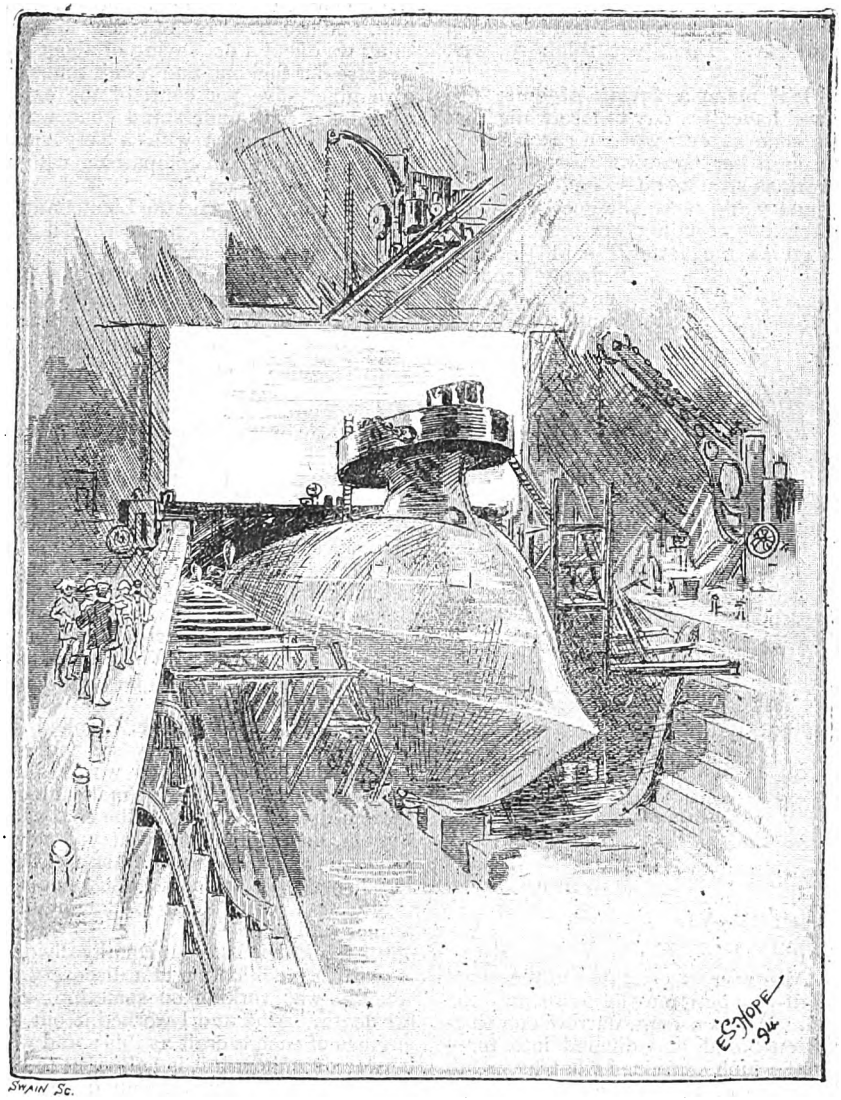
"Of course it would, if they'll only accept them," replied the Lieutenant getting up with an air of relief as though he had had quite enough of polemics, "I'm theirs to command if they think I can be of any use."

"Of course you will," said Adams, rising with the rest of the party. "Frankly, we didn't intend to tell you anything about the existence of the Nautilus, for fear our intentions might have been misunderstood; but what you have told us about this pirate and his doings makes it quite a different matter. We shall be glad of all the help we can get. Will you come down to the dockyard now and have a look at the Nautilus?"

Both the Lieutenant and Sir Harry jumped at the invitation to see the mysterious craft from which such great things were hoped, but on the way down to the jetty, where the launch was waiting for them, Violet was captured by Dora Merton, and another Mermaid, and carried off, by no means unwillingly, to afternoon tea and to chat on more congenial subjects than ship-building and machinery.

Renault had apparently quite recovered his equanimity, and chatted in the most friendly and open fashion with both Sir Harry and Wyndham on the subject of the Nautilus, and with apparent frankness expressed himself as glad to have the benefit of the naval officer's practical experience in putting the last touches to the craft, and equipping her for the campaign.



"The Nautilus."

When they once more landed at the dockyard and had gained admission to the shed, which before had been closed to them, they found themselves alongside the hull of a vessel which Wyndham's practised eye saw at a glance formed a very considerable advance on the ideas in vogue in the naval arsenals of Europe and America. A long, narrow hull, shaped as nearly as possible on the model of a mackerel's body, carried, supported by a sharply oval structure on the back, a larger and still more elongated oval platform, with a low, heavily armoured conning tower situated at the forward end

Three four-bladed propellors projected from the stern and quarters, one in the line of the keel, and the others from the quarters, diverging slightly outwards from the middle line.

"Now," said Renault, after the two visitors had taken a bird's eye view of the whole exterior, "if you'll allow me, I'll act as showman and explain her points to you. This hull is 250 feet long, 30 feet deep, and 25 feet wide in its largest dimensions, which you see are not amidships but rather towards the head.

"It is made of mild steel throughout, with the exception of the ram, which is faced with Harveyised nickel steel hard enough to pierce or tear ordinary iron or steel plates as if they were no tougher than brown paper. When you get inside, you'll see that, in addition to her twenty-four water-tight compartments, she's very much strengthened towards the bow, so as to give her the greatest possible resisting power when she is striking her blow.

"These slides that you see cover the apertures for the underwater torpedo tubes. There are eight of them, two forward, two aft, and two in each broadside. The gun deck there is the only part of her that will be visible when she's in deep water fighting trim. It stands ten feet above the hull, so that when the hull is entirely submerged—as it will be—there will only be a freeboard of about seven feet; and as the deck itself is only forty feet long by fifteen in its greatest breadth, there won't be much to shoot at."

"No," said Wyndham, "she'll be a very ugly customer in anything like smooth water; but I don't see how you are going to fight your guns in anything like a sea, for the deck would be swept fore and aft by almost every wave."

"So it would," said Renault, "and we should let it be. The guns will all be mounted on disappearing carriages, and, as you will see when you get on deck—where we may as well go right away now—can be brought completely under cover, so that in heavy weather the craft would simply be a torpedo ram with nothing to shoot at but the bare platform and the conning tower."

So saying, he led the way up a ladder on to the deck, which Wyndham found already fitted ready for the reception of what when mounted would be a formidable armament of quick-firing cannon and machine guns, all of which, when in position, would, as Renault explained, be capable of being lowered out of sight and under shelter by means of the disappearing carriages working through sections of the deck, covered with steel slides.

Digitized by Google

"We haven't got our guns yet," said Adams, in reply to a query from Sir Harry. "They, and the torpedo armament, are being made at Elswick, but we expect them to be ready by the time we get the Nautilus home to receive them."

"Oh, then you are going to take her home?" said Wyndham.

"Yes," replied Adams, "I think so. We were intending to have them brought out in the steamer that you see lying on the opposite side of the basin," he continued, pointing to a trim-looking craft of about 2,000 tons, "but, in view of the urgency of this business, and the high speed that we hope the Nautilus will show, I think there will be a great saving, especially in time, if we take the ship to her guns, instead of bringing them out here to her. Don't you think so, Mr. Austen?"

"Oh, by all means! It'll mean a saving of quite two months, if not more, and we haven't a day to lose while that scoundrel is at large. As soon as ever we can get her into the water and put her through her paces we must start for England, and get her to work as soon as possible."

"Bravo!" said Wyndham, "and when she goes may I go with her, if I only go as cabin boy or stoker's mate."

"You certainly won't go as the latter," said Renault, "simply because our engines don't want stoking."

"The day of steam is already past."

"What!" exclaimed the Lieutenant. "Then they are not steam engines. No, of course. What a fool I am! I ought to have seen that you have no funnels. What are they—gas, electric, or what?"

"Neither," said Renault, moving towards an open slide from which a companion-way led down into the interior of the vessel. "But come along, you shall see them for yourself."

CHAPTER VI.

A VISION IN THE SKY.

THE engine-room of the Nautilus was situated in the after-section of the hull, about half-way between the stern and the midships line of the vessel. It was a long, narrow compartment, forty feet long by fifteen broad, and divided into three longitudinal sections, each of which contained what looked to Wyndham like a vertical engine of the quadruple-expansion type. A second glance, however, convinced him that they must be something essentially different, for there were no steampipes and no indications of the presence of either boilers or furnaces. As far as could be seen, steam was not the motive power at all. To set this question at rest the Lieutenant turned to Max and said:

"This is certainly no steam-engine. But where do you generate your motive power?"

"The day of steam is already past for the engineer who stands at the high-water mark of his craft," replied Max with just a suspicion of superiority in his tone. "This is a gas-motor, not worked by ignition of inflammable gas as in the old-fashioned engines, but by the deflagration of a solid salt by means of the electric spark.

"You see this steel box at the side of the high-pressure cylinder. That is the explosion chamber. From there the products of the explosion pass through the cylinders in turn, doing their maximum of work in each, and in that chamber at the end they are collected and condensed, and then, with the addition of other chemicals, they can be used to manufacture new supplies of what I may call our motor-fuel."

"Why that's precious like the old idea of perpetual motion!" exclaimed Wyndham, looking almost incredulously at the engineer, "You get your energy from your chemical at one end of the engine, and at the other you collect it again and use it over and over almost indefinitely, I suppose."

"Not quite indefinitely," chimed in Mr. Austen. "You see we can't use all the products of combustion for recombination, and we have to add new materials each time. Still, I think we effect a net saving of about fifty per cent., that is, we can use our fuel one and a half times over, and as our engines give ninety-five per cent. of the explosive energy in actual work, you will understand that we shall be able to travel enormous distances with a very small expenditure of fuel, that is, of course, in comparison with a steamer's expenditure of coal or petroleum."

"Oh, quite so," said the Lieutenant; "it will make a perfect revolution in marine engineering if it ever gets known, as I suppose it must do some day——"

"Unless Max and I die with the secret of the explosive in our possession," replied Mr. Austen with a meaning smile, which warned Wyndham not to ask the question that was on his lips. So, instead of doing that, he said:

"Of course, I have neither the right nor the desire to pry into secrets that don't concern me, and so I will just say that this motor-fuel of yours would be worth a good many pounds a ton for driving torpedo boats and high-speed cruisers; but I suppose there is no harm in my asking the amount of horse-power you expect to get out of these three engines?"

"None at all," said Renault. "You see they are of rather peculiar construction, and the cylinders are a good deal stronger than the ordinary steam-cylinder. That is because they have to bear a very much greater pressure. Each of the engines is calculated to work up to a maximum efficiency of fifteen-thousand horse-power."

"Fifteen thousand each!" exclaimed Wyndham. "Forty-five thousand gross! Why, it seems incredible that such a tremendous power should be locked up in such a small space as this."

"Nevertheless, it is true," replied Renault. "You see that is the difference between waste and economy. I needn't tell you how much power you would get of the modern steam-engine if you could only make ninety-five per cent. of the thermo-dynamic energy of the coal effective."

"Oh, no; I quite see what you mean. It is all a matter of economy. And now may I ask to whom is due the honour of the discovery of this marvellous motor fuel?"

Mr. Austen and Renault exchanged a glance, and then the former said:

"I think that is about equally divided between us. The fuel is really a modification of a discovery that my poor Fred made when he was working on something else not very long before his death. Max and I worked it out as an adaptation to the engines of such a craft as this; and we designed the engines between us, though it is only right to confess that the credit of their high efficiency is mainly due to friend Max."

After examining somewhat more closely the details of the strangely simple machinery that was to drive the Nautilus at such an astonishing speed through the water, Sir Harry and the Lieutenant left the engine-room and were taken over the other parts of the ship. They were shown living rooms for a crew of sixty men and officers, comfortably furnished saloons, smoking-rooms, magazines, torpedo-rooms, gas and water chambers for raising and lowering the hull, refrigerators for food, apparatus for oxygenating the respired air, a laboratory for the preparation of fresh supplies of motor-fuel, electric light installations, and, in short, everything that skill and ingenuity could provide for the efficiency of the wonderful cruiser, and the comfort of those whose lot it would be to navigate her.

The hull and engines had been made in England and sent out

Digitized by Google

o Utopia—the former, of course, in sections—in the steamer that had brought out the second party of colonists. Different parts had been made by different firms, and all due precautions had been taken to conceal their real destination. All the work of actual building had been done upon the island by the most skilful mechanics in the colony, under the constant supervision of Mr. Austen and Max Renault—to the latter of whom, and not entirely in the interests of the colony of Utopia, it was due that the Nautilus had been built at all.

He had furnished most of the plans for the hull and armament, as well as the skilfully specious arguments which had persuaded Mr. Austen and Adams that such a cruiser, in addition to being of immense use to the colony for pacific purposes, would be of still greater value in the time of war. How completely he had succeeded in this respect was proved by a conversation which took place on the deck of the Mermaid, which had come round to bring the party back from the dockyards to the settlement when the inspection of the Nautilus was over.

"This is a very marvellous craft of yours," said Sir Harry to the three Utopians generally; "but what I find more marvellous even than the vessel itself is the fact of finding her here in Utopia, where one would naturally expect to find nothing but the arts of peace in vogue."

He spoke in a half joking tone, but Adams, who answered him, did so much more seriously.

"Yes," he said, "that is so; but it is just because we believe in the arts of peace and mean them to flourish here that we are creating the means of protecting ourselves."

"But, my dear sir," exclaimed Wyndham, looking at him with an incredulous smile, "what on earth have you got to protect yourselves against? Really, I can't see that you stand in much danger of being attacked by any one in an out-of-the-way part of the world like this."

"In the first place," replied Adams, "our Utopia is beautiful, and will some day be very rich. You know, as well as I do, the fatal attraction that beauty and wealth have for those Powers which indulge in a mission for 'protecting' just such out-of-the-way parts of the world as this. Then again, now that the Panama Canal is at last completed, a few months will see the establishment of the Southampton and Panama route from England to New Zealand and Australia.

"Utopia is not known now, except to us and you, but then it will be almost in the track of the Panama and Auckland steamers, and will practically command the route. Now, when you have seen a little more of this island, you will agree with me that, with a very little trouble and expense, it could be converted into a perfect ocean fortress, absolutely impregnable to any assault from the sea, and, at the same time, containing accommodation enough to shelter and even to refit a very considerable fleet. In short, it might easily be made the Malta of the South Seas."

"So it might, of course, and a magnificent position it would be, too!" exclaimed Wyndham. "Why, it would command all the East to West routes to Australasia, and a strong squadron stationed here in time of war would practically command the South Pacific."

"Just so," replied Adams, "and that is just what we don't want. We were here first, and we propose to stop here. We have no more desire to be protected than we have to be annexed. As Mr. Austen has told you this afternoon, we have no politics at home and no policy abroad, and we don't want any.

"Hence, if a French or German, yes, or even a British warship were to turn up here some fine morning, and send a boat ashore to discover the island and hoist the Tricolour, the Red, White, and Black, or the Union Jack on the bluffs yonder, we should say 'no,' and we want to have the power of saying 'no' in such a way as would overcome any objections that might be raised to the refusal."

"But you are Englishmen yourselves," said Wyndham, his patriotism a trifle nettled by the dry uncompromising tone in which the last few sentences were spoken, "surely you don't mean to say that if a British cruiser on the Pacific station were to put in here, and the captain came ashore to hoist the Union Jack in the name of the Queen, that you would offer forcible resistance?"

"Most decidedly we should," replied Adams, almost sternly, "we should entertain him hospitably, supply him with anything that he wanted, and we could give him, and then we should politely ask him to go about his business and leave us to ours. This is no part of the British or any other Empire, and it isn't going to be, if we can help it."

A little group of picturesquely clad Utopian damsels.

"But suppose," objected Sir Harry, "that he did what would be his plain duty to do, under the circumstances, and took possession of the island by force? You could hardly expect him to recognise you as an independent State. I haven't the slightest desire to speak offensively, you know, and I'm simply asking for information. He would be infringing no National rights, and, if the possession of the island were necessary to the protection of a line of British connections with the British colonies, it would be his duty to take it, if only to prevent it falling into hostile hands."

"He might not be infringing National rights," said Adams warmly, "but he would be infringing personal rights, and that we should not allow him to do. Of course, I am aware it may sound to you rather like idle boasting, but I can assure you that if he didn't take the twenty-four hours' notice to quit that we should give him, neither he nor his cruiser would ever be heard of again."

"Possibly so," said Wyndham, "if that terrible Nautilus

Digitized by Google

of yours does what you expect her to do, and had all her armament on board; because I am quite aware that she could sink any war-ship that floats inside half-an-hour. But how if the cruiser turned up before she is ready for work, or while she was absent, how then?"

"It would still be done," said Adams in a tone that warned Wyndham that the controversy had gone as far as his courtesy could permit it to go under the circumstances.

"But you must pardon me if I beg you not to ask how we should do it."

This of course brought the conversation to a sudden stop, so far as that topic was concerned; and as it happened, just at that moment the Mermaid ran in alongside the jetty, and Violet—her trim conventional European costume looking quaintly conspicuous in the midst of a little group of picturesquely clad Utopian damsels—came down to welcome them ashore.

"Harry," she said, as her brother and Wyndham stepped on to the jetty, "this is quite a fairy-land, and I think I shall stop here. Dora here has promised to take me for a sister, and——"

"I wish to goodness she would," blurted out Sir Harry, with an unexpected abruptness that brought a sudden startled look into Miss Dora's soft brown eyes, and a bright flush to her pretty cheeks, "because in that case, you know——"

They watched the strange, swiftly moving thing

"Oh, don't talk nonsense, you silly fellow!" interrupted Violet, in time to save him from further and possibly fatal indiscretion. "Of course, I didn't mean that. Surely, you can't be presumptuous enough to think that one of the princesses of this enchanted realm is going to look with favour upon such a commonplace person as yourself. I always thought you were a modest sort of creature, but I suppose the air of this paradise has intoxicated you."

"As it apparently has you, my dear Violet," retorted Sir Harry, "or else you wouldn't talk such arrant nonsense."

"We came to tell you that dinner is ready," said Dora in such a primly demure tone that the conversation ended in a general laugh, and after that they set out for the settlement, abjuring dangerous topics for the rest of the way.

A good deal later on in the evening, about half-past ten or eleven, Sir Harry and the Lieutenant, after a long chat with Adams and Mr. Austen, who had seen them home to the door of the bungalow which had been placed at their service, started out for a stroll up towards the hills, instead of going to bed, so that they might indulge in a quiet smoke together and an uninterrupted chat over the strange adventures that had befallen them, and the still stranger things which they had seen and learned since sunrise.

The night was so deliciously cool, the landscape was softened down to such an alluring dimness by the dusk of the tropic night, and the scent of the fruits and flowers had such an inviting charm, that they wandered on smoking and chatting without any thought of how time was passing until the path which they had been following opened out on a clearing that formed the summit of a low spur of the foot-hills branching out from the chain running from Mount Plato to the northern bluffs.

There they stopped, and threw themselves down on the short soft turf to admire in leisurely fashion the beauties of the dimly star-lit picture of sea and land, mountain, vale and plain that lay spread out before them.

"Yes, truly," said Wyndham, "it is a lovely land, and much to be desired, even if it is somewhat of a land of mystery. I can't say that I blame friend Adams for wanting to keep it out of the hands of Empire-makers and land-grabbers with patriotic designs, even if they happen to be British. Hullo, what's that? Look, Milton, look!—over yonder, above that line of hills!"

The last words were uttered in a half-whispered tone of intense astonishment and almost of awe, and, as he spoke them, Wyndham grasped Sir Harry by the arm and pointed to where the ridge of the opposite line of hills, about two miles away, was sharply defined against the star-lit sky. Sir Harry's eyes followed the direction of his finger, and soon saw a sight that made him catch his breath and hold it in dumb amazement.

Something was moving swiftly along the ridge of hills about five hundred feet from its summit. The night was too dark and the distance was too great for them to make it out very distinctly, but, as it swept along, apparently at an almost incredible speed, they could see the stars behind it blotted out and reappear.

With straining eyes, and without a word spoken between them, they watched the strange, swiftly moving thing. Suddenly it doubled on its track. It had been moving towards the sea, and now it turned in a wide, graceful sweep. It followed the curve of the mountain, crossed the valley, as it seemed, in a single majestic leap, and then turned again and swept down out of the dusky distance, so close to where they were lying that they could hear a soft whirring, whistling sound as it clove the air. It passed within three hundred yards of them, turned again, and then, making a magnificent upward curve, soared over the ridge of hills, and vanished into space beyond them.

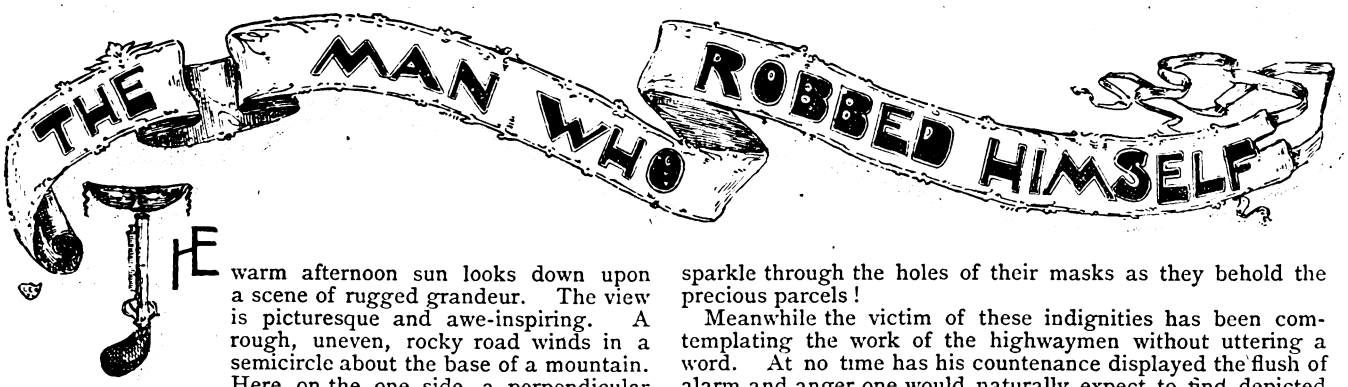
"Great heavens!" almost gasped Wyndham. "I was right in calling this a land of mystery, and Adams was right when he said that they could hold the island against all comers. Good God! they might terrorise the whole world, if they liked. That was an air-ship. The great problem is solved at last!

"Look here, Milton, if they find out that we've seen that thing, they'll never let us out of this island alive, good fellows and all as they seem, so we'd better keep our mouths shut until we can see what's to be done. Poor old England! She won't be mistress of the seas much longer if a colony of irresponsible Socialists can raise a fleet of ships like that thing."

"I'm afraid not," said Sir Harry, in a tone of unwonted seriousness. "I wonder how the deuce they got hold of a secret that all the world has been hunting after for centuries. Let's go home, and sleep on it, for, as the Russians say, the morning is wiser than the evening."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



THE warm afternoon sun looks down upon a scene of rugged grandeur. The view is picturesque and awe-inspiring. A rough, uneven, rocky road winds in a semicircle about the base of a mountain. Here, on the one side, a perpendicular wall of rock looms up to an amazing height; on the other are hills, with here and there a few scattering clumps of undergrowth. It is Scotland many years ago.

A rumbling sound breaks the quietude, and a moment later the lumbering mail coach comes in sight. As the driver cracks the long lash of his whip, urging the horses to increased speed, the vehicle sways to and fro in a manner which must prove uncomfortable to its passengers. Now it gives a greater lurch as it swings sharply to the right, round a projection at the base of the mountain, and an unlooked-for thing occurs.

"Halt!"

The peremptory command has an unmistakable ring of determination, and the sight of half-a-dozen pistols levelled in his direction causes the surprised driver to pull up his horses to a sudden standstill.

Conscious that something unusual has occurred, the passengers within the vehicle exchanged alarmed glances. There are two of them—both men—and they are an oddly assorted pair; one is a bronzed and bearded fellow, whose looks, speech, and general air indicate that he is a Highland peasant; the other a refined and dignified man, attired in the conventional black of a clergyman. He is young, and no doubt unused to his present surroundings and mode of travel.

Understanding the hasty glance his companion has shot him, a look of dismay and indignation flashes across the clergyman's face, and he makes a quick movement with his right hand in the direction of his hip pocket. With a significantly imperative gesture the other promptly checks the action.

"'Tain't no use," he says hastily but decidedly. "It's Dangerfield, the gentleman highwayman."

The words of caution have the desired effect; the look of anger on the face of the clergyman immediately gives way to one of surprise. The man who has spoken notices the change and is unable to account for it. Whether the bandit's name is familiar to him, or whether the mention of the word "gentleman" gives him assurance, the peasant is at a loss to know.

He is about to make a further remark, but the door of the coach is flung open with a bang, and an ugly-looking pistol is thrust through the aperture.

"Get down and out," orders the desperado who holds the weapon, in a voice sternly authoritative. "Hurry along, parson. Be quick, and no harm will come to you."

There is nothing to be gained by disobeying, and the clergyman clambers out of the coach, following upon the heels of his fellow-passenger. As they reach the ground the muzzle of a pistol is thrust into the face of each, and Dangerfield's command of "hands up" is obeyed without a word.

Hastily relieving both passengers of their weapons, Dangerfield secures the minister's gold watch and chain, then proceeds to search his clothing, prosecuting the work with a thoroughness and despatch which bespeak his experience in such matters.

He is not long in discovering that several packages are securely sewn up within the lining of the clergyman's vest, and it is the work of but another moment to ascertain that they are packages of bank notes. How the eyes of the robbers sparkle through the holes of their masks as they behold the precious parcels!

Meanwhile the victim of these indignities has been contemplating the work of the highwaymen without uttering a word. At no time has his countenance displayed the flush of alarm and anger one would naturally expect to find depicted upon the face of one who is being relieved of a fortune. A frown mantles his fine features, but it amounts to little else than a look of contempt.

"The money is not my property," he says, addressing himself to the leader. "It was entrusted to me for delivery to its owner, whose whereabouts I have been seeking to discover."

"I think you have found him," returns Dangerfield, sententiously, and the remark elicits a hearty laugh from the other highwaymen.

"In this instance might is right," the clergyman responds, looking fixedly into the robber's eyes. "Yet the heart-broken mother who entrusted to me the care of that money, bidding me to deliver it to her wayward boy, would hardy be satisfied with the transaction."

Dangerfield starts slightly, but answers carelessly:

"You have done what you could, so console yourself with that thought. As for the boy, no doubt he is a rich man by this time, and does not need the money. We make fortunes fast in these days."

"So I perceive," says the other, dryly.

Dangerfield turns away with an impatient movement. While this conversation has been going on the remaining passenger has been standing by, gazing upon the scene in open-mouthed wonder. He is next searched, after which the light baggage of both men is overhauled. Nothing, however, is taken except a large envelope tied about with red tape, which Dangerfield finds in the clergyman's bag. Without stopping to examine its contents, he places it in the inner pocket of his coat.

Apparently satisfied with the result of their work, the bandits toss the firearms belonging to their victims into the coach and the leader orders the pair to clamber in; then the driver is commanded to "let 'er go," and the cumbersome vehicle goes rumbling down the rough road, followed by several harmless pistol shots.

"They got but little booty from me," ventures the peasant when the scene of the robbery has faded away in the distance, "but you!" he broke off inquiringly.

"Well," replied the clergyman, with an air which does not exhibit much concern, "I do not mourn my loss, under the circumstances, as much as I regret some other matters."

He does not volunteer an explanation, and the first speaker is disinclined to question him, though greatly mystified by his inexplicable conduct. To all appearances the minister has become deeply interested in the beautiful landscape without, and with an almost inaudible expression of wonderment, the other lapses into silence.

Dangerfield and his comrades are not long in mounting their horses and leaving the scene of their latest depredation.

On and on they ride, now travelling at a brisk pace through beautiful valleys hemmed in by massive walls of rock, now making their way cautiously over dangerous mountain passes; on and on until the sun has sunk from sight, and its golden glory has faded from the western sky.

At last the party comes to a halt in the very heart of a wild and desolate region. A skilfully hidden aperture at the base of a cliff leads to a subterranean cavern, whither the men betake themselves, after dismounting and turning their horses loose in the valley below.

Digitized by Google

"Well, boys," says Dangerfield, who had been gloomy and silent throughout the journey, "let us have supper, for I am as hungry as a bear! Then we will attend to business."

In a remarkably short space of time a fire is lighted, and a few minutes later the evening meal is prepared. It is a meagre spread, but the hungry men eat heartily and with evident relish.

Dangerfield is a young man, possessed of a clean-shaven, pleasing countenance, though one that bespeaks weakness of character, well built, and dressed in a suit of some black material, which has not seen much service. The others are not so neatly dressed. They are rough, bearded fellows, whose speech and manner set them in decided contrast with their leader; it is easy to perceive that the latter is looked up to and admired by his comrades, and is a favourite with them.

The meal concluded, the plunder which has so easily fallen into the hands of the band is produced. The packages of bank notes are first given attention, surprise and delight beaming from every countenance as the money is counted. It is scarcely ten minutes before the work is finished.

"Now, men, listen to me," says Dangerfield, when the first noisy congratulations are over. "We've made enough money to-day to enable us to live honest lives. Suppose we break up and once more turn respectable? I, for one, am tired of this sort of thing, and want to get out of it. What say you all?"

No one speaks for a few moments; then Jake Hawkins, the son of a Lancashire miner, slowly answers:

"Well, cap'n, we'll think of it overnight. Ye see, we're old hands, and it's hard to do what we know nothin' about. You're different from the rest; you have friends in London—a father and mother, perhaps—and came to us because you were starved out, and were ashamed to write to 'em. I saw the words of that preacher chap touched ye. I'm about right, I reckon?"

Dangerfield answers with a nod—speech seems impossible.

"All right, we won't hinder ye. Leave us if ye wanter; but we can't promise anything in a hurry, can we, boys? Say no more just now, cap'n. Leave us to think about it; and you'd better think too. Now, who's for a game of cards?"

Dangerfield says nothing further; but he will neither play nor drink, and soon stretches himself at full length upon a blanket and sinks into a light, dream-haunted sleep.

Some hours after he awakes with a start; his thoughts revert to the events of the day. He is unable to account for the strange indescribable feeling which possesses him. What did the clergyman's significant words and manner mean?

"The papers!" he exclaims, springing to his feet as a sudden thought occurs to him. "Why did I not think of them before?"

The candles have burned to their sockets and gone out leaving the place in darkness. Dangerfield lights a fresh one and sets it on the table. Then he takes from his pocket the packet of papers found in the minister's bag, unties the ribbon which secures it, and brings to light several legal-looking documents, and a small envelope, securely sealed.

"Frank Dangerfield!" he falters, reading the name written in bold characters upon the envelope.

"Am I dreaming or have my senses forsaken me?"

He throws himself into a chair, and hurriedly but with trembling hands breaks the seal and draws forth the contents of the package—two sheets of note paper closely written, and blotted here and there. One glance at the chirography and the man recoils as if dealt a mortal blow, clutching desperately at the table before him. His face is deathly pale, his breath comes in laboured gasps, and his eyes fill with tears as he reads the following:

"My dear lost Son,—I am told that I am about to die, but I shall try to write a letter to you, in the hope that it may some time be delivered into your hands. Your sudden departure was a severe blow. Your poor father survived it but a few days, and I—I have waited for tidings of you in vain. May you, my dear boy, never know the torture I have endured during the past months! Frank, how could you bring such trouble upon us because a silly, frivolous girl proved false? We have loved you all your life, she had but for an hour, yet you broke our hearts for her sake. My boy, I tremble for one who has shown himself so weak; how can you withstand temptation! But neither reproaches nor grief will bring you to me, and I must try to be strong.

"I want to say this: All the property shall be yours; I shall turn it into money, and leave it in the care of a distant relative. I sent for him, and he is here. I have asked him to find you if he has to search the whole broad country over, and pray God you are still in that Highland district that this may reach you. He has promised me, and a great burden is lifted from my heart. My dear, my only son, I cannot see to write more. You will be alone in the world, but I commend you to the keeping of God. May He comfort and help you to be strong and do right. A kiss, and good-bye.—Your devoted and heart-broken MOTHER."

With a face which seems to have suddenly grown old, Dangerfield sits at the table, gazing fixedly at the letter. His mother dead—his kind, patient mother, whose only fault was her overfondness for him! He could not believe it. Oh, to live the past over again!

For an hour he sits there; then with a look of sudden determination he rises to his feet.

"I must leave here at once!" he says. "It is not too late. I may yet redeem the past. Mother, mother, your prayers shall be answered!"

He glances about him. His companions are sleeping soundly, oblivious of what is transpiring. The sight seems to bring to his thoughts another aspect of his misfortune.

"I have shared my fortune with them," he mutters, "given them thousands which rightfully were my own. Shall I acquaint them with my story, furnishing proof of its truth? No—the money may help them to lead honest lives, in spite of Jake's words. They have risked what I have risked, braved dangers as I have braved them. We have shared the spoils as we shared the dangers equally. The money is theirs."

The envelope addressed to himself has fallen from his nerveless grasp to the floor of rock beneath his feet. He gathers up the letter and other documents without further examination, and hastily thrusts them into his pocket. Then, with an expression of unspeakable sadness upon his face, he casts a last lingering look about him, dons his hat, and quits the cave.

The pure mountain air cools his aching head and seems to revive his drooping spirits, but his step is as the step of an intoxicated man. With little difficulty he finds his horse, and in a moment he has adjusted the saddle and bridle; then, in the grey light that heralds the break of day, he mounts the animal and turns his face towards the south. He has been waiting these many years for his father's fortune, and now he has robbed himself of his lawful due, and with his own hands given it away.

FIRST ISSUE of PEARSON'S LIBRARY

A Complete Novel,

ENTITLED—

A Girl Without a Name.

(Published, Friday, September 28th.)

PRICE SIXPENCE. 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ENAMELLED COPPER ✱ LETTERS

FOR

TRADESMEN'S WINDOWS, FASCIAS, SIGNS, OR TABLETS.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

Most Effective Medium

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

ENAMELLED IRON PLATES

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

Call and see our Stock, or send for Price Lists.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

Only Address—

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

ANOTHER GREAT SUCCESS!

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the World, AT LESS THAN HALF ORDINARY PRICES.

OVER EIGHT HUNDRED WORKERS EMPLOYED.

The most remarkable of all the costumes that have ever been produced is the one here illustrated; it is undoubtedly the most popular style of the season, and has been generally adopted as

A LADY'S HOLIDAY SUIT.

THESE SUITS ARE MADE IN THE JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE (REGD.) IN NAVY BLUE OR BLACK, ALSO IN FASHIONABLE GREY OR DRAB HOMESPUN MIXTURES, AND NAVY OR DRAB TWILL DRILL, each suit consisting of a smart shape open coat or jacket—stylishly cut, beautifully made with two pockets, and finished all round edge of coat with special quality silk cord—together with a wide bell-shape costume skirt trimmed to match jacket. The jacket fits closely to the back of the figure, and remains gracefully open in front. These two garments, viz., 15/-

JACKET AND SKIRT COMPLETE

form at once a smart, stylish, and yet most useful outfit for wearing with a blouse or cambric shirt, and are offered for the amazingly low price of 15s. Ladies are asked to consider what this means: a really well-made fashionable outfit that any lady might be pleased to wear, made without the slightest approach to sweating, and yet supplied complete

FOR FIFTEEN SHILLINGS.

Every garment is made in the firm's large, airy, and perfectly appointed workrooms, and is surely value that will please every lady in the land.

When ordering please state measurement across back from shoulder to shoulder, also length from neck to waist at back. The sizes kept in stock will fit any figure up to 38 ins. round bust under arms. Larger or special sizes 1s. 6d. extra. Each suit is packed in strong leather board box, and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES, made from the JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE (Regd.), a fabric of great durability and world-wide fame, and supplied complete for the ridiculously low price of 10s. 6d. each.

10/6

COSTUMES FOR YOUNG MISSES 8/9, KNOCKABOUT FROCKS from 1/6.

 PATTERNS, also Illustrated "Book of the Serge," and Fashion Sheet of other Costumes for Ladies' and Children's Wear sent POST FREE to any reader of Short Stories on application.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd., The Warehouse, 11, Piccadilly, MANCHESTER.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM :—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland :—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

NEW SERIAL—"THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR"
(By GEORGE GRIFFITH, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," and "The Syren of the Skies.")

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 301. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 6, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!!

10,000 CARPETS

4/- EACH. LARGEST EVER SOLD AT OR NEAR THE PRICE. 4/- EACH.

THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of SHORT STORIES only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 4s., or 50 Stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine 4s. SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE, TRIUMPH CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bed-room, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY SIZED ROOM. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, Below the Actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 1,000,000 have been already sold.

GENUINE TEST.—Compare the weight and appearance with the inferior carpets advertised by other firms. With every Carpet we shall supply a very handsome RUG to match for 1s. 3d. extra, or Two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 9s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value." Sala's Journal says: "Unequalled for cheapness combined with durability and prettiness."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our customers.

8, East Street, The Nursery, Fisherton, Salisbury.
M. Lock writes:—"I received the Carpets, Rugs, and Blankets quite safe on Monday. I really did not expect to see such beautiful Carpets, it was quite a surprise to me. If I have an opportunity of recommending them I will do so with pleasure, for the Company deserve it."

Romanhurst, Stanley Road, Teddington.
Mr. E. Barlow writes:—"I have received the Carpets, and am exceedingly pleased with them all. The Stair Carpeting is very artistic. I am so glad you recommended me the Belgravia Brussels Carpeting and Carpets for landing and hall, they being so well adapted for each purpose."

All orders despatched same day as received, must be accompanied by cutting from this Paper. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. HARGREAVES.

ESTABLISHED 1872.

Address—The British Carpet Weaving Company,
31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

It is not claimed that these Camomile Pills will cure all diseases, but they have 100 YEARS' REPUTATION for being UNEQUALLED and, indeed, UNAPPROACHED as a remedy for

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH AND LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

MILD IN OPERATION, PERFECTLY SAFE, AND FREE FROM INJURIOUS DRUGS.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH,

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BONNY, CHUBBY CHILDREN.

If you really want your children to be Bonny, Chubby, and Strong, with rosy cheek and pure firm flesh, give them

INFANTINA'S Strengthening SYRUP.

Sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle, or, post free, from

THE INFANTINA COMPANY,
London, S.W.

BEETHAM'S WORLD FAMED CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists,
CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

Digitized by Google

ENAMELLED COPPER ✦ LETTERS

FOR

TRADESMEN'S WINDOWS, FASCIAS, SIGNS, OR TABLETS.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

Most Effective Medium

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

ENAMELLED IRON PLATES.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

Call and see our Stock, or send for Price Lists.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

Only Address—

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and LADIES
TO OBSTINATE CASES, LADIES
TO NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, LADIES
TO GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES
TO No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:— LADIES
TO "By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise. LADIES
TO A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case. LADIES
TO Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope. LADIES
TO Write privately to— LADIES
TO Mrs. P. S. S., LADIES
TO 145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W. LADIES

TOWLES PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

HAIR REMOVED permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

1/6 invested at your Chemist or Store in a bottle of "Anteczema" will at once prove to you how easily and pleasantly it can be cured.

Valuable Book on the Skin free, from

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,

83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

MELVILLE'S

New Upright

GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE,

61, Charing Cross Road, London.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,

GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

A Signal Success.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces for £1 1s. 0d.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is Selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post-card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co." 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 301. FOR THE WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 6, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

EVERYBODY knows the story of Orpheus, and nobody believes it! I hold that everybody is wrong. If there is anything incredible in that story, it is that the son of Oeagrus should have preferred death to the love of the Bacchantes, who were beautiful creatures, if we may believe the paintings which represent them.

I have always believed firmly in the wonderful power of Orpheus's songs to charm beasts and even make the rocks weep; for I have seen the spell wrought by music on a larger scale than one sees every evening at the opera, and the thousand witnesses, brothers in arms of the modern Orpheus, whose history I am going to relate, could affirm the same thing.

In 1830, Hussein-Pasha, the Dey of Algeria, in an impatient manner, easily explained, perhaps, but decidedly blamable, slapped the face of our Chargé d'Affaires with his fly-flap. He was dethroned by France, who took possession of the provinces of Algeria, Constantine, and Oran. Nothing could be more natural or more just! But twenty-five years later, in 1855, we had not yet been able to make the Kabyles understand it.

They absurdly maintained that they were not responsible for the acts of the Dey; that if he had been a little hasty it was not their fault, and they did not see why their country should be invaded and a tax levied on their cattle; or that they should pay tribute, especially the tribute of blood, to assist the Christians against their own Mahommedan brothers under the fallacious pretext that Hussein-Pasha (whom the greater part of them had never seen) had struck M. Arago in the face with a small bunch of feathers—which really could not have hurt him very much!

But France maintained that behind the material fact were the consequences, behind the gesture was the insult, that her honour demanded her to kill a hundred thousand men on both sides and conquer Algeria, if it were only to teach good manners to these barbarians and compel them to pay tribute.

It was precisely this which the Kabyles would not understand, and that is why we set out for Constantine—ten thousand infantry, cavalry and artillery—with the intention, as charitable as civilised, of enlightening them as to the reality of our rights and the superiority of our institutions.

But if the Kabyles are dull of understanding, they have a quick eye and are prompt to act. If they were not our enemies I should say that, while leading the simple life of pastoral people of olden times, they have retained their virtues, preserved the pride and courage of free men, and are formidable in combat when one dares attack them in their own mountains. We soon experienced this. Scarcely had we passed the Oued-Rummel when the struggle began. For a month our march was only a succession of skirmishes and night attacks through the passes which furrowed this mountainous country, encounters in which we always lost more men than the enemy.

In the plain we were suffocated with the heat and died of thirst; on the mountain we froze, and often had to open up a road through the snow. As soon as our columns separated, in order to pass a defile or a ravine, a discharge of musketry burst above our heads; from every crevice in the rock came a shot; the brushwood crackled under our feet. Our sharpshooters, the Zouaves, climbed the rocks to dislodge the Kabyles, but they bounded like chamois from crest to crest, returning the fire of our soldiers, whose bodies rolled from top to bottom of the ravine, almost under our horses' feet. Sometimes it was an Arab who fell in our midst, and expired crying, "There is one God." If he could not speak, he fixed on us a look grave and menacing, raised his finger to make the supreme profession of faith, and his brave soul took its flight towards his one God.

We had been a month on the way to Constantine, advancing slowly, on account of the enormous convoy which followed us, the men almost exhausted by incessant skirmishes, and the General, anxious perhaps as to the result of the expedition, decidedly in a bad humour. The principal cause of delay in a march, which ought to have been as rapid as possible over the mountains, was a flock of five thousand sheep; therefore the General resolved to abandon them. In order that they might not say he had lost them, he decided to leave them in charge of one of the Zephyrs. He chose a man from this corps, because he was convinced, as we all were, that the poor devil would be killed, and the sheep would be carried off as soon as we were gone. He preferred to sacrifice a Zephyr to a Grenadier or a Zouave.

The battalion of Zephyrs, whose real name is the African Battalion, is formed exclusively of scapegoats. It is not composed of robbers or murderers, but all the undisciplined or insubordinate of the army are sent to the Zephyrs, or "Joyfuls," as they call themselves. They are usually intelligent, and if it be true that a Zouave is as brave as one lion, it may be said that a Zephyr is as brave as two! In a profession where discipline and passive obedience are the first requirements of order and the essential conditions of success, these independent natures, indifferent to punishment, for they often avenge themselves by a cutting witticism, are considered dangerous, so they are sent to the African Battalion. On account of their reputation for bravery, they are always placed in the front rank during any particularly dangerous engagement.

Thus the hundred and twenty-three men who defended Mazagran for three days against an army of eight thousand

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

Arabs, who were unable to gain possession of the village, were Zephyrs, commanded by Captain Lelièvre.

We were about to resume our march, after passing the night in a valley covered with the long, furze-like grass peculiar to this country, when the General called the Commander of the Zephyrs, and told him to appoint a man from his battalion to tend the sheep, which he had decided to leave in this spot until our return—in three months! "Give him," he added, "an ample supply of biscuit, rice, and coffee, and he can kill a sheep when he needs it; we will call for him on our way back."

I do not know whether there was irony in his remark, but I am loath to believe it, for it would have been cruel. The Commander could not repress a smile, but he made no observation, saluted, and rejoined his battalion, which was awaiting the order to march.

He passed slowly in front of his troop, looking at each man as if asking on which the choice should fall, for he believed he was condemning to death the one he selected. At length he stopped and called "Fusilier Carette." A boy of twenty-two or twenty-three years, tall but solidly built, with short nose, square chin, large forehead surmounted by light curly hair, mischievous blue eyes, and laughing mouth, stepped out of the ranks and replied "present." Halting in front of the officer, he presented arms and stood looking him full in the face.

Halting in front of the officer, he presented arms.

The latter delivered the general's order, and in spite of the ordinary harshness of his manner, he could not conceal a certain emotion which touched the soldier. When his comrades heard the order given, a murmur of insubordination ran from right to left of the company, and whispered protestations, which the officers feigned not to hear in order not to punish. They might have expected it! Carette, for numerous reasons, was greatly beloved by all his companions. Among the "Joyfuls" Carette was the joyful par excellence. In his youth, which had been very varied, he had first been one of a troop of mountebanks, then he had travelled with a dentist, and thanks to his wanderings with this charlatan, he had made a considerable collection of puns and jokes which had an enormous success in Africa. He also pretended to certain surgical knowledge, and his talent as a prestidigitator delighted the Zephyrs.

Moreover, he had a fine voice and played the hautboy in a manner that the "Joyfuls" pronounced remarkable, especially when it constituted the orchestra at one of the soldiers' balls. In short, not one among all this undisciplined band was more unruly than Carette. His repartee, often clever, always saucy, enlivened the whole battalion, and when any joke was organised, Carette was always the author or instigator. It was probably for all these reasons that the commander honoured him with his choice.

When the column began its march more than one among these fearless men was moved when he took leave of this gay comrade, and each one wanted to shake his hand and say farewell in some form or other. "Good-bye, Carette." "Good-bye, old man." "You're a sharp fellow," said another, "but keep your eye open."

"Have no fear," replied the poor boy, greatly touched by these proofs of sympathy, "you will find me here when you come back."

But when the last waggon had passed and the last man had disappeared in the ravine, when he found himself alone, surrounded only by the sheep, dreary thoughts began to assail him.

He had a vague intuition of the grandeur and sacredness of duty and understood the necessity of discipline, that mystic bond which united all his companions in an invincible whole whilst he remained alone, isolated, probably lost for having discarded, like a heavy yoke, the necessary order and discipline.

But "Joyful's" mind could not long remain occupied with serious thoughts, so raising his head, he said with a smile, "Won't the others be surprised if they find me here with my sheep when they come back? And the Commander," said he, laughing heartily, "how astonished he will be." Then looking at the sheep scattered on the plain, grazing like Madame Deshoulière's lambs on the tranquil banks of the Linod, he added, "All the same, I shall be confoundedly bored here for three months." Suddenly a bright idea occurred to him; he would train one of his pensioners and make a learned sheep of him! Afterwards he busied himself in preparing a shelter for the night, which he tried to make as solid as possible, propping the gourbi (a hut made of branches and brushwood) against a rock, and strengthening it as well as he could with the materials at his disposal. This took some time. When he saw the sun sink on the horizon, he made a tour of the little plain where he had been abandoned. Seeing nothing to make him anxious, his mind was at ease, and he began to prepare his evening meal, whistling gaily.

The night had come—a calm night, silent and serene, such as one only sees in the desert; there was not a cloud in the sky, and the moon, which on account of the purity and transparency of the atmosphere, appears larger and more brilliant than any other part of the earth, seemed enthroned in the midst of a host of stars, also more numerous and brighter than elsewhere. Obedient to an instinct common to all domestic animals, the sheep collected for the night around their shepherd. They covered the plain for a great distance towards the east.

At the extreme west of the rock against which the Zephyr had erected his gourbi, was a ravine, not very large in that spot, but deepening towards the north and south. At the north it disappeared between slopes covered with cactus, roses, and Barbary fig-trees, whose interlacing branches offered to the reptiles and animals of that region haunts impenetrable to man. At the south the ravine bordered upon a valley, in which was established the douar or Arab village, which had furnished our latest aggressors.

Digitized by Google

The poor soldier, ignorant of the existence of these redoubtable spots, hearing no sound, seated himself on a rock and began to dream.

It will be impossible to enumerate all the memories which his thoughts evoked, some touching, even poetical, others simply gay or guilty, but all full of charm to him at that hour, and in such circumstances. After a hasty look on his past, a look which embraced his childhood, his wanderings and his success as a mountebank, his escapades, his love affairs, he began to think of the severity of his chiefs, of the council of war—which had sent him to the African Battalion, of his popularity among his comrades, and finally of his present situation.

The result of all this retrospection was a melancholy look addressed to heaven, and these few words: "It doesn't matter, but it would be strange to die on such a beautiful night." With a versatility peculiar to these badly balanced brains, he struck the ground with the butt end of his gun and cried, almost gaily, "Bah! I have my flingot (gun) and my cartridges, everything is quiet, and it will be light to-morrow." In order to drive away the ideas that saddened him and weakened his courage, he took his hautboy and prepared to give a little concert.

However, he was mistaken; everything seemed quiet, but there is for every man a night without a morrow, that of death, and it seemed to have come for the poor Zephyr, for two enemies, equally formidable, the lion and the Kabyles were advancing silently in the shadow.

The king of the mountain, whom the Arabs call "Said," had just awakened in his den, his eyelids still heavy with the day's sleep; he had had a long yawn, lazily stretched himself, rose and went to the entrance of the cavern to inhale the air, as if to ask on which side he should direct his steps. He was not one of those lions, long-legged and bald like those of Cape Colony, or slight and angular like the American puma, which seems no more formidable than an ordinary domestic mastiff.

He was a real lion of the Atlas, whose imposing and terrible aspect was calculated to weaken the stoutest heart. He moved without haste, his head high, his step free and sure, scenting without hesitation or fear every obstacle on his path, exploring with a tranquil air the shadows cast by the rocks, bounding with grace over the chasms which opened before him.

When he reached the summit of a hill, or one of those escarpments which the moon inundated with her rays, his grand silhouette animated and filled the landscape. On arriving at the entrance of the ravine he stopped, took breath, and, with the same majestic and quiet step, turned towards the Zephyr's encampment.

The rock upon which the soldier was seated did not rise more than fifteen feet above the bottom of the ravine, so that with a single bound the lion could have reached the top. He came steadily on in the shadow thrown by the little eminence, raised his head to measure the height, crouched as if ready to spring—but, instead of doing so, straightened himself again and seemed to listen.

The sheep, not very intelligent, as everyone knows, reassured, as men often are, by numbers, slept quietly, suspecting no more than their guardian the approach of the enemy. The Zephyr at this precise moment was playing the most joyous waltz in his repertoire; he displayed in its execution a sentiment, a sweetness of tone which ought to have charmed the king of the mountain. Perhaps he was not very hungry just then, unless the proverb which says "Hungry stomach has no ears" be false. However that may be, after two or three movements betraying great uncertainty, the terrible beast ended by lying down at the foot of the hillock, supported his great head on his outstretched paws, and, with half-closed lids, seemed to listen—which proves that the story of Orpheus is not a fable.

Now the abandonment of the sheep was known to the neighbouring douar. Its inhabitants, supposing that the infidels had left a guard, or a number of soldiers sufficient to defend the flock, decided to await the night to reconnoitre. As all the warriors or men from the "great tents" were away, the old Caid, who commanded the tribe in the absence of the Sheik, thought it best to do this. At the hour when the lion left his den, ten men, the Caid and a young boy, almost a child, son of the Sheik, also left the douar, and marched in silence towards the plain, hoping to surprise the Christians and carry off their cattle. Being ignorant of the number of the enemy they were to encounter, the Caid recommended his men to advance with great caution, either that the surprise might be complete, or, in case it seemed best not to attack, that they might retire without raising the infidel's attention.

They approached noiselessly, arms in readiness, finger on the trigger, with the Roumi (the Sheik's son) some steps in advance, for even in the desert noblesse oblige. His old kinsman, the Caid, was proud of the child's courage and followed his every movement with a look in which could be read mingled solicitude and admiration.

They were nearing the end of their expedition when the lion, who scented their approach before seeing them, opened his large eyes, knitted his brows and rose. A hyena would have fled like a coward, a panther would have lain in ambush to surprise them later, but the lion advanced proudly to the middle of the ravine. He sniffed at the earth, then with swinging tail, which swept the ground from side to side, with bristling mane and sparkling eyes, majestic and terrible, he paused.

It was at this moment that the Zephyr saw him. The hautboy, from which he lately drew such sweet sounds, slipped from his hand and for half a minute he remained petrified with stupor; but soon recovering his presence of mind and his courage, he seized his gun, cocked it, and took aim. He was just about to fire when a noise, which he could not explain at first, prevented him. Almost at the same instant he heard a voice with an accent of profoundest terror cry "Caid." It was the Roumi, who had just perceived the lion. Seized with the horrible fear which that animal always produces on the Arab, he turned and ran towards his companion. All saw him then; the Caid, forgetting the Christians whom he had come to surprise, commanded "Fire." Ten musket shots rang out in the night, lighting up the ravine, but the lion remained standing. He gave a roar which was echoed like thunder on every side of the mountain, then with one prodigious bound he fell on the Sheik's son.

The lion was holding the Roumi under his heavy paw, his claws were digging into his flesh, whilst with open mouth, panting breath, his eyes blazing with ferocity, he seemed ready to devour him. It was at this moment that Carette fired. The noble beast, struck in the temple, gave a second roar, but it was only a death rattle this time, and he fell to rise no more. Meanwhile, not knowing that he was dead, the soldier jumped into the ravine and advanced bravely to the ferocious beast, whilst the Arabs, in spite of their incontestable courage, rested on the defensive, not daring to approach to dispatch the lion, or to raise their young comrade. It was the Zephyr that lifted him and placed him upon a rock. I have said that Carette had travelled with a charlatan and pretended to certain medical knowledge.

If his pretensions were not fully justified they were in a measure, his master taking about with him a skeleton and some anatomical plates, which he exhibited to the public. His pupil had often examined them; and he had, in addition, a lightness of touch, a dexterity acquired in prestidigitation during another phase of his adventurous youth. This explains how he staunched the blood, bandaged the wounds, and tended the Roumi with a skill which gave the Arabs an exalted idea of his talents.

When his nephew came to himself the Caid, who until then had not spoken, went up to Carette and thanked him, without much effusion, but in the grave tones peculiar to the men of the mountains, which, if it is less expressive, is always more sincere than the loquacity of the Greeks. The Zephyr, who spoke a little Arabic, like most soldiers who have passed some time in Africa, expressed to the Caid his desire to live on good terms with them in so earnest a tone that his new friends could not doubt his sincerity. From that day he was, so to speak, adopted by the tribe of Beni-Hammers, and almost lived with them. The sheep were guarded by the men belonging to the douar, to which the Zephyr had rendered a service. During this time Carette tended the sick, played on the hautboy, ate hot dishes, swallowed yatagans, and juggled for everybody.

Digitized by Google

As he did not kill many more patients than our qualified doctors, and as his hautboy and his sleight-of-hand tricks had still more success with the Beni-Hammers than with the Zephyrs, his popularity became so great with these simple people that they often wondered what was to become of them when the stranger went away. In order not to grieve my readers, I will not speak of the young girls; I will merely say that the waters of the spring, from which they filled their pitchers, preserved for a long time a peculiar taste on account of the tears they shed when speaking of the departure of the "Joyful."

Four months later we returned to the plain where we had abandoned the sheep. The expedition had been gone longer than we at first supposed, but it ended happily. Kabylia was subdued; the Douars had surrendered; the tribute had been discharged, and the Kabyles, who had received us with musket shots at the beginning of the campaign, returned to our ranks, deserting as they neared their own villages.

When the advance guard emerged from the mountains on to the plain and saw it covered with sheep, browsing quietly, a great cry arose, and the news spread with the rapidity of a telegram from head to foot of the column. "Carette and the sheep! The sheep and the Zephyr! Impossible! But, look, there they are!" These phrases, and others like them, were repeated from left to right of our little army, and reached the General, who, not finding it credible, put his horse to a gallop, in order to confirm such a miracle with his own eyes. The Zephyrs, more interested than anybody in the matter, as it was to them an affair of honour, raised a "hurrah," and broke into a run. At last we were compelled to yield to ocular evidence.

The sheep were there, and Carette, leaning on his gun, smiling, but with something grave in his eyes, waited our arrival with dignity.

Then the drums beat, the bands played their gayest, and for an hour the brave Zephyr was the object of a veritable ovation.

Here, perhaps, I ought to end this episode, of which I can attest the truth, being an eye-witness, but I am a conscientious writer, and believe I shall satisfy my readers more by telling them what eventually became of Carette. If he had not belonged to the African Battalion it is probable that he would have been decorated, but his artistic antecedents forbade his having that distinction. At least, so thought the General, who gave him, instead, a hundred francs. On their side, the Beni-Hammers had prepared the lion's skin, as they know how to do it in the desert, and when we entered Constantine, Carette found himself rich. He sold the skin for three hundred francs. As soon as he was in possession of that sum he took a "stretch" (illegal absence) of three days with two comrades. This escapade cost him what the regiment calls "eleven and four"—that is, eleven days in prison and four in the black hole.

"Sic transit gloria mundi."

I met him precisely at the moment when they were taking him to the "carcere duro," and the interest I felt in him prompted me to remonstrate with him on the past. "Bah!" he replied; "if, instead of giving me a hundred francs, the General had given me a handshake, it might perhaps have made me reflect; but no, he gave me the money. What could I do with it? Buy a house?" He shrugged his shoulders.

"It was to have a spree with, wasn't it? That's what I did, and now they lock me up! Ah, well, it is not just! Because, you see, the General never would have got clear, as I did, with five thousand sheep on his hands, and a lion, and all the Bedouins—men and women. I would like to have seen him in my place!" He gave another shrug, showing his disdain for the General, after which he went off with the corporal to remain under lock and key for fifteen days.

The man seemed determined to enter.

. . . . . .

Ten years later I had left the army, and settled in the country.

One day, hearing a lively altercation outside the grating, I opened the window to find out the cause. It was my servant, opposing, most energetically, the entrance of a man, an ass, a woman, and a little girl. The man seemed determined to enter, in spite of all remonstrances. I recognised him at once by his sly air, his blue eyes and curly hair. It was Carette!

I confess that I was rather pleased to see him again, not only for himself, but for all the memories evoked by his presence.

I called to the servant to let him in, and ran out to meet him.

The ass and the indescribable baggage which he carried, were put in the stable, and I made Carette and his family come into the dining-room. Then he told me that he was married, and that he travelled in turn as musician, dentist, and prestidigitator; that, thanks to his triple industry, he lived well, and was content with his lot.

"But all the same," he added, with a sigh of regret, "I have never had, and never shall have, such a good time as during the four months I spent with the Beni-Hammers."

Digitized by Google

MR. MITTGAR.

BELL was speaking.

"Oh, please, dear Mr. Mittgar, do sing! Sing that favourite of yours; what is it? 'When other lips'; yes, that's it. Oh, do please."

She stood before his chair, playfully clasping her hands in supplication, with a mischievous twinkle in her seventeen-year old brown eyes. A sad smile lit up his thin yellow face when she stopped, and he rose to his full six foot of skin and bone, and strode over to the music case to hunt up Bell's favourite song, while she, convulsed with laughter in anticipation of the sport to come, retreated amongst her friends and pressed her handkerchief over her mouth.

It was always great fun to ask Mr. Mittgar down for the evening and to get in some friends to hear him sing. Framed in his broken English, the most solemn songs became to the audience more humorous by a long way than the most humorous song written.

No one knew much about him, except that he had been introduced at some bye-gone period by a friend of Bell's father. The family did not worry their heads about his pedigree. He had come over from Switzerland, and was something in the city of London; what, it didn't much matter to anyone.

"Oh, please, dear Mr. Mittgar, do sing!"

Beyond his powers of singing he had no personal attractions, if the inharmonious notes that escaped his lips in illogical sequence may be called an attraction. In any case, it proved the key to many a fashionable drawing-room, where the funny young man palled on the company, and his humorous songs fell flat.

Of all those listeners who had split their sides with laughter behind his back, none were so boldly and daringly hypocritical as Bell Davies. She egged him on to sing, she fawned over him, and complimented him on his unparalleled abilities, all of which he honestly believed to be genuine, not for a single moment doubting the sincerity of her praises; and then she laughed behind his back.

He was a tall, lean man of thirty or thereabouts. A thin beard grew from a chin that had never felt the razor, and a pair of large, sentimental eyes were set one on either side of a rather large and delicate-looking nose.

In his own way, he was a braggart. He would entertain a dinner table for an hour at a time with anecdotes of his travels abroad, and the coolness and presence of mind which he had invariably exhibited. In fact, it seemed as if no anecdote were complete without some reference to his physical bravery.

But, for all that, he was an honest, good fellow, "horridly polite" to Bell and to all ladies, as is the custom of male continentalers, and with a large opinion of his own vocal powers. He loved to be applauded; his big eyes would glisten and his thin face flush with pride when the guests clapped and cheered in pure derision and mock admiration at the result of his efforts.

And so on this particular evening, when he had wailed the last long-drawn note of his favourite song, he turned with a low bow to the enthusiastic audience, and strutted with a degree of pride to his seat.

"Oh, that was perfectly delicious!" half-screamed Bell, struggling to keep back the laughter which nearly choked her. "Thank you so much. We——." Then the bursting frivolity found vent in a peal of laughter, which she cut short with an effort, by asking her right-hand neighbour to "tell Mr. Mittgar that awfully good joke. He would like it so."

"I do luff to zing zat zong: 'Ven oder leeps.' Weminds me of mine Sweetzerland, mine land. It is a song beautiful, and ze vords are magnifique."

At such times he would relapse into quietude for a few moments, and the room, with its merry-faced guests, would be oblivious to him, as his thoughts wandered back to the tiny châtel on the sloping sides of the snow-capped Alps, where in his memory still dwelt a dainty little maiden, whose lips he had felt against his own long years ago when he had set out for London to build his fortune.

The din of the chatter would give place to the gentle tinkle of the sheep bells far up the mountain side, the boisterous shouts of the vivacious Bell and her companions would be drowned in the quiet laughter of little Gretchen as she played with him as a boy. Then the news came to him of the death of his parents, to whose funeral he was unable to go, for the fortune was still in the air, instead of in his pocket. And not long after he wrote to give the honest reason, he heard that Gretchen was gone, and had married a watchmaker's assistant in Geneva.

This blow drove all ambition from his soul. He was a simple-minded man, very simple-minded, and he had loved once, and would never love again. Gretchen had deceived him; that was enough.

He was roused from his reverie by the restless Bell, who stood before him, with one arm round a girl-friend's waist, and the other holding a dish of oranges. At first he shook his head and said that he did not want any, but she pressed him, and, rather than in any way give her the slightest cause for offence, he took one—one that she pointed out as being ripe and sweet.

His discovery that it was an imitation one of soft dough, that stuck to his fingers and messed his dress coat, was the signal for a further burst of merriment, in which he joined, half-heartedly, but wretchedly miserable at heart in the knowledge that this, his only evening suit, was spoiled.

He was not rich. But appearances had to be kept up, for without them there would be no dinners and no parties, and without these he could have no opportunity of displaying his vocal ability, which was the one delight of his weary existence.

A week or two later he was at the house again, on the occasion of Bell's eighteenth birthday, and by her special request he sang "Ven oder leeps" twice during the evening. Had she enjoyed a keener perception, had she given a moment's thought to his appearance and his manner, she would have perceived that the thin cheeks were a trifle more sunken, and the quavering, unmelodious voice a trifle weaker than it had been when she last had listened to that song.

Digitized by Google

And had she given him further attention, she would have noticed that his walk was not so brave nor so steady as it had been on previous occasions, and that he rested one hand on the frame of the piano while he lifted up his voice, and that he seemed glad to get to his seat when it was over.

Then, again, at dinner he was less loquacious, and spoke less frequently of his exploits, while he ate almost ravenously, and was more often than not sitting with half-closed eyes, thinking.

But Bell was neither perceptive nor thoughtful, and so she teased him ruthlessly, as she had always done, and hypocritically praised his singing. It was the happiest moment of the whole evening for him when she drew her handkerchief away from her full red lips, and told him that she thought, if anything, his voice was improving. He believed her. He had no cause to doubt her sincerity.

January came on apace, and one bitterly cold afternoon Bell and her mother were driving home from Piccadilly through the gathering gloom of the lamp-lighted streets. They were passing along a side thoroughfare out of Oxford Street.

"Listen, mater; that's funny, isn't it?"

The mother bent her head. From the middle of the road some distance ahead, and drawing nearer, came the wail:

"Ven oder leeps an' oder hearts ——"

"Why, that's—that's——" She raised her hands in horror.

"Good gracious," Bell answered, looking inquiringly at her mother's perplexed face. "It can't be Mr. Mittgar. It can't."

She let down the window and peered out into the road. In the long lean figure, with the rusty black frock-coat buttoned up round his throat, and the straggling beard and gaunt face, she recognised Mr. Mittgar, and sank back in her seat horror-struck.

"To think that he should have the audacity——!" she gasped.

"Who, love? Is it he? Is it really that—that scoundrel, Mr. Mittgar, singing in the streets; and to think that he should partake of our hospitality while participating in this vulgar occupation. The—the villain."

Business had gone from bad to worse. There was nothing for it but to try to make a few honest pence with his voice. It was so good, so full, so pure. He knew that. Miss Bell had often told him. She had often said that he would take the world by storm some day. And yet, the people did not seem to appreciate it much. Perhaps it was too cold for them to open their doors and windows and to throw out coppers as evidence of their recognition of genuine merit.

He might have pawned his dress suit and his white shirt and socks and boots, as he had done the rest of his wardrobe; but in that case he would have been denied the privilege of singing in the drawing-rooms of his friends' houses, where he loved to pose as the lion of the evening.

He was too proud to make known his financial distress to Bell's father or any of his friends. For many a long week he had almost starved, and still he kept his clothes and sang to please Bell. There seemed now no signs of work ever being obtainable; besides, there was no dishonour in showing the British public what real meritorious singing was, even though the concert platform was the kerbstone.

Next day he received a curt letter from Mrs. Davies: he was prohibited to place his foot inside their door again. He did not know the reason—he could only guess; and he was sure that whatever this woman thought, or whatever her husband thought, it was no fault of their daughter's that he was refused admittance to the house. She had always held him in high esteem, and appreciated the natural gift which a good and kind Providence had bestowed upon him.

The receipt of this letter was his death-warrant. No more would his voice resound through the sweet-scented drawing-room, crowded with eager and appreciative faces; no more would he bow his thanks, too overcome with emotion to give expression in words; no more would Miss Bell coax him to sing that dear old song.

It was a hard, bitter world. Unconsciously his thoughts reverted to the old days on the Alps with Gretchen, and, for an hour after he first read that note, he sat with his shaggy head resting on his emaciated arms, lost to the world, and back again in the old home.

When he raised his head, he dropped it again heavily. There was no strength in his body, and his brow got hot and cold rapidly by turns. He staggered to the truckle bed and threw himself on it. He felt that unless matters altered very, very considerably in his favour shortly, he would have to curl up and die.

There was the dress suit. It was of no use now. It would never be worn again by him at all events, and there seemed no reason why he should not pawn it. But, what if he did? What would be the result? It would bring him the wherewithal to exist a few days longer, and then there would be an end of it; he would be in the same position exactly as he was to-day. No, he would keep that intact.

Towards the luncheon hour next noon, Bell Davies received a dirty note from the butler, into whose hands it had been put by a woman at the door.

"Pardon my intrusion, Miss Bell," it ran, in a shaky, small foreign hand, "I am sick very, and it is you who I would care to see if it would please you to come for a short moment. Only for a short moment. Yours humble, Leon Mittgar."

"What is it, child?" demanded Mrs Davies, adjusting her pince-nez.

He staggered to the truckle bed.

"Nothing; nothing, mater." She was sorely tempted to answer this request. Mrs. Davies took it out of her hand and read it with difficulty; then, turning to the man, she commanded him to send the woman away at once, with no reply.

"Insolence! Low vulgar wretch!"

Her dignity was hurt for the time. Bell felt sorry for the poor man for a few moments, and then forgot his existence.

"There ain't no arnser; 'ee tried ter shove me down the bloomin' doorstep, the flunkey did, darn 'im." The dignity of Mrs. Groggins, his landlady, too, was hurt, and folding her arms she contemplated the dying man serenely. "She hated corpses in her house; it wasn't in no wise likely to make her respectable house popular."

When she left the room Mittgar tossed about on his bed. She would come, ah, yes! she would come, would Miss Bell, so good, so appreciative. She had always been his champion when he used to visit the house, and she would never forsake him now, nor refuse to grant this very modest request of his. Modest? Was it modest, after all? Had the note been offensive to her? He grew troubled in spirit at the thought, and it worried him sadly, so that although he wanted to sleep, he could not.

Digitized by Google

What recompense could he make to Miss Bell, if this note had really offended her finer feelings? It was audacious, perhaps, to request her to come and see him as he was, but he had not stopped to think; he would like to have seen her once more.

Then a sudden thought entered that burning brain, and, struggling bravely to his feet, he staggered over to his little table, and sank on the chair in front of it. He must send her some reward for her kindness, some token of his last moments to her, so kind, so sensible. The little ivory châlet that Gretchen had given him had gone, the tiny model of the church at Geneva had gone, the many little treasures that he had stored up for years and years in remembrance of his happier days in that home away over on those lovely Swiss mountains—all had gone, gone for ever.

Next day, Miss Bell Davies received a roll by book post. She opened it. It was a well-fingered and rough-edged copy of "When other lips." On the top right-hand corner were inscribed the words:

"To Miss Bell Davies, from one she loved to hear sing this song,—LEON MITTGAR."

And the landlady declared, when she came in with the doctor in the morning and found him cold beside the dress-suit laid out on the bed, that her slumber had been interrupted during the night by erratic and untuneful singing from that room.

HER REVENGE.

MISERABLE wet day. Time, the year of grace 1783. Scene, an old château in Brittany. The young Vicomte de la Sainte Cour was horribly bored. All the morning through he had lounged in the dim old library, some of whose dusty volumes had not been stirred from their places for nigh a whole generation, and certainly contained no matter sufficiently interesting to the mind of the gay young Parisian noble, fresh from the festivities of the Court of Marie Antoinette and the make-believe rusticity of Le Petit Trianon.

Poor Raoul! he felt himself much to be pitied in this, his self-imposed exile at his aunt's château; but circumstances over which he had no control—i.e., certain pressing and too-clamorous creditors—had necessitated a hasty, not to say somewhat undignified, retreat to the Château de Saint Jean in the heart of Brittany, where he hoped to secure his aunt's assistance in repairing his shattered fortunes.

That she was deeply shocked and offended he knew, but he also knew that the childless old lady dearly loved his handsome scapegrace self, womanlike, perhaps never more so than when she had most cause for anger.

He had arrived at the château the previous evening, and his reception had been anything but cordial, and all this morning he had awaited an audience with his much-offended relative, who had at last sent him word that she desired his presence at dinner at four o'clock.

"Thank Heaven it is almost four!" ejaculated Raoul, as, wearied and bored beyond expression, he wended his way to the apartments of the Marquise, from which she rarely, if ever, stirred.

He reached the ante-chamber of the salon, and glanced at the Dresden clock on a gilt console. Bah! It wanted ten minutes to the hour, and Raoul knew the old lady's rigid notions of etiquette, and felt sure that the sin of arriving too soon for dinner was as great, in her eyes, as that of arriving too late.

Well, there was nothing for it but to wait the prescribed ten minutes and enter the apartment exactly on the stroke of four; so, for the one hundred and twentieth time that day, the Vicomte gazed listlessly out on to the great court of the château, wet and streaming in the never-ceasing rain.

A patter of high-heeled shoes, a rustle of silken skirts, and Raoul turns from his contemplation of the dreary courtyard to encounter surely the daintiest little waiting-maid that ever carried a dish. Her lace cap is perched coquettishly on her soft brown hair, her robe of pink silk is caught back over a petticoat of palest green, short enough to reveal her feet and ankles and her clocked stockings and crimson high-heeled shoes. Her bodice, cut low, after the fashion of the day, displays a neck that, for roundness and whiteness, a Court lady might envy, while, in her hand, she carries a tureen of soup.

But her face! Raoul forgot all else after one glance at it—like a rose in its flower-like tints, and lighted up with a pair of hazel eyes, which, in passing, flash swiftly for a moment at the handsome young Vicomte, of whom all the household is talking.

Raoul is seized with a sudden mad impulse. Quick as thought he springs from the window and places himself before the door of the salon in such a manner as to effectually bar all further progress of the pretty maid.

She stands irresolute; then, glancing timidly at the handsome, mocking face before her, exclaims:

"Will you permit me to pass, monsieur?"

"Not yet, ma belle; it is not often such a vision of loveliness gladdens my eyes. You must stay a moment and talk to me. Tell me how it happens that I, who have been shut up here nigh two days, have never discovered you before."

An angry flush crimsons the girl's fair face, to be succeeded by a sudden gleam of mischief in her eyes, as, repressing the sharp words that rise to her lips, she says again:

"Will you permit me to pass, monsieur? Madame la Marquise is waiting for me."

But he does not quit his position in front of the door, although the little feet begin to drum impatiently, and already the clock is on the stroke of four.

"Madame does not like to be kept waiting," she begins, when Raoul interrupts her.

"Let madame wait," he says; then, seeing a look of genuine distress on the lovely face, he continues, "Come, my fair prisoner, on one condition will I let you pass. Let me but kiss those tempting lips—let me——."

She draws herself up with a stateliness of a duchess.

"Monsieur, you mistake," she begins haughtily; but Raoul's quick ears catch the sound of approaching footsteps.

She can offer no resistance, embarrassed as she is with the tureen, and, before she quite realises the act, the audacious young noble has claimed his toll, and actually kisses her, then, throwing open the door, stands aside, bowing to her deeply as he would to his aunt herself.

One flash of the hazel eyes, and he hears her mutter beneath her breath, "Some day, my fine Vicomte, I will make you pay for this"; and the pretty waiting-maid passed into the Marquise's presence, followed closely by the scapegrace Raoul

Digitized by Google

Needless to say, he wins the old lady's full forgiveness before he has been five minutes at dinner; only once he makes an unlucky remark which almost imperils his hopes.

"Madame, you have a little maid here whose face would have been a model for an artist. Who is she?"

The old lady scrutinises him keenly with dark eyes which age has not robbed of their fire.

"Raoul, remember, if I find you meddling with my maids, pretty or otherwise, you may expect no further grace from me."

Raoul maintains a discreet silence and merely bows in answer to the Marquise's warning, but he mentally ejaculates —"Gad, I hope the little minx will tell no tales."

Evidently "the little minx" did not, for two days later the Vicomte starts again for Paris with ample means to satisfy his creditors and continue his gay life at Court, and, if at first a flower-like face and a pair of flashing hazel eyes haunt his dreams, other fair faces claim his thoughts, and as time goes on, the pretty serving-maid at the old château becomes only a dim memory.

Ten years after. Gone is the gay Court, gone the beautiful queen who presided over its revels, gone all that was bright and gracious; and in its stead reigns a red-capped tyranny, whose motto, indeed, is "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," but whose argument is chiefly guillotine.

Citizen Danton sits in his room busily writing.

A tall, well-made man, with brown hair, unpowdered and brushed carelessly off his forehead, and a lion-like head, he is a refreshing contrast to the dandy, yellow-faced Robespierre and the brutal Marat, his colleagues.

A member of the National Guard enters the room; Danton looks up sharply.

"What is it, citizen?"

"The citizeness Valerie wishes to see you."

"Let the citizeness enter," he says gruffly enough, but bends his head quickly over his writing, that the man may not see the rare pleasure her coming gives him.

A moment after the citizeness enters, and from the cordiality of their greeting it is easy to see that they are old friends.

"To what lucky accident may I ascribe the visit of the adorable citizeness?" he says, in the florid language so much in vogue.

"The adorable citizeness," a lovely woman of seven-and-twenty, who well merits the title of "adorable," shrugs her shoulders and laughs.

"Still as complimentary as ever, citizen. Well, I will not waste your time in unnecessary guessing. I have come to beg a favour."

"Which is granted already, lovely one."

"Take care, citizen—I shall keep you to your word." Then, the careless gaiety disappearing from her mobile features, "You have on your list of 'suspects' the name of one Raoul, sometime Vicomte de la Sainte Cour. You must give him to me."

This latter with a pretty air of command.

Danton's face grows grave. He takes up the list. Yes, there was the name included in to-morrow's list for the guillotine. He glances keenly at the fair petitioner. She catches the glance and understands it perfectly.

"Have no fear, citizen. It is but to repay a long-cherished vengeance of which his death will deprive me, that I beg his life." Danton takes up his pen irresolutely, and Citizeness Valerie's eyes gleam with a quick flash of triumph—she has won. "What would you have me do, citizeness?" "Strike his name from the list and send an order for his release, together with a private note telling at whose intercession he has been released. He will, without doubt, come to thank me to-morrow; and then—ah! then we shall see," and her brilliant hazel eyes flash with an ominous light that bodes ill for the unlucky Vicomte.

Danton smiles grimly as he writes the order and draws the pen through Raoul's name on the list.

"Citizeness, excuse a somewhat worn simile; but you women are uncommonly like cats, and treat us poor men very much as that interesting feline animal treats a mouse. To a man the idea that one's enemy was about to be executed would be ample revenge; but, no, you must have the unfortunate wretch in your power, to tease and worry, to alternately torment and coax until your sense of wrong is satisfied. Excuse the dissertation," he added, handing her the order; "nevertheless, you must acknowledge its truth."

An odd smile curls the lips of the beautiful woman as she rises to make her adieu.

"Citizen, I cannot thank you sufficiently; only know that this morning you have placed in my hands a revenge for which I have waited ten long years. Whether you will admire the manner in which I pursue it is another question; but of this rest assured—of all the many favours you have bestowed on me during the years you have known me, you have conferred no greater than this boon."

A smile, a rustle of silk, and the next moment she is gone, leaving behind her a subtle perfume of roses, which seem strangely out of place in an arch-republican's room, and, glancing down, Danton sees lying on the floor a little lace handkerchief.

He takes it carefully in his great hands—how small and dainty it seems to him—smooths it carefully out, then, looking round, as if he expects to see her return and claim it, he places it with tender care in an inner pocket in the breast of his coat. And, for a moment on his rugged face there shines that wondrous light that "never was on land or sea," for dearer even than she guesses is the Citizeness Valerie to this great man, who holds in his hands the fate of France.

Who is the Citizeness Valerie? The Citizeness Valerie is a beautiful actress, whom all Paris raves about, and whose beauty and sparkling wit draw crowds to the theatre, in spite of the grim terror reigning supreme. No one knows anything about her; no one has ever heard of her until, two years ago, she had risen suddenly on the dramatic horizon, a star of the first magnitude.

The wildest stories are told of her. Some say she is a young aristocrat who has lost all her kindred by the guillotine; others, that she is a true daughter of the people, and has been seen with the women who have sacked Versailles. Be it as it may, however, aristocrat and democrat alike agree in worshipping at her shrine, and over all her power seems illimitable.

Danton, perhaps, can tell more about her than most people; but Danton, when questioned on the subject, is undeniably grim, and Danton, when grim, is a lion to be approached with utmost delicacy and care.

On this very day, when, according to his forecast of events yesterday, Raoul, ci-devant Vicomte de la Saint Cour, should have yielded up his head to the Republic, he is a free man—free to go whither he will. He can hardly credit his good fortune. And where, indeed, should he go but to the woman who, for some unknown reason, is sufficiently interested in him to preserve his head, for the present, on his shoulders.

He has aged considerably since, ten years ago, he sought refuge in the old Château de Saint Jean. Is it only ten? To Raoul it seems nigh a hundred. Somehow, as he walks slowly in the direction of the Citizeness Valerie's house, his thoughts dwell on that visit of ten years ago.

Poor old Marquise!—luckily for her, she died before all these troubles fell so thick upon "La Belle France," and left all her wealth—which was not inconsiderable—to her much-beloved nephew Raoul.

Not much of that wealth remains, he thinks grimly, save the old château in Brittany, which has escaped the general destruction of the châteaux, owing to the pious memory in which the late Marquise de Brillac is still held, high and low, for miles round.

But her nephew dare not claim his own, and he is on his way to thank this woman who has thought fit to save his worthless life. That done, he will raise what money he can by the sale of a few jewels that yet remain to him; then he will take ship to England, there to await the dawning of better times.

His reflections have brought him to the house of the Citizeness Valerie, where he is evidently expected, for no sooner has he given his name than a groom of the chambers, in rich livery, comes forward to conduct him to the salon, where the citizeness will receive him.

Digitized by Google

Raoul gazes curiously on the unmistakable signs of wealth that meet his eye. The costly furniture, the pictures, the rich liveries of the servants; verily, he thinks this actress lives as well as, ten years ago, did a princess of the royal blood.

The servant conducts him to a spacious apartment, furnished with all the extravagance of the period, and informs him that the citizeness will receive him without delay.

Left alone, unconsciously Raoul's thoughts fall back into the train in which they ran during his walk hither. Once more he goes back to that dreary afternoon ten years ago, and before him rises, as many a time it has risen, a lovely flower-like face, and angry, flashing hazel eyes. He puts the vision from him with a bitter laugh. Surely his troubles have turned his brain, that the face of a pretty waiting-maid should haunt him so. Then comes the uneasy doubt that has often perplexed him before. What if, after all, she was no serving-maid, but one of his own rank? Bah! it all happened ten years ago, and a kiss is no such crime after all.

The door opens and he goes forward to meet the citizeness, who enters. Clad in a pale pink gown of some soft, clinging material, she looks her loveliest to-day; but Raoul starts back, for surely those hazel eyes and that soft brown hair are the same which have so often haunted his dreams. The roundness of the girlish face, and the slenderness of the girlish figure are gone; but, save that her beauty has blossomed into a glorious maturity, there stands before him the little maid of the château.

She sees his start, and smiles.

"I fear I have disturbed your meditations, monsieur."

She drops the Republican "citizen" in speaking to this aristocrat.

Heavens, the very voice! Raoul, bewildered beyond expression involuntarily draws his hand across his eyes as though to convince himself of his wakefulness. Then his ever ready wit comes to his assistance.

"I have been so long exiled in La Vendée that the glory of the goddess of Paris somewhat dazzles me," he says, bowing low over the white hand she holds out to him.

She flushes, but whether in pleasure or anger he cannot tell.

"Madame, let me convey to you my sincerest thanks for having deigned to intercede for my worthless life," continues Raoul, half unconscious, but holding the little white hand in his own, browned and hardened by sun and exposure.

She draws it away quickly, and her face pales and crimsons again with some sudden emotion.

"The poor actress, Valerie, should deem herself too highly honoured if she be in any way instrumental in saving the life of a Sainte Cour," she begins bitterly, then stops suddenly, as she meets the eyes of the Vicomte fixed reproachfully on her.

"Nay, madame, do not undervalue your own gift; what you have done for me to-day has rendered me your slave for ever."

A gleam of the old merriment flashes in Valerie's eyes; quick as thought she decides how to act.

"No more thanks, monsieur; I take you at your word, and enrol you as 'my slave for ever.' Is it not so?"

"No fair mistress owned a more willing slave," he responds eagerly, for this woman has set his heart beating and his pulse dancing as no one has done before, not even in the old far-away days of Versailles.

"One boon, only, I crave," he continues; "that is, the name of the fair lady I serve?"

For an instant a shade passes over the face of the actress; but only for an instant. With a gay laugh she says:

"I am the Citizeness Valerie to all now; once, long ago, I was——." Then, noting his eager anxiety, she interrupts herself and cries gaily, "Come, monsieur, I want your help in a little comedy I am rehearsing; perhaps, after that is given, I will tell you who I was once," and she adds, in a lower tone, as if addressing herself, "if you will not already have remembered it."

"I am your slave in everything," says Raoul, thinking what a mercurial woman this actress is—so rapid, and, withal, so charming, are her transitions from grave to gay.

She laughs an odd little laugh, which has a ring of mockery in its tones.

"The scene of the comedy is laid in an old château. The time, ten years ago. The dramatis personæ—well, for convenience sake, we will say you and I."

Raoul feels his heart beat with a strange sense of expectancy.

"You will have no need to change your character," she goes on. "You are a young noble on a short visit to the château, and bored to death with dulness. I—well, I am a waiting-maid—or, perhaps I should say, a young friend of the old marquise (did I tell you the chateau belonged to an old marquise?), who, out of sheer ennui, masqueraded as her waiting-maid. Her name—let us say her name is Valerie le Clère—though, perhaps, the name makes no great difference. Let us suppose this corner of the room to be the ante-chamber to madame's salon. Enter the young noble."

She speaks quickly, trembling with excitement, and Raoul catches the fever of her words, for back from the dim memories of long ago comes this odd comedy, the first act of which was played out ten years ago.

"Yes," he says, "I know this scene—enter myself, and shortly afterward, enter the so-called waiting-maid, with a tureen in her hand—so, madame," catching up a piece of porcelain from a neighbouring table and placing it in Valerie's hands.

Then, throwing himself before the door with all his old easy grace, he looks at her with the fire of a fierce, new-awakened love burning in his eyes.

Slowly a ripple of laughter breaks from her as she raises her hazel eyes to his brown ones.

"Well, monsieur, as you know this comedy so well, what then?"

What does Raoul see in those changeful depths, that, heedless of the delicate porcelain she holds, he springs forward and catches her in his arms, forgetful of all that has passed in these ten years, kissing her, not once, but again and again?

Valerie does not seem displeased at such a proceeding, nor does she seek to free herself from the prison of his strong embrace; only, a few minutes afterwards, she says:

"Ah! M. le Vicomte la Sainte Cour, ten years ago I told you I would be revenged. I've made your noble self fall in love with the actress, the Citizeness Valerie. I have given you 'tit for tat.'"

For answer, he holds the slender figure closer in his arms, and gazes with untold love at the lovely, laughing face upturned to his.

"You have made me fall in love with the noblest woman this earth possesses—a woman who knows the highest manner of revenging herself," he says passionately; and Valerie is silent, for at last her vengeance is complete.

In the gallery of the old Château de Sainte Jean hangs the portrait of Valerie, Vicomtess de la Sainte Cour, and beneath it, on a velvet bracket, is a quaint china tureen, in white and gold porcelain. Strangers often wonder what connection there is between the porcelain and the picture, but their curiosity is seldom, if ever, rewarded. The portrait was painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds, one of the latest and best, during the stay of the Vicomte and his wife in England, which lasted from 1793 until after the Restoration in 1815.

FIRST ISSUE of PEARSON'S LIBRARY

A Complete Novel,

ENTITLED—

A Girl Without a Name.

NOW ON SALE.

PRICE SIXPENCE. 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

Digitized by Google

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault, the leading spirit of the Anarchist "Autonomie Group No. 7," meets his colleagues in a club near the Caledonian Road on the eve of President Carnot's assassination. He shoots a traitor who has almost betrayed the Group and so saved Carnot's life. Then he tells them that he is about to emigrate with a society of Socialists, one of whom, Frederick Austen, a wealthy engineer who has been converted to Socialism, takes out with him a working model of an aerial vessel. This air-ship Renault determines to steal when complete, and use for the purpose of bringing about an Anarchist reign of terror. Meanwhile, Franz Hartog is to steal a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer, which is to be built at Elbing for the Russian Government, and, with her, to levy blackmail on the Atlantic, and so raise funds to build an Anarchist aerial fleet.

On Christmas Day, 1898, the Calypso, a steam yacht belonging to Sir Harry Milton, sights an island in the South Pacific, from which an electric launch, the Mermaid, puts off and tows the yacht in. Frank Markham, in command of the launch, tells Sir Harry, with whom are travelling his sister, Violet, and Herbert Wyndham, a lieutenant in the British Navy, on sick leave, that the island is Utopia, a Socialist colony, founded some three years before by emigrants from England. On the island Sir Harry finds Frederick Austen, an old friend of his father's, who introduces the visitors to Edward Adams and Max Renault and the rest of the Utopians, and after lunch tells them the story of Utopia. Later on, Lieutenant Wyndham describes the outrages committed by the vessel Hartog has stolen from Elbing,—on the Atlantic, and Mr. Austen vows that if no one else can sink the Destroyer the Utopians will. Wyndham inspects the Nautilus, which he finds to be a novel but most formidable craft, and on board of which he offers to serve for the purpose of hunting down the pirate Destroyer. The offer is accepted, and late that night, when the Lieutenant and Sir Harry are taking a stroll upon the hills, they are astounded by the apparition of an air-ship soaring across the mountains in the interior of the island.

CHAPTER VII.

A Very Serious Matter.

As may well be imagined, there was very little sleep that night for either Sir Harry or the Lieutenant. All the way home they discussed the startling and terrible discovery which, as it were, had been forced upon them during their stroll.

Sir Harry looked upon it chiefly in its more romantic and marvellous aspect. To him the mysterious craft that they had seen flying so swiftly and so gracefully through the gloom of the midnight was a triumph of art and science which commanded his wonder and admiration, rather than excited his apprehension; but to Wyndham's disciplined and practical mind the fact that the Utopians possessed a navigable air-ship assumed both darker and larger proportions than it did in the eyes of his civilian friend.

They were abroad again before sunrise, after two or three hours of vain attempt to sleep. Violet and her maid, who was terribly scandalised at the picturesquely airy costumes of the Utopian girls, were sleeping down in the settlement as Dora Merton's guests, and so the two friends had still an hour or so in which to once more discuss their discovery before they were obliged to finally make up their minds as to what course they were to pursue.

Sir Harry was rather inclined to get the Calypso repaired as quickly as possible, find an excuse for not joining in the pursuit of the Destroyer, and making the best of their way over to England, leaving the Utopians to their own devices, while he and Wyndham set to work with the assistance of the best experts that money could engage or ambition inspire, to construct a similar air-ship to the one that they had seen speeding over the hills of Utopia.

"Maxim had at last perfected his aeroplane."*

"What these people have done we can do," he said, when he had explained his project to Wyndham. "We have more money, and we surely ought to be able to command higher skill. Added to that, we shall start with the knowledge that the thing is really possible, since we have actually seen the vessel in the air. It will no longer be trying simply to see whether the problem can be solved, but to solve it for ourselves, knowing that it can be done. Then, again—oh, confound it, I forgot that!"

* The above illustration is drawn from a photograph given by Mr. Maxim to the Author, who believes it to be the only absolutely correct picture published of the fameus aeroplane as it will appear in full flight.

Digitized by Google

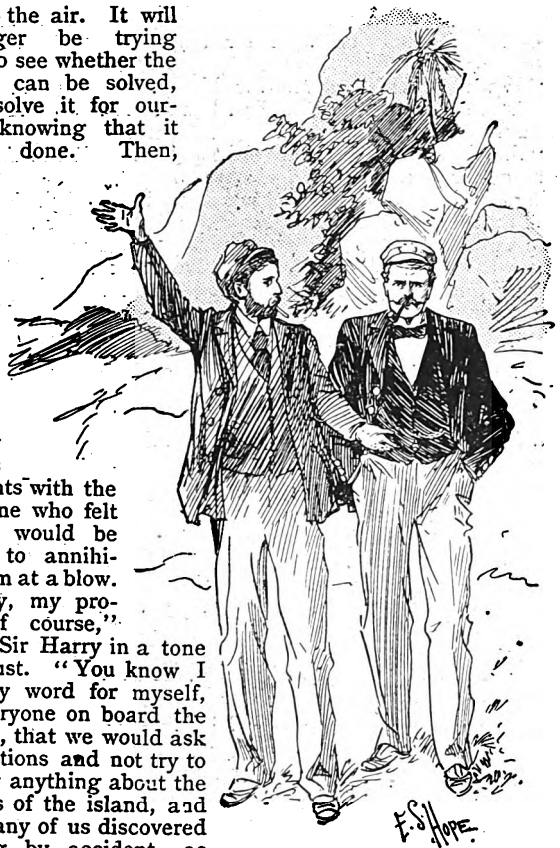
"Forgot what?" asked Wyndham, who had been listening to his arguments with the air of one who felt that he would be obliged to annihilate them at a blow.



"Where would the fleet be?"

"Why, my promise, of course," replied Sir Harry in a tone of disgust. "You know I gave my word for myself, and everyone on board the Calypso, that we would ask no questions and not try to discover anything about the defences of the island, and that if any of us discovered anything by accident, as you and I did last night, we would make no use of it either here or in England, and that when we got home we would tell nothing more about Utopia than the bare story of its existence."

"My dear fellow," said the Lieutenant reflectively, "you needn't allow your conscience to trouble you in the slightest on that score. You have given your word and of course you will keep it, and so shall I, just as though I had given my own. But even if you had not given it you would only produce a sensational panic by telling in England what we happened to learn last night.

"The fact of knowing that an air-ship exists would not help us in the slightest in building one for ourselves. If we had accidentally discovered the motive-power as well as the air-ship, then we should have a rather delicate problem in morals and expediency to solve. We should have to balance the keeping of a promise against the taking of the empire of the world, for, mind you, there is no burking the fact that the command of the air means, virtually, the control of the world.

"But without a knowledge of the motive-power we should just begin where everybody else has done, only with the tantalising knowledge that, while we were groping about in the dark, someone else was going ahead and building ship after ship, until they had a fleet that would make them strong enough to dictate terms of submission to the whole human race."

"Oh, come now, old man!" expostulated Sir Harry, somewhat aghast at this terrific prospect, "you can't mean all that. Really, I can't understand a sober, practical fellow like yourself talking in such a strain as that. Why, it would mean nothing less than the enslaving of humanity!"

"Goodness knows, I never was more serious in my life," replied Wyndham in a grave, slow tone. "I daresay you have never thought out seriously what the practical, workable solution of this problem of the navigation of the air really means, but I have, simply because it is part of my business, as an officer of the Navy, to take these possible developments into account, and try and realise the actual effect of them on warfare, and therefore, of course, on the relative powers of empires and states, and I can assure you, on the strength of some years' study and thought, that no other development of the art of war has brought the world face to face with such terrific possibilities as our discovery of last night tells us that humanity is now confronted with."

"What! not even the invention of gunpowder or steam navigation?" objected Sir Harry.

"My dear fellow, gunpowder and steam are not fit to be mentioned in the same breath with this, simply because it was impossible to keep the secret of them from the whole civilised world when the discoveries had once taken practical shape. With aërial navigation it is a very different business.

"You know as well as I do that, for the last hundred years and more, the brightest mechanical intellects in the world have been struggling with this problem and struggling unsuccessfully. Still, it has been solved. It's no good for you and me to attempt to deny that, and solved here in this out of the way, practically unknown part of the world. I remember hearing some months ago that Maxim had at last perfected his aeroplane; but even if that is true, it makes no difference to the facts. A simple air-ship like that one we saw could smash up any number of aeroplanes just like so many kites.

"Now," continued the Lieutenant, decreasing his pace as he became more and more didactic, "let me put the matter into a more concrete form. Here, in Utopia, is a small, self-contained colony of, say, a thousand men and women, with a proportionate number of children. They inhabit an island far out of the track of commerce, at any rate for the present, almost impregnable to any possible assault by sea, and, as far as we know, actually unknown to the maritime nations of the world.

"These people, openly despising all law and government, belonging to no nationality, voluntary outcasts, or perhaps, I ought to say, exiles from the pale of Society, possess one or more mechanical geniuses who have given them means of offence and defence against which even the whole naval strength of Britain, if it could be concentrated here on this spot, would contend in vain.

"Yes, I know that sounds a trifle extravagant, but wait a minute, and I'll make my case out. In the first place, take that Nautilus that we saw yesterday. It's no good hoping that she won't do what they expect her to do, because it would be absurd to believe that people who can build an air-ship to travel as fast as the one that we saw last night couldn't build a sea-going cruiser to travel forty knots an hour, and able to ram the biggest battle-ship we have, practically with impunity, to say nothing of her torpedo batteries, when she gets them.

"I saw quite enough of her to be convinced that her over-water platform and conning-tower might be knocked into smithereens without in the slightest hurting the ship herself. She would still get her ram home, and that means death and destruction to anything that floats. Then, again, no ship that floats could get within striking distance of her unless she chose. That's bad enough, you'll admit, but given the Nautilus in the water, and half-a-dozen of those air-ships cruising about a thousand feet over the mastheads of a hostile fleet, where would the fleet be?"

"I'll be hanged if I'd like to be on board any of the ships, now that I come to think of it," said Sir Harry seriously.

"Neither should I," said the Lieutenant, "for they would simply sink you in detail, and you could no more hit back than a boy with a catapult could reply effectively to a man armed with a magazine rifle on a cliff a thousand feet above him. That's the situation. You can't help being hit, and you can't strike back.

"And now let us go a step further. If these people can build one air-ship, they can build a dozen, a score, a hundred; and just try and imagine to yourself the position of London, or Paris, or New York with a hundred air-ships loaded up with explosives, some frightful thing, for instance, like this motor-fuel that they're going to drive the Nautilus with. Do you think they could resist? Not a bit of it! They would be absolutely helpless."

Digitized by Google

"I don't quite see that," objected Sir Harry, with the air of a man driven back to his last line of defence; "there are such things as machine-guns and quick-firing cannon, which could be given plenty of elevation to catch them on the wing and bring them down like crippled partridges."

"Crippled partridges, my dear fellow," replied Wyndham drily, "are a very different kind of bird to air-ships that can travel at the speed we saw that one travel at last night. Added to that, partridges don't fly three or four thousand feet above the surface of the earth. At three thousand feet, or a thousand yards, you could no more hit one of those things than you could bring down an eagle in full flight with a bullet, and even if you could, what would be the result?

"You would simply bring down a ship-load of explosives about your ears, and get in ten seconds the concentrated effect of a couple of hours' bombardment. I tell you, either for a fleet or a city, there would be nothing for it but surrender or destruction if once a hostile squadron of air-ships got above it, as there would be nothing to prevent their doing. No fortifications would stop them, and a fortress would be as helpless as a farmyard. In a word, as I said before, those who command the air command the world, and that these Utopians practically do."

"Humph!" said Sir Harry, thrusting one hand deep into his trouser pocket, and with the other giving a pull to his moustache, "that's a pleasant sort of prospect, and the more I think of it the harder your arguments seem to be to answer. What the deuce would happen if our good friends the Utopians took it into their heads to build an aërial fleet and run amok generally?"

"Or, worse than that," said Wyndham, taking him by the arm, "what if these scoundrels who are making hay on the Atlantic in the Destroyer were to get hold of even this one air-ship that we know to be in existence, what then?"

"Oh, hang it, man, don't talk like that!" said Sir Harry, stopping short and pushing his cap back from his brow, on which Wyndham could distinctly see the beads of perspiration standing out, "the prospect's altogether too horrible to think about. Great heavens! Just imagine those miscreants holding up the Bank of England, and sending down a message, to say that if so many millions were not laid out for them in the middle of Salisbury Plain, within twenty-four hours, they'd come back and bombard the City at their leisure. Phew! It gives one a headache to think of it. But still, it's no use thinking, the question is, what are we to do?"

Wyndham let go Sir Harry's arm, thrust his hands deep into his trouser pockets, after the manner of Englishmen confronted with a knotty problem, and with down-bent head took several slow, deliberate strides in silence. Then he stopped abruptly, faced half-round towards Sir Harry, and said, in a tone his friend had never heard him use before:

"Look here, Milton, this is a serious matter, as I think I've shown you, and what makes it more serious, as far as I'm concerned, is that promise you gave before we came in here. First and foremost I'm an officer of the British Navy, and my allegiance to the Queen and my duty to the Service plainly demands that the knowledge I possess now shall not be kept to myself.

"More than that, I ought to add to it. I ought to find out something more. Even at the risk of my life I ought to attempt to find out where this air-ship is hidden during the day, to get on board her if possible, to learn everything I can about her, and not even to stop short at that, to capture her, if possible—by main force if necessary—and take her to England. On the other hand——"

"You are a gentleman," said Sir Harry, almost curtly, "and a man of honour, therefore you are neither a spy nor a thief to abuse the confidence of those who have made us their guests, or to steal their goods, even if the empire of the world does depend on their possession. No, Wyndham, that won't do. Patriotism is all very well to a certain extent, but a spy may be perfectly patriotic and yet you know very well that you would hang or shoot him the moment you got hold of him, and very properly too."

"Of course I should," said Wyndham, "and I should deserve just the same fate if I did what I said. Don't be afraid for me, old man. I'm not going to turn either spy or thief, but I'll tell you what I am going to do, with your permission."

"What's that?" asked Sir Harry. "You know I'm agreeable to anything a gentleman can do under the circumstances."

"Simply this I'm going to stop here until the Nautilus is ready for sea, and keep my eyes open in the meanwhile on things in general, and Mr. Max Renault in particular. I've seen that fellow somewhere before, and not under very creditable circumstances, but for the life of me I can't tell where it was. It was some time before I had that touch of fever in Africa, and I suppose that's wiped it out. However, that doesn't matter now. If the Calypso sails before the Nautilus and you go straight home to England, as I suppose you will, you shall take a letter from me to the Admiralty containing my resignation of my commission."

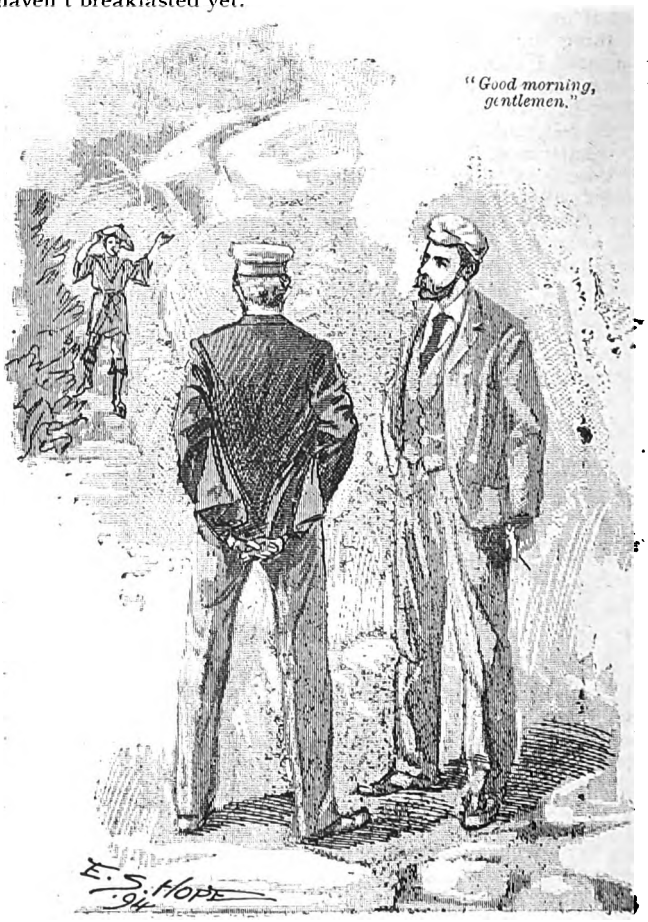
"What!" exclaimed Sir Harry, "surely you don't mean that?"

"Yes, I do," said Wyndham; "my mind is quite made up on that point. I must have a free hand in what I am going to do. I am going to join the Utopians, if they'll have me, and accept the berth they offered me on board the Nautilus. I couldn't do that if I remained in the Navy. There's no reason why I shouldn't be, at any rate, Navigating Lieutenant of her, then I'll take her home, get her armament on board, and hunt these piratical Anarchists off the face of the sea to begin with.

"By that time, I shall hope to be sufficiently deserving of the confidence of my fellow Utopians to be let into the secret of the air-ship, and then——"

"Hush!" whispered Sir Harry; "you are talking too loud. I believe I heard something move behind those bushes."

"Good morning, gentlemen! You are early abroad. I hope it isn't because you have slept badly. I presume you haven't breakfasted yet."



Digitized by Google

It was Renault who spoke. Turning round the corner of a clump of acacias, about twenty yards in front of them, he sauntered towards them, his hands in his pockets and a cigar between his teeth. Whether he had heard Wyndham's words or not it was impossible to guess; so far as any outward sign went, he had not. His manner was as frank and cordial as possible, and his greeting betrayed not the slightest sign of suspicion.

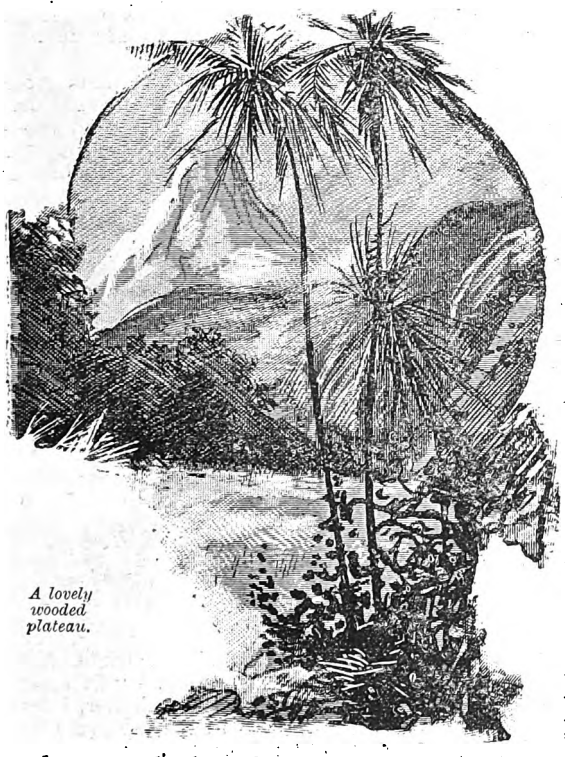
"I was just going down to the lagoon for a swim," he continued, "and I dare say you are looking for the same thing, so if you like to come with me I'll show you where the male Utopians take their morning dip. This way; the girls' bathing place is on the other side of that bluff."

So saying, he led the way round an abrupt turn in the pathway down towards the shore, followed by Sir Harry and Wyndham, who accepted his invitation as the best and readiest thing to do under the circumstances.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Picnic on Mount Plato.

A week had passed since the conversation just narrated, and during that time the repairing and refitting of the Calypso had made good progress and the work on the Nautilus had been prosecuted with such enthusiastic vigour—relays of those who were destined to be her crew literally working day and night at their tasks—that there was every prospect of its being possible to launch her within another fortnight.



A lovely wooded plateau.

In addition to this, the visitors to Utopia had been made so completely at home by the members of the Colony, and had so rapidly and so insensibly got on terms of the closest friendship with them, that they already began to look forward with undisguised regret to the time when circumstances would make it necessary for them to say good-bye. Guests and hosts mingled in the most unreserved intercourse and the more the former saw of the latter and their delightfully simple and natural institutions and mode of life, the more firmly they became convinced that they had by no means done an unwise thing in forsaking the complications and multifarious worries of what is, more in courtesy than in truth, called civilisation, for a life which seemed to give all the good that the world had to offer, with none of the discount of over or under-living taken off.

For obvious reasons, the crew of the Calypso were not accorded all these privileges, as it was rightly taken for granted that their intellectual and moral education had hardly progressed far enough to permit of their even temporary admission to a society that owned no laws save individual choice, and no customs save those established by the unrestrained friendliness of the people, whose perfect confidence in each other enabled them to do without the ordinary restraints of conventionality.

They were accommodated with comfortable quarters near the dockyard, convenient for going and coming to and from the work that they had to do on board the yacht, and they were supplied with everything in the way of comfort and luxuries that the island could afford, but sea discipline was strictly maintained by Sir Harry and his officers, and they were given to understand that the same rules which forbade their going into the saloon of the yacht at sea prevented their taking up quarters in the settlement, or mixing with the colonists as Sir Harry and their officers did.

It is true that one or two grumblers among them, when they got a notion of the principles of social equality on which the colony was founded, objected rather strongly to this hard and fast line being drawn, but the majority of them, with the natural obedience of good sailors to order and discipline, tacitly admitted that the yacht had been brought into harbour under certain conditions, and saw that they had not the slightest right to abuse the hospitality that was accorded to them, by infringing the terms that their employer had accepted.

Their agreement was made all the more easy by the fact that Sir Harry had promised everyone double wages during the time that they were in the island, on the condition of order being strictly maintained, and as this would have been forfeited by a single outbreak of bad manners, public opinion very soon proved too strong for the grumblers.

Nothing more had been seen of the mysterious air-ship, and, of course, Sir Harry and the Lieutenant had kept their own counsel strictly. Night after night they had taken their stroll from their bungalow, which lay nearly a mile from the centre of the settlement up towards the foot-hills, but their expectations, if they had any, were disappointed. Wherever the wonderful cruiser of the air was, she was carefully hidden from sight, and as not the slightest restraint was put upon their movements about the island, they were forced to conclude that those who were in the secret had every confidence in the security of the hiding-place.

Day after day came and went all too swiftly for the liking of the visitors, in a round of busy work and healthy, innocent enjoyment. By the time the week had passed, such good progress had been made with the work that, in accordance with the custom of Utopia, it was decided to spend New Year's Day, 1899, as a general holiday.

The dockyard was closed for twenty-four hours; Markham and half-a-dozen of his friends undertook to provide for the entertainment of the crew of the yacht, under the ordering eye of Mr. Topline; and Adams and Mr. Austen, acting on a suggestion which originated with Dora, who appeared to have, in one sense, quite carried out her promise of making Violet a sister for the period of her visit, organised a picnic of exploration to the slopes of Mount Plato.

There were about a score of sturdy Shetland ponies and as many sleek, well-fed donkeys on the island, which were both useful and properly-respected members of the community, and half-a-dozen of each of them were pressed into the service of the expedition to carry the eatables and drinkables, and to be ready, if necessary, for the use of any of the ladies—as Wyndham and Sir Harry felt bound to persist in calling them, in defiance of Utopian custom—in case, as was not very likely, they were overtaken by fatigue on the way.

A start was made just as the cone of Mount Plato was beginning to glow in the first beams of the rising sun, and the spot selected for the camping ground—a lovely, wooded plateau 2,000 feet above the sea and some seven miles from the Settlement—was reached in less than a couple of hours. Here they sat down to a second breakfast in which some choice champagne from the stores of the Calypso played a pleasantly conspicuous part, and then the party split up automatically into groups in accordance with individual choices and varying projects.

Sir Harry and the Lieutenant had come out with the intention of climbing the cone of Mount Plato as the principal object of the day's excursion, and as this would take nearly the whole day, allowing for dinner and the necessary siesta after it, a separate party was formed for the expedition consisting of the visitors, Dora Merton, Lucy Summers, and Adams, who had volunteered to act as guide and general cicerone. A paniered donkey carried the wherewithal for dinner in the crater, and a pony was laden with a small tent and the necessary fittings to provide shelter in case the mountain was visited by one of the sudden storms which sometimes swept across its upper heights.

Digitized by Google

It was not very long before the party, small as it was, split up into three divisions, which made their way in somewhat extended order along the steep, narrow hill-paths which led to the summits. Adams and Lucy, for reasons best known to themselves, formed the first of these, and Sir Harry and Dora the last.

It may also be recorded that there was an interval of nearly a hundred yards between each division, an arrangement which seemed perfectly satisfactory to everybody, though, if the truth must be told, Adams would fain have changed places with Sir Harry for, in the depths of his serious, practical soul, there lurked a not very well-based hope that some day this brown-eyed beauty, who so far had contented herself with setting hearts aflame with the carelessness of a delightful unconsciousness, might accept the homage of the man whom everyone tacitly accepted as the moving spirit and virtual leader of the Utopians.

Interesting as the conversation en route undoubtedly was to the young baronet, it would have been even more so had it been possible for him to have asked Dora point-blank, as he would dearly have liked to have done, whether or not she knew of the existence of the air-ship, and, if yes, how much she knew or would tell about it.

He could hardly bring himself to believe that this lovely, innocent, light-hearted girl—for in just such terms did his thought describe her to him during that momentous walk—could be burdened with the possession of a secret on which the peace and security of the world might well one day depend; and yet that such actually was the case he was destined to learn before many minutes had passed. A sharp turn in the path brought them suddenly in view of a second truncated cone, about five hundred feet lower than that of Mount Plato, and lying as nearly as he could guess some two miles to the eastward of it, separated from it by a valley so deep as to give it the appearance of a distinct mountain.

"I didn't know Utopia boasted two volcanoes," he said, stopping and looking round over the magnificent panorama which now lay at their feet. "What do you call that second one yonder?"

"That," said Dora, glancing half shyly up at him with a quick flush that seemed in curious contrast with the simplicity of the question he had asked, "that is what I believe they call a secondary crater to Mount Plato, and—well, I'm afraid that's all I am at liberty to tell you about it. If I invent a suitable name for it and call it, for present purposes, Mount Mystery, you will understand me, won't you?"

"Of course I shall," replied Sir Harry, flushing in his turn, and slightly inclining his head as though in apology; "and I hope that you will understand that I trenched upon the forbidden ground quite unintentionally."

"There can be no question of that," she said with a smile, that awoke in him an unreasoning, and yet not altogether unnatural, desire to embrace the principles of the Utopians on the spot, if he could only embrace her with them, and abjure home, country, and capitalism thenceforth and for ever, for the sake of the only pair of bright eyes that had ever taught him what the magic and mystery of sex really meant.

They were walking on again now, for somehow Sir Harry had no desire that his sister and Wyndham should overtake them too closely, and by way of shifting the conversation from dangerous ground, he said, after a little interval of silence:

"Do you know, Miss Dora, I am rapidly coming to the belief that you Utopians have really chosen the better part of life, by leaving the world and all its bothers, and coming out to this paradise of yours to live, as I suppose men and women really were intended to live and would have lived, if the curse of Eden had never been laid upon them."

"Of course we have," she replied in a tone which showed that, to her at least, there could be no question about it. "I believe the curse of Eden, in its modern form, at any rate, is simply the spirit of greediness and vain-glory which makes every man want to have more and be something grander than his neighbour. Of course, Nature did not make all men and women equal. We are not by any means equal here even. Naturally, some of us are cleverer, stronger, or more—more——"

"Beautiful, for instance."

There was no mistaking the look that accompanied Sir Harry's completion of her speech, and she didn't pretend to do so. She looked him frankly in the eyes, and only a deepening of the colour on her pretty cheeks told him that she had taken his interruption as literally as he had intended it to be taken.

"Yes, Sir Harry, more beautiful, if you like to put it so. It would be absurd to expect it, and that is why we haven't attempted to bring any of the silly theories of what they call Socialism in England, out here with us. We simply believe it to be possible for people to live healthy, natural lives, and develop themselves physically and mentally as far as their powers go, without troubling their heads about all the foolish complications of Society, with its different ranks and degrees of wealth and poverty.

"Still, I must say I am rather surprised at you finding our life here better than the one at home. I always thought that for a man like yourself, rich, titled, young, and—well, yes—good-looking, there's your compliment back for you—the social life of England made earth as nearly Paradise as possible."

She looked him frankly in the eyes.

"Not always," replied Sir Harry, laughing outright at the direct frankness of her unconventional speech. "Of course, fellows like myself have a very good time of it, better, I daresay, than most of us deserve; but still I must say that I have found something in Utopia that I not only never found anywhere else, but never even thought of before. I can't exactly say what it is, because it's so strange to me, and yet it seems something better than anything that either money or position could buy at home."

"Perhaps it's just a healthy atmosphere, social as well as physical," she suggested. "You know we can breathe freely here; and we live, we don't play at it, or pretend to be something else than we really are, as I used to think people did when I lived in England."

"I daresay that's it," replied Sir Harry, looking at her with admiring conviction as he spoke, "only you put it more concretely than I thought it. I verily believe you will end by persuading us all to become Utopians before the Calypso is ready for sea again. As for Violet, you seem to have put her quite out of conceit with the old order of things already. I shouldn't be at all surprised to see her turn out, some fine morning, in that delightfully picturesque costume of yours."

"Ah, wouldn't she look nice in it?" said Dora, with an added sparkle in her eyes at the very thought of such a conversion. "That's all that's wanted to make her quite the prettiest girl on the island."

Digitized by Google

"Save one," retorted Sir Harry, "but then, of course, you speak unselfishly."

"I'm afraid you've brought at least one of the bad habits of fashionable Society with you," replied Dora demurely, but yet flushing rosy red again, not altogether with displeasure. "But suppose we walk a little faster. There is Mr. Adams beckoning to us. They're waiting to show you the way into the crater."

It will not be difficult to surmise, from the tone of this conversation that the young Lord of Seaton Abbey was in a fair way of meeting his fate in the far-away spot to which the Fates and his disabled yacht had brought him. What the course of his future fortune might have been, if what, on his part at least was something more than a chance flirtation, had been allowed to pursue its course in peace, can never be known, for only a few hours after they were walking, laughing and chatting thus up the mountain side, there fell, like a bolt from the blue, a swift and sudden calamity upon the little community of Utopia, which woke it with awful suddenness and violence from its dream of Paradise on earth.

The party dined together in the crater of Mount Plato, and then, as before, separated into pairs which seemed to prefer the amusement of independent exploration. Shortly before five, Adams hailed Sir Harry, and said that it was high time for them to set about returning to the plateau, if they didn't want to be left behind. Sir Harry agreed, and promptly sent forth a lusty "Halloo," which echoed round the walls of the crater, as a signal to Wyndham and Violet to join them.

There was no answer. They halloed again, this time in chorus, and only the echoes replied. Then on consultation, they learned that none of them had seen the missing pair all the afternoon. Fearing that they might have strayed away and got lost, they made a rapid exploration of the crater, and then, not finding them there, went out on to the mountain side, and continued their search, Adams and Sir Harry still hallooing as they went.

They searched for an hour without success, and then, when the four met once more at the entrance to the crater, as the sun was beginning to sink behind the opposite western wall, Adams said, "It's no use. They must have gone back to the others for some reason, and yet—I can't understand why they should have done so. Why, what's the matter, Sir Harry? Are you ill?"

"Look! Look!" cried Sir Harry, whose ruddy, bronzed face had suddenly turned to an almost ashen colour. He grasped him by the arm as he spoke, and turned him half round, pointing with his other hand to the secondary cone which Dora had rightly named the Mount Mystery. Instantly all eyes were fixed in a silent stare of amazement and horror on the round ragged hole that marked the smaller crater.

Out of the black depths, they saw, soaring swiftly and vertically upwards, the strange shape of the mysterious air-ship which Sir Harry and the Lieutenant had seen crossing the hills a week before. They thought they made out something white moving to and fro on its deck. It seemed to sway violently about for a moment or two, and then pitch headlong out of sight into the black gulf beneath. The next moment the air-ship leapt several hundred feet up into the air, and then in a long sweeping upward curve, darted away out over the sea to the north-westward.

(To be continued next week.)

WE MEET, BOW, SMILE, PASS.

I HAD been living since my birth, fifty-five years ago, in an old-fashioned house left to me by my father. It contained several apartments, the best of them rented to the family of an old schoolfellow of mine, who had seen some sad days.

A financial crisis had impoverished him, and made it necessary for him to look for less expensive quarters. Being a lonely bachelor, and feeling at home in his family, I invented some excuse for lowering the rent, and thus I kept my friend with me.

His wife and daughter seemed overwhelmed with my kindness, showed great feeling, and I had many invitations to take dinner with them. Who would not have been charmed with so much attention from two beautiful ladies?

My own apartments were on the third floor. I had cut off two rooms from them, which were rented to two sisters. One was a forewoman in a large establishment, the other a weak, gentle girl, who sewed at home, as I judged from seeing her at her window, always with a needle in her hand.

One day she was gone, but I cared nothing about them. The rent was paid promptly, and I had never seen much of them.

New Year's Day was drawing near, and, according to my usual custom, I wandered from shop to shop in search of something original and costly for my little friend, my school-friend's daughter. Little? Why, now she was a young lady, nineteen years old. Next month she would make her début, and I must find some pretty jewel to heighten her beauty.

I know she is rather vain and superficial, but all young ladies of her age are more or less vain—and I try to find some excuse for her. The mother, a Society woman, has had very little time to educate the heart of the daughter.

Time will help, I think, as I stop here and there to admire the exquisite gems displayed in the windows to tempt the buyers. Finally, I see just what I want—a ring of rubies and diamonds. I remember how the girl has talked about this very ring with a longing sigh. How could I have overlooked the plain hint that child has given me?

I buy the ring with a childish joy, and have stowed it carefully in my pocket. I walk out of the shop to find myself face to face with the mother and daughter, who, with an enchanting smile and friendly salute, hurry on their way.

I feel like a scholar caught by his teacher with a cigarette in his mouth, and I actually put my hand in my pocket to hide more effectually the surprise it contains.

I wander leisurely home to find the wife of my hall-porter in an excited state.

"Oh, sir, what shall we do?" she says. "The girl on the third floor is very ill, and the doctor has just left saying that she will not probably live another hour."

"She must be taken to the hospital," I answer in a very positive tone. "See to it at once."

I walk upstairs feeling in a certain measure sorry for the poor girl. But I soon forget her. She is only a stranger, and, no doubt, better dead than suffering, and the hospital is a very good place, so I have heard.

I now remember my purchase, and, admiring it again in its velvet case, I lock it in my closet to wait for the happy New Year's day.

Lighting a cigarette, I sit at my window, dreaming of days gone by, when I had thought of a plain gold ring to adorn a dear little white hand. I was only a student then, and full of enthusiasm. My father's objection cooled my warm heart, and I soon became an inveterate bachelor, and a very selfish man, with only my own pleasure to consider, and no one to care for. Some men are far less fortunate.

And so I sit and forget even time. In a week and a half it will be the New Year. I am invited to my friend's for the Christmas dinner the day after to-morrow.

The bell rings suddenly, and with an unwonted violence. Who can it be? Rose, my old housekeeper—she has been thirty-seven years with my family—opens the sitting-room door and says:

"Please, sir, a lady wants to see you."

"Let her come in, Rose." I rise to meet the visitor, but a flush of annoyance comes to my face; it is my third floor lodger.

Digitized by Google

"What can I do for you, madam?"

"A great deal, sir. Please, oh, please, take back the order to send my sister to the hospital! I could not go with her, and it would kill her."

I look at the tall, dignified figure before me. She stands because I have not offered her a seat. Where is my courtesy? I am ashamed, and I hastily push an arm-chair toward her.

"No, thank you; my sister is ill and needs me. I have only time to come and tell you that she cannot leave the house."

Her tone vexes me, it is so decided.

"I beg your pardon, she must go, for I do not wish to have a death in my house, especially not in these days when my friends——."

But, heavens! what is that? The woman reels, and I have barely time to prevent her from falling to the ground. What a brute I am! How could I speak so carelessly about a death which would leave her all alone, and take from her her dearest and best friend. I should never, never forgive myself.

Rose is near at hand, and with her help I am soon relieved by seeing Miss Casanova open her eyes again. As soon as she is about to stand, she says, in a low but cold voice, "I am sorry. Pardon the trouble I have given you, sir," and, without another word, she walks out like one in a dream, with a terribly bitter smile on her lips.

I felt so guilty that I stood like a statue, without a word of apology. When she was out of sight I felt vexed at the part I had played in the tragedy, and to console myself I went down to my friend's to talk it over.

Just as I was about to pull the bell, the door was opened by the maid, who was letting out a messenger with some parcels. I was such an everyday guest that she allowed me to step into the drawing-room and went about her own work.

This room was divided from a second one by a portière. Hearing voices in the next room I concluded that there was a visitor there, and I sat down, busy with my own perplexity, and waited for the lady of the house. Ten minutes must have passed, when I was recalled to myself by the sound of my own name. I rose voluntarily, but no one came, and I sat down again, while the voice went on:

"I'm sure I don't mind the harmless old fool, mamma, but can't we have one New Year's dinner without him? We need another lady if you insist on having him, and our dining-room is not very large."

"But, child," I hear the mother say, "how can we offend him? I do not care to have him, but he always sends such nice presents and flowers. And then he might raise the rent. Papa says we must be polite."

Since my dear mother's death, though it is long ago, I have never felt so lonely and forlorn as now. I must go out, I must walk, I must see people. I rush down the stairs, and, in my impetuosity, nearly knock down two men who are coming in.

The hall-porter's wife directs them upstairs, and, turning to me, she said:

"The cab from the hospital."

I forget my age and my usually dignified walk, and hurry up stairs, calling all the way, "Stop! Wait! Do not go on!" And I heave a sigh of intense relief as one man turns his head. They wait, I actually believe, with a suspicion that I am out of my mind, for I hold my hat in my hand and must look almost wild with excitement.

The men accepted my explanation, thanking me politely, and depart with a lurking doubt as to my sanity. But what do I care? The poor girl is safe. I wonder how she is. Perhaps she knows of my heartlessness and dreads the arrival of the ambulance. Will Miss Casanova ever forgive me? She looks so proud—like a queen more than like a bread-winner.

Presently the doctor comes into my library. I find that he is an acquaintance of mine.

"How is the invalid?"

"She has pneumonia, but I am glad to see a slight change for the better to-night."

"Thank God!" I say with a profoundly sincere accent.

"I did not know you were acquainted with them."

"Poor girls. I do not know them, but I am sorry for the poor sufferer."

"The sufferer, as you call her, is the least to be pitied. The older one is a heroine. I knew her in Florence when she was still the much-sought daughter of the rich banker Casanova.

"He had a second wife, and a little girl by this second marriage. Do you remember his complete ruin? It was followed by his death. His wife became an invalid from sorrow, and Miss Casanova, left with two helpless people on her hands, sought in vain for paying work.

"Florence attracted her, and she decided to try a place where no one knew of her former life. She began at the very beginning, living a life of sacrifice, but soon reaching a better position by her industry and intelligence.

"The mother died, blessing the faithful heart, sure that the delicate child left in her sister's care would be safe, and I shall spare no trouble to cure her."

And these were the women I wanted to send away!

I thanked the doctor, and begged him to let me know if I could do anything for my lodger. Then, under a sudden burst of confidence, I confessed to the doctor my heartlessness, and how I had deeply regretted my behaviour. Would Miss Casanova ever forgive me?

The doctor looked almost severe, and rising, said: "Try and make amends by leaving the two ladies from this time unmolested."

He said good-bye without much cordiality.

The next day a bouquet was bought of beautiful fresh-cut roses. It was intended for my friends downstairs, but I sent it to Miss Casanova. It came back with regrets:

"The perfume might hurt her sick sister."

A proud girl, Miss Casanova. I never asked after them, but I allowed Rose to give me news, which she did so discreetly that it seemed quite her own wish to inform me, while I was really thinking of nothing else all day.

The summons came to me from downstairs, but I pleaded a bad cold, and ate my lonely dinner with gusto, to the high delight of Rose, who could hardly believe it to be true. The invalid became daily better.

New Year's Eve arrived, and I heard that all danger was passed, with as much pleasure as if she had been a near and dear relative. Rose was the bearer of the good news. Then she confessed that she had carried the sick young lady every day some broth, chicken, or mutton, also beef-tea. To-day she had broiled a little leg of chicken. I listen, then I jump up.

"And she has not refused?" I break out. "Not refused? She has accepted, Rose?"

"Yes, sir, and to-day she has gone to take some work to the shop; so I sat with the dear, sweet young lady in order that she might not be left alone."

"Oh, you dear, good Rose! Then you have softened the cruelty of your master?"

Somehow I do not care now to be alone. Of course I sent an excuse for my absence from the New Year's dinner of my old friend. I enjoy better eating by myself.

A year has gone. Where is the poor, lonely, tolerated bachelor? Alas! he is no more.

He sits gravely, a happy husband, and nods joyfully at Rose as she announces dinner.

"Doctor, your arm to Miss Casanova, and take her to dinner."

"Miss Casanova" is a dainty, delicate little damsel, for the other Miss Casanova is my own sweet wife. She has forgiven me.

Rose, all smiles, stands in the door. I really believe she is as happy as we are.

As the doctor is to be my brother-in-law, he has decided to lay down his arms, and be as forgiving as the rest. My friend downstairs is still there, but he leaves soon in order to make room for us. We meet, we bow, we smile, and pass.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Six Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

AFRAID OF HER DINNER.

"Only a coward," said General Sir Thomas Picton, "will boast that he was never afraid." These are remarkable words to come from a man like him. Whatever Sir Thomas's faults may have been, timidity was not among them, as he proved down to the moment when he fell at Waterloo. We have heard of great generals afraid to cross a narrow bridge. The famous Duke of Marlborough was afraid of his wife, and with good reason. Some folks are afraid of ghosts, and some of new ideas. Here is a lady who was afraid to eat. Most of us will face a good dinner with a fair amount of courage; but we, luckily, are not in the condition of Mrs. Lucy Booth, at the time of which she writes.

"In the spring of 1888," she says, "I began to feel weak and ailing. My appetite was poor, and after all I ate I had great pain at the chest and left side. My hands and feet were cold and clammy, and I was so pale that I seemed to have no blood left in me. As time went on I got worse and worse, and became afraid to eat owing to the pain. I got so weak that I could scarcely get about. I saw a doctor from time to time, who gave me medicine, but I got no better. I also went to Nantwich for change of air, but nothing did me any good. After suffering in this way for nearly a year, my father persuaded me to try a medicine that had cured him, called Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. After I had taken one bottle of it I felt relief, and by continuing its use a short time all pain left me, and I gained back my old strength. My husband, who had suffered from indigestion for years, has been benefited by the same medicine. Whenever we ail anything, a few doses of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup soon set us right. You may make what use you like of this statement. (Signed) (Mrs.) Lucy Booth, 6, Union Street, Runcorn, February 9th, 1894."

After reading this story, nobody, we are sure, will criticise Mrs. Booth because she was afraid to eat. One is not a coward because he refuses to swallow poison, and that's what food soon becomes when it lies in the stomach without being digested. Cautious people frequently keep firearms in their bedrooms as a defence against intruders. Mrs. Booth is armed with Mother Seigel's Syrup against indigestion and dyspepsia, an enemy more to be dreaded than any midnight thief.

Now, lay to heart the simple thing I am going to tell you:—Nature, the wise mother of us all, never makes it hard to do what is necessary to be done. Not a bit. On the contrary, she makes necessary things easy and pleasant to do. You breathe without thinking of it; your heart beats without any supervision or care on your part; when you are thirsty she makes it a pure delight to drink; when you are tired and weary she lays her soft hand upon your face, and whispers, "Sleep, my child, sleep, and forget the world!" When you need food she stirs up within you what we (lacking a better word) call an appetite, and eating becomes a supreme satisfaction.

Well, then, what are we to think of ourselves when we turn from food as a woman turns from her dead baby? Why, this, to be sure: that something has outraged and thwarted nature. What has done it? The disease called indigestion or dyspepsia. "Oh," you say, "we know all about that; it never kills anybody." Doesn't it? Does famine never kill anybody? What filled the air of Ireland with wailing and keening away back in 1848? What—but, pshaw!—the point is sharp enough to prick your fingers.

Whether a man is hungry and has no food, or has plenty of food, but is prevented by disease from eating and digesting it—he starves just the same. "In nine-tenths of all fatal cases of disease," says an eminent medical writer, "the final cause of death is starvation. The digestion fails, and death ensues sooner or later. The human body must succumb unless constantly sustained by food."

True, and dyspepsia is slow starvation—the source of most of the other diseases that fill us with pain and misery.

As a cure, I point to the record of Mother Seigel's Syrup.

Digitized by Google

NEW DEPARTURE IN INSURANCE.

The Independent Order of Foresters

Gives Life Assurance at Rates slightly above actual cost—that is, at less than half the usual charges of Life Assurance Companies. The Premiums are based upon "The Combined Experience Table," which was prepared by a Committee of Eminent Actuaries from the Experience of Seventeen British Life Offices. This Table of EXAMPLES gives the Cost for £400; the Average Premiums of Insurance Companies; the RATES of the I.O.F.; and the SAVING EFFECTED BY JOINING THE ORDER.

Age last Birthday.	The Combined Experience Table Per Year.	£400. Average Cost of £400 in British Assurance Companies Per Year.	I.O.F. Table of Premiums Per Year.	Annual Saving to Members of the I. O. F.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s d.	£ s. d.
21	3 1 6	8 1 4	3 12 0	4 9 4
25	3 4 10	8 16 4	3 16 0	5 0 4
30	3 10 4	10 0 4	4 0 0	6 0 4
35	3 17 6	11 9 4	4 12 0	6 17 4
40	4 6 4	13 6 4	5 0 0	8 6 4
45	5 1 10	15 13 8	6 0 0	9 13 8
49	6 12 10	18 3 4	7 16 0	10 7 4

The full sum assured is payable at death. All premium-paying of ordinary members in the I.O.F. ceases at 70 years of age, when one-tenth of the amount assured is paid to them annually, the unexhausted balance being payable at death. The entrance fees are very moderate, a £100 policy costing 17s.; £200, £1 16s. 6d.; £400, £2 3s.; 600, £2 9s. 6d.; £800, £2 16s.; and £1,000, £3 5s. Court Dues (10s. to 12s. per annum) have to be paid by each member.

The Accumulated Funds amount to £160,000, of which £20,000 has been deposited with the British Government. Every claim has been paid within ten days, £328,000 having thus been paid during the last eleven years.

CHIEF OFFICE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM:—

24, CHARING CROSS, WHITEHALL, LONDON;

Office for Scotland:—217, BUCHANAN STREET, GLASGOW,

Where Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Membership may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

TWO GUINEAS FOR A PLOT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 302. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 13, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

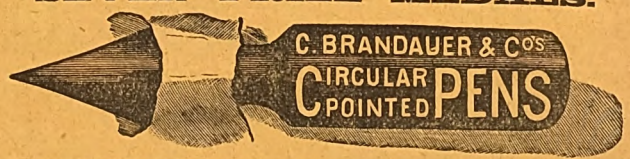
If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

One little Bottle of Norton's Pills,
Is not guaranteed to cure all ills,
But one little Bottle,
beyond all question,
Will thoroughly conquer Indigestion!

Trade Mark: NORTON'S One little Bottle.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH,
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.
Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

THREE HALF CROWNS

IT IS A STARTLING FACT

that Three Half-Crowns (7/6) will purchase a beautiful SERGE DRESS LENGTH in any of the following colours:—Black, Blue, Brown, Green, Claret, Nut Brown, Chestnut, Mulberry, Ruby, Red, Moss, Olive, Myrtle, Bronze, &c., also several very pretty and effective mixtures.

Full Dress Length (Carriage Paid) FOR 7/6

Money returned if not approved.

20,000 Sets of Patterns now ready, write at once. Patterns are sent Post Free and need not be returned.

These beautiful Serges are specially manufactured for Autumn and Winter wear, elegant in appearance and are not heavy as most Serges are. They will not spot with rain or wear threadbare.

£5,000 to be Given Away in Presents to Purchasers.

Thousands of Testimonials from all parts of the World.

Cloth Table Covers, 2 yds. square, 4s. 9d. each, in Crimson, Claret, Tan, or Emerald. Remnant Bundles of Serge, 5s. and 10s. each, carriage paid. Write to-day for Patterns of Dress Materials, post free to any address.

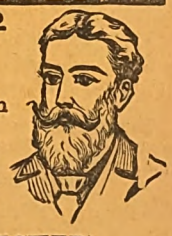
LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 21, The Dress Warehouse, Armley, Leeds.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES & Co

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

A HAIR PIN

WITHOUT POINTS

HAS GOOD POINTS !!!

SEE THE POINT ?

Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

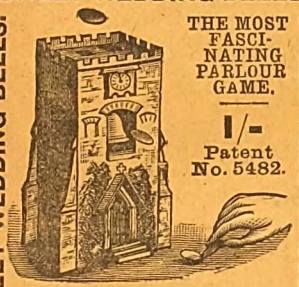
THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.



THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

NOSE Ugly shape altered and redness cured, permanently. Stamped envelope for full particulars, LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool. Treatment thorough. Uniquely testimonialised by Clients and by Press.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" give relief, and a few more applications effect a cure

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

Book on the Skin and Diet free.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' CO.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

HAIR DESTROYED.

The PERSIAN DEPILATORY absolutely exterminates without pain or injury to the most sensitive skin. It never fails to permanently destroy root and branch. Every case a success or no charge made. Send stamped addressed envelope to the "MANAGERESS," Oriental Toilet, Company, 87, Strand, London.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A Genuine Offer!

6/6 To Introduce a Specimen of our Jewellery, 6/6

A SAMPLE HALL-MARKED

REAL COLD LADIES' DRESS RING

Will be sent Post Free to every applicant on receipt of P.O. value 6s. 9d.

The Ring is delicate and pretty, and quite equal in appearance and wear to one costing many pounds. Money returned if satisfaction is not given.

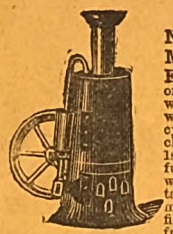
Satisfaction Absolutely Guaranteed.

As we are selling this article under cost price as an advertisement only, we cannot guarantee to repeat this offer, therefore the offer only holds good for a week after date of this paper.

Send size of finger and address with P.O. to

W. BENNETT, 1, Shoe Lane, London, E.C.

BAKER'S NOVELTIES.



THE NEW "ECLIPSE" MODEL STEAM ENGINE.—The rage of the Season. These wonderful Engines work with a real oscillating cylinder (which if purchased by itself cost 1s), strong metal boiler, funnel, large fly wheel, with pulley wheel attached for working other models, furnace, and filler complete. Carriage free 1s. 6d. Smaller size 1s.

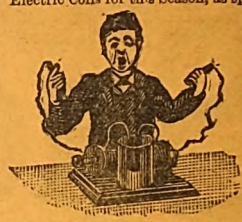
Don't miss this grand opportunity.

THE MARVELLOUS "CHAMPION" SLIDE VALVE STEAM ENGINE.—As is no doubt well known, a slide valve cylinder is the most expensive kind made, and in fact our lowest for a slide valve cylinder itself is 7s., yet we now offer a large substantial Engine with powerful boiler, stand, furnace, fly wheel, pulley wheel, governors, metal supports, and slide valve cylinder, complete, 5s. 6d., with whistle, water tap, steam tap, very superior, 10s. 6d. These engines are sufficiently powerful to work all the models sold by us.

THE EXPRESS STEAM LOCOMOTIVE.—A beautifully japanned locomotive, with all brass fittings, dome, whistle, safety valve, starting lever, 6 wheels (all flanged), and two powerful cylinders. Only 10s. 6d., free 11s.

THE "IXION" LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE.—A splendid locomotive engine on four wheels with funnel, safety valve, dome handrails, starting lever, two powerful cylinders with furnace complete. The cheapest locomotive out. 5s., free 5s. 6d., or with whistle 5s. 6d., free 6s. Without name plate 4s. 6d., free 5s.

THE ECLIPSE ELECTRIC COIL.—We are offering the most wonderful value in Electric Coils for this Season, as special leading lines. Each one guaranteed to work, and to administer good strong shocks. No. 1 Coil is finished complete, and mounted on stand with handles and connecting wires. Price 1s., post free 1s. 3d. No.



2 Coil is a larger and more powerful ditto, better finished, and furnished with brass terminals, and is a very superior article, 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d. No. 3 Coil is equal to many charged 10s. 6d. for. This Coil has a regulating handle for increasing or decreasing the strength as required, and is fit for any Drawing Room, Bazaar, Lecture Hall, &c. Price 5s. 6d., post free 6s. No. 4, very handsome large Coil, with reversing motion, 10s. 6d. Any ordinary Bichromate Batteries will work these Coils, and as most people have batteries now-a-days, no further expense is incurred, but if needful, we supply a strong Bichromate Battery suitable for working No. 1 and 2 Coils for 1s. 3d., post free; or a larger ditto for the 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d. Coil, for 2s., post free 2s. 4½d. We now give a small Battery free with every Coil sold.

THE ELECTRICAL DANCING NIGGER.—A great curiosity and a wonderful working model. The climax of electrical ingenuity and skill. By means of a powerful Electro Motor and Battery the Nigger will dance on the platform for half-an-hour at a time. A capital window attraction. Nigger, Motor, Battery, Platform, Connecting Wires, and everything complete. Price 3s. 6d., carriage free 3s. 10d.

ELECTRIC MOTORS for working Models, Machinery, &c.—All guaranteed to work, and spendid value for money. A beautiful little Motor on stand complete, only 1s., free 1s. 3d. No. 2 size much larger ditto, better finished and more powerful, with fittings, 2s. 6d., free 2s. 9d. No. 3 size, a really superior and very powerful motor, on polished stand, with brass wheel, brass terminals, and fittings, 5s. 6d., free 6s. Any bichromate battery will work these, or we supply battery for Nos. 1 and 2 Motors for 1s., free 1s. 3d.; and a powerful ditto for No. 3 for 2s., free 2s. 4½d.

Grand Illustrated Novelty Catalogue, 64 pp., 1,000 Illustrations. 1d. stamp.

BAKER & COMPANY, 34, Beech Street, Barbican, London, E.C.

£10,000 IN PRESENTS.

ONE MILLION BEST SILK

HANDKERCHIEFS

1/- ONLY. ONLY 1/-

I must clear my overstock of about one million pure Silk Handkerchiefs, direct from the looms. To do this quickly I will give to each of the first 100,000 postal customers a valuable present; please mention if a lady's or gentleman's prize is required. The Handkerchiefs are of large sizes, and well worth 2s. 6d. each. Suitable for Ladies' or Gentleman's wear. LIGHT, SOFT, WARM, and DURABLE, as only a Silk Handkerchief can be. I have reduced the price for the Special Sale to 1s. each, or 13 stamps; 2 lots for 2s., 6 for 5s., 12 for 9s. 6d. Prize and a free insurance coupon for £100 with each handkerchief.

A Live Testimonial worth a Thousand recommendations from me.

"105, Boundary Lane, Liverpool, "March 16, 1894.

"Dear Sir,—Sample Handkerchief and present to hand this morning, with which I am both exceedingly pleased and absolutely astounded at the price you are putting them in at. You are worthy of patronage. With all possible despatch please forward me to above address 14 more as follows: 10 Ladies', and 4 Gentlemen's. Enclosed you will find P.O.O.'s as per your quotation, 11s. 6d. Sincerely hoping you may have an extensive sale of the Handkerchiefs.—Yours faithfully, JOHN D. COSTA."

P.O.O.'s payable at Rugby. Letters addressed to

H. BUTCHER, Clifton Mill, Rugby.

PLEASE MENTION THIS MAGAZINE.

HAIR REMOVED permanently, root and branch, without injury to the skin. Particulars on receipt of stamped directed envelope.

G. S. COLLINS, Imperial Mansions, Oxford Street, London, W.C.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A phamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 302. FOR THE WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 13, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

WE all looked up to Digby as a journalist. He wrote leading articles for the Times and the Daily Telegraph. He was also a constant contributor to all the best monthly magazines, or at least he said he was.

Digby's masterpiece was written in collaboration with a woman. The story was drafted supernaturally. It was Sir Arthur Sullivan who said that he always composed his best things while travelling in a train. Digby said this was because music must be written on lines. Digby was a second Sullivan, only he wrote prose with the help of a synonym dictionary. His knowledge of the Muse was limited to two brief terms—Bars and Bass. He used these frequently.

Digby had settled himself down in a first-class carriage on the Paris express, with a complacent, self-satisfied air. Cannes was growing unbearable. He was tired of the dust and the constant glare of the Riviera.

Besides, the prospect of having the compartment to himself as far as Paris was a pleasing one.

At Marseilles the express pulled up. Every one got out. There was a stampede down the platform towards the dining-room. Digby hesitated. If he got out somebody else would be sure to get in. However——

One table was unoccupied near the door. He sat down and ordered soup with a bottle of white wine. There was a rustle of a lady's skirt behind him. The next moment the other seat was taken.

He glanced up and his eyes dwelt appreciatively, if somewhat presumptuously, on his companion's bewildering beauty. She was tall and slight, and her travelling dress was concealed by a long blue ulster turned down with silver fur.

Digby is skilled in physiognomy. It is an attribute, he told me once, of every journalist. For once, however, he was powerless before a human conundrum.

His vis-à-vis face was deathly white: her lustrous black eyes met his with a hunted, distrustful look which added to the unaccountable interest her unusual appearance had aroused. He noticed the black circles which emphasised their brilliancy, and the dusty, travel-stained appearance of her dress.

Her golden-brown hair, knotted low down on the graceful curve of her neck, escaped rebelliously from under a round cap of dark fur with such profusion that Digby felt a momentary annoyance that she did not take the opportunity to retire and make herself tidy. Ten minutes before a looking-glass, and he felt she would be one of the most beautiful women he had ever seen. Her features were small and clearly cut; her teeth perfectly white and even.

After the first, half-defiant glance, his strange companion studiously avoided looking across the table, although she was plainly conscious whenever Digby's gaze lighted on her.

The girl's refined face and manners were belied by her uncared-for appearance, and the first thing which struck Digby was that she was a lady, but certainly neither English nor French.

She paid her bill without a word, and then, as she stooped forward and picked out half-a-dozen Turkish cigarettes she gave the first clue to her companion.

"A Russian, of course," commented Digby. He wondered why he had not thought of it before. "A Princess no doubt. A refugee. A Nihilist perhaps——"

A bell rang somewhere in the station. The porters were calling out, "To your carriages; to your carriages." Everybody pushed back their chairs. The Russian lady was without her change, but she did not wait. In an instant the covered way was filled with a jostling crowd. The train appeared to be moving from the platform. For a moment there was a veritable panic among the passengers. Digby made a dash for the nearest carriage. By a stroke of luck he was in his own compartment. Two people followed him. One was an old gentleman with a very red face and white whiskers, who was stout and short of breath; the other the Russian lady.

. . . . . .

Digby wrapped himself in his rugs and took up his book with a sort of mental nod to the outside world with which he had finished for the present. To his vexation, however, the lamp burned dimly and the carriage rocked from one side to the other, making any attempt to read out of the question. He lay back on the cushions watching the beautiful Russian opposite with lazy admiration.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

She put her feet up on the cushions.

Her elbow was on the window ledge and she was staring out into the blackness of the night apparently unconscious of all around her.

Digby was a vain man, and the way in which she appeared to totally ignore his existence offended his susceptibilities. If he could have spoken Russian he would have offered her his paper. It was no good to him in that light. However, he could not speak Russian and his French was doubtful.

If ever a woman had a history written on her face this Russian lady had, Digby began to speculate. Here was something at least to relieve the tedium of the journey. Presently, as he watched, a faint smile played about her lips, and she began nodding her head as though well pleased with her own thoughts.

"What a heroine she would make for a story!" thought Digby. With himself as a hero, of course, he meant, although he did not say so in so many words. I believe it was an understood thing that Digby played a prominent part in all the writings signed by that famous name. He disguised himself, of course. He dressed himself in different clothes, and called himself by different names; and he painted his face and tired his hair—but it was always Digby.

There certainly was the foundation for a romantic story here.

Suddenly Digby started out of his lounging posture, and sat up straight and rigid. Surely he was familiar with that exquisite profile! Surely he had met that Russian lady before! Her face haunted him; her wild eyes, draggled hair, dusty but fashionable clothes! He looked round him dazed and bewildered.

Was he recalling some memory of a forgotten past. The white cushions of the carriage seemed inseparable from the recollection; even the old gentleman in the corner, who had thrown his head back and was snoring quietly, was necessary to complete the old association.

While he was pondering on this subject, an idea for a story suddenly flashed across Digby. A story of love and chivalry and pathos. The heroine was a beautiful woman escaping from Justice—the hero a chivalrous young Englishman, and they met on the Paris express. As if by some touch of magic, the story grew in his mind: the action of the brain was more like remembering than creating. What subtle influences were at work? Was this the first breath of genius? Had one soft glance from those black eyes transformed the chaos of his inner consciousness into a master's mind?

Digby assures me on his honour as a gentleman and a journalist that these thoughts actually occurred to him. He also wondered how much an editor would give him for the story. Fancy such a mercenary thought jumbled up with a psychological mystery!

In something less than an hour the story was drafted by some supernatural agency. Digby felt that it was the best thing he had ever done. I don't think this was saying much. He wondered whether the girl opposite would ever come across the story and recognise herself. At all events she would be flattered. Perhaps she would even be sorry, as she laid it down, that she had not paid more attention to the clever writer as they travelled together in the train. As far as he could tell she had not looked at him once since they sat face to face at the little dining table.

Digby felt as if he ought to thank her for supplying him with such a thrilling plot. He felt the inspiration had in some mysterious way been animated by her presence. Perhaps she had mesmerised him—only their eyes had never met.

Just then he turned and looked out of the window. He told me later that what he discovered was the softest piece of flattery that had ever brought the colour to his cheeks.

The girl was staring at his reflection in the window mirrored by the blackness of the night. No wonder she had been so interested. If the old gentleman in the corner had looked up after that, he would have seen two young people staring out of their respective windows, apparently unconscious of one another's existence.

"Gad, that girl's a genius," Digby reflected.

Half-an-hour later, the Russian lady smiled at the flying landscape, shrouded as it was in blackness. Digby smiled too.

The old gentleman woke up, and immediately settled himself down again for another nap. The train pulled up at a station. A porter opened the door and replaced the foot-warmers. A blast of cold air came in. Digby shivered. They were passing from summer to winter.

Presently the Russian lady removed her cap, and pushed back her hair from her forehead. Digby thought that she was the most beautiful woman he had ever seen.

She put up her feet on the cushions and seemed disposed to follow the old gentleman's example. The window was frosted now, and no longer reflected anything. For his own part Digby was annoyed at the inclemency of the weather.

Suddenly there was a loud report. The window was shattered to atoms, and a rain of shot beat against the opposite side of the carriage. If she had been sitting up she must have been killed. The escape was providential. The carriage was filled with broken scraps of glass. The old gentleman sat up with a start. The train rushed on, enveloped in a white mist.

. . . . . .

Three days after he came back from the Riviera I was smoking in Digby's rooms.

"I've sent that story round to Fly Leaves office," he said, rubbing his shoulders softly against the mantelpiece. "I wonder what Kendal will think of it?"

"Did you bring in the shooting incident?" I queried.

Digby left the mantelpiece and settled himself on the sofa.

"When truth is stranger than fiction, why not?" he asked, staring down at the fire. "I had mapped out a pretty story, but nothing so artistic as this bold attempt on the Russian girl, as she dashed by in the night when no power on earth could mark the hand that tried to steal her life."

When Digby begins to talk like that I always go. There are some kinds of insanity which are best treated in this way. I could not refrain from putting one question to him, however.

"What happened afterwards?"

"We changed carriages at the next station, and after that she slept as quietly as if nothing had happened until we arrived at

Digitized by Google

Paris. I saw her having breakfast. I met her again at Calais: we travelled over in the same boat without speaking a word to one another, although she sometimes looked at me and smiled gratefully for any little attention I paid her. At Victoria, I was determined to make her acquaintance through Cook's interpreter. When I found him she was gone."

Digby broke off abruptly. I could not help feeling sorry for him. What is the good of a hero when the heroine has disappeared?

. . . . . .

A fortnight slipped by, and one morning I met Digby in Regent Street. He appeared very excited.

"Digby, old man," I asked, "what's the matter?"

"Matter? Read this!"

He put a letter in my hand which was signed by Mr. Kendal, the editor of Fly Leaves.

"DEAR SIR,—I should esteem it a favour if you would call on me at the office some time to-morrow. Your story—if I may be allowed to say so—is one of the best I have ever considered for insertion in my periodical. By some strange coincidence, however, the same story reached me from a different source two days previously. I feel sure that you will consider that I am only justified in asking for an explanation of the coincidence, as I understood that the story was original.—Yours,

"T. H. KENDAL."

"Sell for you, Digby," I said, folding up the letter and handing it back to him. "Jolly well serves you right. I thought the story was too good to have come from your inner consciousness. It was a translation, I suppose——"

I looked up at Digby. He was leaning against a lamp-post as white as death. Before I had time to realise what he was about to do he had sprung forward and hit me across the face.

He had sprung forward and hit me across the face.

"How dare you?" he shouted. "You coward!"

For a moment I hesitated, the blood mounting to my cheeks and forehead. Then I held out my hand.

"I beg your pardon, Digby. I didn't know——"

"It's for me to apologise," he said quickly, taking my hand with a sharp, indrawn breath. "I don't wonder that you thought badly of me. I was dumfounded myself when I received this letter. I accused myself. I ransacked my memory for some old story I might unconsciously have plagiarised. But I am innocent. I swear I am innocent. It is my story—my masterpiece!" and he turned away and began walking quickly down the street, his hat a little further back, his umbrella tightly clutched, his whole body vibrating.

. . . . . .

He presented himself at the office with a clear conscience, but positively without a suggestion to offer for the coincidence.

The editor leant back in his chair and regarded him curiously.

"Where did you get your plot from?" he asked, rubbing his fat hands together, and spreading the manuscript out by the side of another in a running feminine hand which was opened on his desk.

"It is entirely a work of imagination; the characters are from real life. One incident in the story alone is taken from an experience which I went through myself."

"I must accept your word for it, of course, Mr. Digby," said the editor rather rudely. "Only"—he got up and began pacing up and down the room with quick short strides—"the affair is—ahem! so extraordinary, that I think you will understand me when I say that I can hardly bring myself to believe that you are not—ahem!—mistaken. The coincidence is not merely in the plot," he continued, seating himself nervously in his great morocco chair and throwing one leg across the other. "The title, in both instances, is word for word, the two principal actors have the same name, the scene is identical, the ending simultaneous, so to speak."

Digby was hardly able to control himself. He was breathing hard and twisting his fingers together.

"Practically, the only difference in the two stories is that the hero and the heroine are reversed. In your novel the lady is escaping from the hands of Justice—in the other the man—hullo! What's that? Excuse me one minute, Mr. Digby," and the presiding genius of the most popular magazine of the day darted out of the room in answer to a whispered communication through the speaking tube.

Digby felt as if he was taking leave of his senses. He paced up and down the room, to and fro, to and fro.

"It is my story," he repeated vaguely, "my masterpiece."

There was a knock at the door, and someone entered rather timidly.

"Monsieur Sardou!—I beg your pardon—I thought Mr. Kendal was disengaged."

Digby swung round. There, standing face to face with him, was the heroine of his story—the Russian princess.

As their eyes met, a faint flush swept across her beautiful cheeks and suffused her neck.

Her companion felt his heart beating wildly. He stared at her quite breathless, and his face convulsed.

"Can you speak English?" he faltered. "I thought——"

The girl had quite recovered her self-possession. She lifted a little heap of proofs from a chair and seated herself, drawing off her gloves in a mechanical way.

"Speak English? Of course, it is my native tongue," with a little nervous laugh, "but you—I thought Monsieur Sardou only spoke French."

"Monsieur Sardou! My name is Digby!"

The girl's face underwent an extraordinary change, the smile died from her lips, her eyebrows contracted in evident perplexity.

Digitized by Google

Sardou was a Frenchman, banished for political intrigue, and a murderer to boot, who was practically running the gauntlet of the police force of the world. She had heard one person at Marseilles whisper to another—

"See! There is Sardou! Heavens, what nerve the man has got!"

In an instant her interest was aroused. She had been thrilled by his presence, awed by his daring. As a journalist who had been six months in Russia as the special correspondent of the Morning News, she would have given her head to interview him there and then, only she could not speak French. And after all, the little romance she had built up was scattered to the winds!

"You are not Sardou?" she repeated incredulously, bending forward and looking at him curiously.

"Good heavens! Nothing of the sort."

There was a moment's silence, and then the girl rose and held out her hand.

"I feel I ought to apologise for mistaking you for that wretch. I ought to have known better. May I ask why you thought that I could not speak English?"

If Digby had been a truthful man he would have said:

"Because you were so disreputably untidy." His journalistic training, however, saved him from this.

"Because I thought that only a Russian could be so beautiful," he said, holding her hand perhaps a trifle longer than was absolutely necessary. "And—well, you know, only the new woman smokes cigarettes."

"It never occurred to you, I suppose, that those were for the porter who was looking after my luggage."

Digby honestly confessed that it had not.

Devoid of the glamour their imaginations had thrown over two very ordinary young people, they both felt disappointed, or, as Digby explained to me later: "Like a man going home at nine o'clock in the morning, in his dress clothes, after a night out."

"Then, I suppose that gun was not fired purposely at you?" remarked Digby sadly, leaning against the desk and gnawing his fingers.

"Nor at you? It's rather sickening, isn't it. To tell you the truth, I've written a story——"

Seizing her hand, and shaking it up and down.

Digby sprang forward, the colour burning high on his cheeks.

"Thank heaven!" he exclaimed earnestly. "I thought I was going mad."

She rose to her feet feeling that something was going to happen. Her legs swayed slightly.

They looked thunderstruck at one another.

"What do you mean?"

"Mean?" Digby shouted, seizing her by the hand, and shaking it up and down, as if he had known her all her life. "Why, I've written a story, too. And they are both here—here on this desk," and he sank down in a chair.

Presently he looked up.

"You called your story

'IN THE PARIS EXPRESS;
THE ADVENTURE OF A FAMOUS REFUGEE'?"

She made the sign "yes," nodding her head.

"And you got your hero's name from——"

"The label on your bag!"

"Great heavens! So did I. But the main incidents of the plot——"

"They unrolled themselves as we went along. The whole thing came to me like a flash."

"Ah, then it was mesmerism! The story was floating in the air. We both got it simultaneously."

. . . . . .

"The question is," observed Mr. Kendal, looking from one to the other, and tapping his teeth with an ivory penknife, "whose story is it?"

"Miss——?"

"Miss Tionary."

"Miss Tionary's, of course," said Digby gallantly. "If it had not been for her it would never have been written. Besides, I plagiarised from her by the force of a stronger will."

Miss Tionary laughed.

"How do you know? Possibly, I stole it from you. What a psychological conundrum!"

Mr. Kendal got up nervously.

"Perhaps," he said, taking up the two manuscripts, "if I might be allowed to suggest that you should collaborate and make a novel of it. The truth is, Mr. Digby has made the most of his heroine—Miss Tionary of her hero. Put them both together, and you will have such a story as has never before been published."

Digby looked at his "Russian Princess," and she looked at him and smiled consent. Then they both went off with each other's manuscript under their arms with an agreement to meet in a week's time and talk the matter over.

Three days later I found Digby, with a dangerous gleam in his eye, composing the following letter:

"DEAR MISS TIONARY,—On reading through your story I do not see that anything could be taken from it with the idea of improving my original plot. If such an insufferable prig as you have succeeded in depicting is your idea of a hero, I can only regret that anything about me should have been the means of suggesting his character to you.
—Yours truly, A. S. D."

The following morning he received a note from Miss Tionary, which had evidently crossed his own:

"DEAR MR. DIGBY,—The similarity between our two stories is really wonderful, only mine is better as it stands, don't you think, without any alterations? Your idea of a heroine shows how very little you really understand a woman, and I am sorry that I should have been the means of suggesting to your mind a woman at once so passionate and so weak. I may not be anything very grand, but I do flatter myself I am not quite so insipid and colourless as you make out. Perhaps we had better not collaborate. Shall I destroy your MSS.?—Yours faithfully,
"H. H. T."

. . . . . .

Of course I could not allow this sort of thing to go on. I suggested to Digby that it would certainly be better for each to write about themselves and leave the other out. Perhaps, after marriage they might understand one another better, and, by Jove! they took the hint.

The papers were silent about the shot which was fired at the Russian princess. It never seemed possible to me that it could have been premeditated. Probably some belated sportsman after little birds, or—but what is the use of conjecture?

Digitized by Google

THE BARONESS ROSA VITA.

IN the Rue St. Marc, in the centre of the business quarter of Paris, may be found, niched in amongst lofty tenement houses where hundreds of small manufacturers carry on their occupations, a small, two-storey house, dingy and black with age, yet not devoid of a certain picturesqueness due to its antiquity and to its tumble-down condition.

It was pretty to look at in the spring, when the moss on the dilapidated roof was fresh and green, and there was a bouquet of crocuses or of violets at the window. And at all seasons there were clean curtains everywhere, for the grave old maid who lived there, all alone with her young niece Denise, was as neat and particular in her ways as anyone could be.

She was a native of Normandy, was the older woman, Marthe Durand, but she had lived so long in Paris that few of her acquaintances were aware of the fact that she had been born near Etretat, and that her earliest recollections were of the sound and the salt breezes of the grand, vast sea. She was an embroideress, and a skilful workwoman, so her services were in great request amongst the leading dressmakers.

Like Marthe, Denise was tall and slender, but her complexion had the pure white and delicate rosiness of the natives of a northern clime, and her features, though attenuated, were finely outlined, and had a stamp of distinction unknown to the severe countenance of the older woman.

A slight degree of mystery had always hung round Denise's origin. The older members of the quarter could remember her advent, fifteen years before, and how she had been brought to her aunt's house, gorgeous in velvet and embroidery, in charge of a servant in livery.

But Marthe Durand was the most taciturn of human beings. There was a dignity about her that repelled all efforts at questioning or even at gossip, so the parentage and origin of Denise remained enveloped in an impenetrable mystery.

The pretty child grew into a graceful girlhood, as carefully guarded and tended as the daughter of the highest lady of the land. She was the one creature on earth that had been given to Marthe to love, and the grave, quiet woman adored her with a deep and exclusive and all-absorbing tenderness which seemed to concentrate in itself all the affection that a woman usually bestows on her husband and her children.

Of relatives Marthe apparently had none. There was talk of a sister much younger than herself, who had taken to evil courses many years before, but those who knew anything of the matter always declared that that sister was dead. At all events, no visitors ever came to disturb the quiet course of life in the little house on the Rue St. Marc.

Denise was educated in a convent in the neighbourhood till she was past fifteen, and then her aunt took her home to teach her her own trade of embroidering. It was delicate, refined work, fit for the dainty fingers of the little maiden, and she made rapid progress, promising in time not only to equal, but even to surpass, her instructor.

It was a bright, cold Saturday afternoon in January, and the little sitting-room, despite a sprinkling of snow outside—the remains of a recent snowstorm—looked cheery and comfortable. A movable stove—a recent extravagance on the part of Marthe, who could not bear to see her darling shiver over her work on the sharp winter mornings—tempered the air with its genial warmth. Denise had just completed a splendid group of white and purple lilacs, worked on mauve satin, and was holding up her work to admire it prior to folding it up for transmission to its owner, and Marthe was bustling about setting the room to rights, when there came a knock at the door.

And without further waiting for anyone to open, the door was thrown ajar, and a superbly-dressed personage walked in, and said, in a loud, confident tone:

"Good day to everybody!"

The new-comer was tall and stout, and showy-looking—a woman not yet past middle age, but showing in face and figure the damaging effects of a life of dissipation.

The profuse masses of her elaborately-arranged locks were of a pale-canary hue, produced evidently by the application of some fashionable dye. Her cheeks were pink, and her brow and throat were white, and her lips were scarlet—not with the wholesome colouring of Nature, but through the skilled use of rouge, pearl-white, and lip-salve.

Deep bluish shadows under her eyes served to throw out their natural lustre and colouring. But her features were fine, and her walk and carriage were striking; and, above all, her dress was a model of fashionable material and elegance and stylish make, and she wore it with the ease of one who understands how to set off such attire.

Marthe paused in her occupation, and stared at the new-comer with such an expression of ghastly terror as her face might have worn had her showy visitor been a ghost, while Denise laid aside her work and hastened to bring forward a chair.

Private orders for embroideries had not been unknown to the busy aunt and niece, and were always welcomed as being more lucrative than those received from the great dressmaking establishments, and Denise fancied that in the intruder she recognised a possible customer.

"Well, Marthe, you don't seem to recognise me," said the visitor, seating herself. "Lord! woman, how old you've grown! And this is Denise, I suppose. Come here, child, and let me look at you. Upon my word, you have grown into a pretty creature. Not equal to what I was at your age, but still not bad to have been trained up by a workwoman."

"Catherine, what brings you here?" were the first words that burst from the pale lips of Marthe.

"Hush! Don't call me Catherine—the Baroness Rosa Vita, if you please. I have not answered to the name of Catherine for many a long day. You might be a little more civil, I think, to your only sister, when she comes to see you after all these years."

"But what do you want? Why are you here at all?"

"What do I want? I want my daughter, parbleu! and I have come to claim her!"

Marthe started forward with a hoarse cry.

"No—no! You cannot—you must not do that! When I consented to take charge of Denise, fifteen years ago, you promised me——"

"Ta-ta-ta! What are promises worth unless they are written on stamped paper and duly witnessed? Not so much as the stale crust on last week's pies. Come here, Denise, and give your mother a kiss."

And she carefully presented her right ear to the caress of the eager girl.

"Mother! So you are really my mother?" stammered Denise, longing to clasp in her arms the stout, strongly-corseted figure before her.

"Really and truly, little one. Not a good name for you, that, I must confess, so tall as you have grown. But you are fresh and childish enough to do the baby to perfection, and that is what I want."

She put her head on one side and contemplated Denise critically, and went on:

"Yes, in a straight dress of white tulle, open at the throat,

Digitized by Google

and a Directoire sash in white crape, you'll just look a picture. I never could wear Directoire sashes myself—too stout, my dressmaker says. And to think that when I was your age, Denise, I was as slight as you are now! And do you think you will like to come and live with mamma, little one?"

"Oh, yes—yes!" cried Denise, drawing closer to this unknown and gorgeous being who declared herself to be her mother.

"You'll have a fine time of it, mademoiselle, I'll promise you. Lots of new dresses, and drives in the Bois, and boxes at all the theatres, and dances and soirées. And all you'll have to do in return will be to sit in my drawing-room in the evening and smile prettily at my visitors. When will you be ready to go with me? No need of packing up; none of the clothes you have here will be wanted. Come along, child. Don't stand staring there, but wrap yourself up, and we'll get into my carriage and drive straight off to the dressmaker's."

During this time Marthe had sat motionless, as though stunned, with a grey shadow like that of death resting upon her rigid features. But at that moment she started up and caught the speaker by the arm.

"Catherine! Catherine!" she said, "you must not—you cannot be so wicked! What! take Denise from me; and for what purpose! The innocent child whose life has been as pure as a snowflake. Oh, Lord! have you no pity on your own flesh and blood?"

"Now, look here, Marthe," said her sister, disengaging her arm, "no heroics, if you please. The law gives me full rights over the girl, and I mean to use them. Look here! I have a baccarat table in my drawing-room on my Thursday evenings, and so far the police have been kept in the dark about the big amounts that have been won and lost there. But my visitors are dropping off.

"Tatia Topaze has set up a rival gaming-table, and she is newer than I, though not so pretty as I was ten years ago. But I want a new attraction for my soirées—something pretty and unsophisticated—and Denise here is just the thing."

"You shall not take her—no, no; you shall not!" ranted the elder woman, her face white to the very lips.

"I shan't, shan't I? I'll soon see to that. You idiot of a woman, don't you know that the law gives me full control over my own daughter till she is of age? Yes, you adopted her, that's true, but altogether informally—not so much as a scratch of the pen to prove it or to give you a hold over her. And I want her now, and I mean to have her. Run alone, Denise, and get your cloak. Or, no—I'll lend you my carriage cloak till we can drive to the Bon Marché and buy you something."

With an exclamation of delight, Denise started to obey her mother's order; but Marthe, regaining her composure by a strong effort, interposed to prevent her.

"Not this evening—not just now," she said in a calmer tone. "You have the law on your side, Catherine, and I'll submit. Only let Denise stay with me till to-morrow. Remember, she has been like my own child to me all these years, and it is not much I ask—only a few hours in which to get used to the fact that I must part with her."

The girl, sweet and loving even amid the dazzle of her changed circumstances, stole to the side of Marthe, and threw her arms round her neck.

"Let it be as auntie says, mamma," she said coaxingly. "Leave me with her now, and come for me to-morrow morning."

"Well, perhaps that would be better," said the so-called baroness reflectively. "I can bring you a dress and hat, and have you trimmed up a little before we start out together. I don't exactly like the idea of driving about the streets with a girl in a calico frock and no hat on. So you can keep Denise till to-morrow morning, Marthe. I will call for her at eleven o'clock. And mind—there will be no use in your trying to spirit her away. I'll have a detective on the watch till I get back."

"No need, mamma," laughed the girl joyously. "I would not run away from you, even if auntie bade me."

"Then be ready at eleven, and take care to have your hair nicely brushed. I'll see to the rest." And the baroness left.

As the outer door closed behind the retreating footsteps of the visitor, Marthe raised her head and looked at Denise with a dull, stony stare, which the girl, flushed with excitement, did not notice.

"Oh, auntie, was there ever anything so wonderful in the world? My mamma! my own mother! and a baroness! And how many pretty things I shall have, and what a charming life I am going to lead! Drives and parties and the theatre, and, perhaps, even the opera! Do you think she will take me to the opera, auntie? But why do you look so downcast? You are not going to lose your little Denise—not really, you know.

"I shall come to visit you every day or two, and you must come and see all my new dresses. And I shall have so much to tell you. I really wanted to stay quiet this evening, just to think it all over. But where has my mother been all these years, and why did she never come for me before?"

"Be patient, Denise. To-morrow you shall know everything. It is growing late now, and we must think about dinner. It must be a little feast, as it is the last one we shall take together. Come, and we will go out and buy something nice."

The plain little deal table in Marthe Durand's living room had never before seen such a banquet as that set out upon it that evening—chicken and canned asparagus, and great hot-house strawberries and bonbons, and even a small bottle of champagne being included in the repast.

Denise, gay as a lark in the delight of her brilliant anticipations, laughed and chattered and feasted, until, when dinner was ended, and the dishes put away, she declared merrily that she felt too fatigued to sit up for another minute.

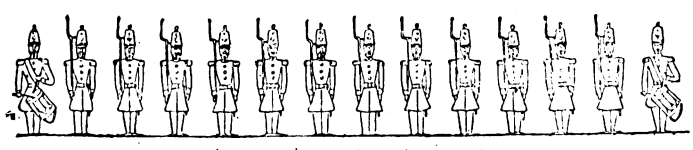
"May I have the movable stove in my room to undress by, Aunt Marthe?" she inquired. "It is so very cold, and you know this is my last evening, so you must pet me all that you can."

Without a word her aunt helped her to roll the stove into the bedroom, and to place it in the fireplace, with its pipe well installed in the chimney. A hurried undressing and a brief murmur of prayer, and then the fair young face lay back on the pillow in the sweet dreamless sleep of healthy youth. Marthe stole noiselessly to the bedside and gazed on the sleeping girl with a glance of unutterable love and anguish.

"There is but one way," she muttered. "My Denise, my sweet little one, and I must choose for you between death and eternal destruction. Your pure feet shall never tread the downward road that leads to everlasting fire. As for me, I am to stand before the Judgment Seat a murderess and a suicide. But what need I care for that? Let Hell be mine so that you may have Paradise and peace with the angels. I snatch you, my white lily, from the mire that is at hand. Sleep, Denise, sleep, and awake to-morrow in heaven!"

She laid her strong hands on the portable stove and turned it round, so that the full flow of death-dealing gas from the pipe might escape into the apartment. Then she crept into bed beside Denise, gathered the sleeping girl tenderly into her arms, and the golden head and the grey were pillowed side by side.

Once or twice a light spasm contracted the features of the older woman, but that passed away after a while, and the pair soon lay in the silence of a slumber that never should be broken till the dawn of the resurrection morning.



Digitized by Google

THE FATAL DICE-BOX.

IT was night in the Sierra Madre of Mexico, and I swung in a hammock under the wide portico of a rude building, my home for the time being, known as the Hacienda de Carmen, although not worthy of the name; so called, however, by the people of the camp, who dreamed, as myself, of the future of reduction works and numerous buildings to be erected from the proceeds of the white metal that we were gouging so slowly from the rocky fastnesses of Nature.

The house, built on a precipitous bluff that rose abruptly from the bed of the cañon, rested on the extreme edge and commanded a view down the wild, rocky gorge that stretched away some two miles to a small, mountain-hemmed valley lying thousands of feet below.

At the foot of the bluff a mountain stream rushed and bounded round and over boulders of gigantic size, and then fell gently in cascade after cascade into some deep, still pool, only to break away and wind on down the cañon in its mad rush for the sea, seeming, in the glimmer of the moonlight, like some enormous silver snake.

With the music of the waters came the soughing of the pines, as the cool evening breeze swept gently up from the valley, bringing also a murmur of voices from the camp far below, and the shrill creaking of the whim as it revolved at the mouth of the shaft on the mountain side, where, in the glare of a pine wood fire, the dusky forms of the men could be seen as they tramped round and round, slowly winding on a massive drum a seemingly endless rope from the bowels of the earth. And as my hammock gently swayed I smoked, when—

"Buenos noche, Señor!" And I was called back to reality with a start, to find my foreman, Miguel Soza, with the report and time of the men for the day. After the accounts had been looked over, and I was about to start on another visionary excursion up the Nile, Miguel, who had been for the past few moments leaning against the house and looking down on the camp, removed the inevitable cigarette from his lips and said:

"Caramba, Señor! there is the devil to pay down in the camp. Señora Fernandez, the widow, is wild, Señor; crazy about her pretty daughter, Mariquita, and that Indian chief Romulo, who was seen with her again to-day on the mountain. Chief! Yes, chief of the Tepewanes, but where are his people? Dead; gone all but a handful; and he is so poor, Señor—no maize, no frijoles, and he too proud to work.

"Valgame Dios! It was a sad day for Mariquita when she first went to mass at the little church in Baborigame, nearly three months ago. And, Señor, it was there they first saw each other, and then he followed her here; and to think, Señor, she has been meeting him again after her mother locked her up for a whole week, and gave her nothing to eat but a plate of frijoles and two tortillas each day! And to-night, Señor, she cannot be found; she is not in the camp, and the mother—caramba! Listen, 'tis Mariquita."

And from the trail on the side of the cañon came the strains of a Spanish love song, sung in a sweet, rich girlish voice, accompanied by a guitar. The song swelled out upon the stillness of the night for a moment only, and then was broken by a woman's voice from the camp below:

"Mariquita! Mariquita! picarona, come here! Oh, God of my soul, that I should bring a daughter into the world to love a dog of an Indio! Valgame Dios! but a husband thou shalt have this night—ay, one that can give thy mother one hundred pesos shalt have thee."

"Carrajo, Señor!" said Miguel. "The old devil will sell her daughter. Well, well, I have seen it done before; but Señor, the man—the man—there is no one in the camp—caramba! One hundred pesos! No, Señor, no one man has that much. Los todos muy pobre Dios! Will she raffle her?"

As he ceased speaking a woman's voice wailed out:

"Romulo! Romulo! Love of my soul! Save!" And as we listened from across the cañon came the echo, "Save!"

. . . . . .

Opposite the door stood Mariquita.

I approached the house, a long, sprawling building constructed of poles plastered with mud, and a few Indians gathered round the door made way, with the sordid indifference so peculiar to the race, and I entered a room lighted by two crude tallow candles stuck into the necks of bottles that rested on a small shelf.

A table and a few chairs comprised the furniture, while the walls were void of ornaments of any kind, with the exception of a cheap, highly coloured print of the Madonna, and a rudely carved crucifix hanging above.

Grouped round were some twenty men and women engaged in boisterous conversation, while in a corner opposite the door stood Mariquita, a girl of about sixteen, tall and beautiful, and possessing that languid grace which belongs only to the women of the South. Her dress, a gown of soft material, bright red in colour, had become deranged, and, opening at the bosom, exposed a white chemise that only partly concealed her heaving breast; a wealth of dark hair fell in disorder far below her waist, and from a face oval in shape, and of rich, creamy complexion, flashed eyes black as night.

Her lips, carmine tinted, parted and showed little white teeth, grinding together in anger, as she stood, a child and yet a woman, receiving with silent scorn the storm of abuse which her mother poured forth in a perfect torrent of language.

As I reached the woman I asked her if she really intended to raffle her daughter—for such, from the conversation, I judged to be her purpose.

"Si, Señor—why not? Do I not find her a husband she will go with that diablo of an Indian, and I will lose her for ever. No man here has one hundred pesos, and I am poor. Raffle her! Yes, why not? True, the priest will not be at Baborigame for three months, but what matter? She can marry then; it will be all the same."

Digitized by Google

In the meantime five of the miners had managed to obtain twenty pesos each, which they were anxious to risk for the purchase of Mariquita, and the money being handed over to the widow the dice-box was produced, and on the table that had been drawn into the centre of the room the throwing began.

The first man to throw was Carios Mendoza, a tall, swarthy-looking Mexican, who stood wrapped in a serape of orange and purple. His immense sombrero, resting on the back of his head, allowed a mop of coarse black hair to fall over his low forehead into his eyes. Raising the box, he brushed the hair aside, and after slowly rattling the dice threw in silence —sixteen; again the dice rattled—thirteen; and again—seventeen; forty-six in all.

A murmur of applause from the spectators, and Mendoza turned toward Mariquita, but something in her look quailed him, and with a low laugh he turned to watch the throwing of his opponents.

The box passed from one to the other without avail, and was now in the hands of the last thrower. Slowly he shook the dice, and then threw—seventeen; again—eighteen. The excitement was now intense; and in the silence broken only by the heavy breathing of the onlookers, and a muttered curse from Mendoza as he drew his sombrero down over his eyes, the last throw was made; the box was lifted—two fours and an ace.

Mendoza won, and with a glad cry he sprang toward Mariquita, but before he could reach her there was a rush through the door, an arm passed round his neck and pressed his body slowly back; a flash of steel—a groan—again a flash of steel and the arm descended, and Carlos Mendoza was dead on the floor.

And there, with the knife still grasped in his hand, Romulo, the Indian, stood like a statue of bronze, naked but for a breechcloth; his limbs like polished mahogany and his eyes flashing fire from under his heavy dark hair that fell to his shoulders.

For one moment he stood; then there was a flash, the report of a revolver, and Romulo tottered and sank to the floor, his back resting against the wall.

With a cry of anguish Mariquita threw herself on her knees beside him, and, while the tears coursed down her cheeks, she wiped away with her dress the blood that flowed from his lips, and besought him to speak to her.

"Romulo! Romulo! Caro mio! Esposa mio! Speak to me! God in heaven! tell me you are not hurt! Romulo! Speak just one little word to Mariquita! Oh, God of my soul, don't let him die!" And as Romulo looked into her eyes and tried to speak, a tremor passed over him, and the blood flowed again from his lips.

With a heart-rending cry Mariquita was on his breast, with her arms round his neck. "Romulo, my life, if thou must go, take me, too!"

With a superhuman effort the Indian raised himself, clasped her close with one arm, the other raised, and the steel flashed for the third time, and their souls passed into eternity together.

. . . . . .

Romulo and Mariquita rest in the same grave on the cañon side beneath the pines, and a white stone cross marks the spot to this day.

A GUILTLESS MURDERER.

HIS is the story of a madman. It was told by Geoffrey Coombs, an insane chemist, who lives in a dilapidated house-boat up the river. He is so old that his pulse beats only forty times a minute. His skin is shrivelled, and his voice is tremulous. The cloud which hangs over his mind is the memory of a woman who never existed, and remorse for a deed that was never committed.

. . . . . .

"My name is Geoffrey Coombs. I am a descendant of a race of people who were civilised before other races were born. The ignorant, confident in their own knowledge, unhesitatingly assert that that which does not exist, and has not existed, cannot exist. My people have known strange secrets which have been transmitted from generation to generation.

"I am a gipsy. The stars in the heavens or the lines upon the palms of your hands are open books to me. Only once have I called upon the 'Spirit of the Nile' to assist me without meeting a prompt response.

"We are called vagabonds because we do no manual labour. We do not work in order that we may study. Books teach us nothing that someone else does not know; but in the scrolls of parchment I learned the secret of human life.

"When I left my people I began to search for the vital principle, which is the same in all forms of animal life. What cared I where my houseboat floated, so long as I had the precious treasure of knowledge before me! I travelled up and down the river.

"So familiar did I become with the parts of a human being that I could analyse them and separate the ingredients. Finally I resolved to create a woman. It seemed to me that having discovered the 'vital spark,' and being able to construct the body, I would have no difficulty in making a human being.

"The idea at first amazed me, and then I was irresistibly attracted by it. I determined to attempt the experiment. It would be useless to detail how long I worked before I obtained my materials. The number of graves I desecrated and the parts of dead bodies that I took from them at night-time and carried off to my boat are of no relevancy in this plain narrative.

"At the end of two years I had secured the various component parts which go to make up a human being.

. . . . . .

"Day after day I worked at my task. I wonder now God Almighty did not, with a bolt from heaven, strike dead the man who was trying to profane His handiwork.

"We gipsies believe in a God, notwithstanding the many assertions to the contrary. I learned to love the object on which I was working. After the lapse of another year there lay before me one of the most beautiful creatures that mortal eye ever gazed upon.

"The eyes half closed, seemed like those of a picture watching me constantly, awaiting the time when I should add the potion which would animate this human clay with the breath of life, and a willing slave would awaken at my bidding.

"Impatiently I awaited the time when the decoction necessary to complete the process would be ready. For days and nights I did not sleep, but sat gazing on the beautiful vision of loveliness. The love which a father cherishes for his child and the affection of a lover for his mistress were combined in one. It was no longer a question of the triumph of science with me, but it was a problem of life and death.

Digitized by Google

. . . . . .

"At last all was ready. The signs were propitious, and the potion was prepared. I trembled with the awful responsibility which I was about to incur. My hands shook like those of a man with the ague, and my brain seemed intoxicated with the excitement of the moment. I imagined that the whole world was watching my experiment. I felt that failure was worse than a thousand deaths. I was trembling violently when I moistened her lips with the liquid. No sign was visible, and in my haste I poured all the contents of the phial down her throat.

"My heart palpitated, and each beat seemed to be a cry of exultation. The room was illuminated; but suddenly a flame, which shot forth from the couch, lighted up the waters on each side of the boat with a terrible splendour. Then all was dark again. The pall which overspread us seemed so complete that I fancied I was suddenly stricken blind.

"Then there burst upon my vision the most beautiful sight ever vouchsafed to human being. I had summoned from his high retreat the Angel of Life, and the radiance from his crown reflected on every side.

"He stayed but a moment, but when he was gone a living breathing creature made after my own design stood before me. She was supernaturally beautiful, with a nameless grace, half human and half divine. In the ecstasy of my triumph I danced and shouted like a gratified child. This creature knew no law except my will.

"Ignorance in its most attractive form was typified in her. The cares of the world would never trouble her because she could not comprehend them, and I was far too wise to teach them to her. Intuitively she seemed to know all that was purest and best, but the commonplace details of the sordid existence of human kind was a sealed book.

"The days passed in the most perfect happiness granted to mortal man. I cared neither for the past nor for the future, for the present was a bliss which could compensate for anything that could take place thereafter.

. . . .

"But for a fatal mistake, which was the result of my own carelessness, I might now have been the companion of a being created by myself, and baptized in the divine elixir, instead of the grovelling thing that I am.

"The formula directed that, at the lapse of a certain time, I should cause to be observed certain rules. My belief in my own powers was so great, and my vanity so exaggerated, that I thought I could with impunity disobey the magnates who not only rule but who created the world.

"Selfish as I was, I neglected to do as I was bidden, and blasted my happiness like a winter's wind falling upon some saucy violet that had dared to rear its head in defiance to the snows.

"We were sitting on the verandah of the boat. The day was ended, and the glory of the setting sun seemed typical to me of the happiness of my life. Suddenly I observed a change in her. I was at her side in an instant, but she was in the throes of a convulsion against which the amulets from the heart of Cheops were unavailing.

"I watched her tenderly until it was over. Her face was as fair as usual, but there was a change. So subtle at first that I scarcely noticed it, but in the days that followed I learned that the heart of her whom I loved had been changed into the heart of a man.

"She was still a woman, but she had a man's heart and a man's ambitions. The entity which composed her being remained the same save for this change. When the realisation of this terrible thing came upon me, I loathed her.

"Measured by the strict standard of beauty, she was still a Venus, but I knew that within that lovely form there was the heart of man. Whether it was a black and treacherous one, or was as manly and honourable as that of the most just man that ever lived, was immaterial to me.

"Daily my hate grew more bitter. I tried to control myself and to remain the same, but the consciousness of the terrible thing gained a mastery over me. The same desire to kill her that induces one to kill a snake came over me. I could not sleep, and when my last experiment had been tried in vain, I fell upon her with a huge knife, cut her in pieces, and threw her into the river.

"It was murder, but I could not help doing what I did. For a time I was happy, and then a dull pain in my head began to trouble me. Now all the fiends of remorse hover about my couch at night-time, and sit by my side during the day. Photographed upon the walls of my memory is a picture of a beauteous creature which I made, and then destroyed. I suppose that I will be hanged now that I have confessed my crime, but I am ready to die."

£2 2s. FOR A PLOT.

I take it for granted that, on the whole, the readers of this paper are very fair judges of a good story. Moreover, there are undoubtedly a large number of people among them who are capable of devising excellent plots for stories, while they are not gifted with the necessary ability for working them up into readable form.

It seems to me a pity that such good material should be forced by lack of opportunity to lie dormant, and with a view to seeing what readers are capable of in this direction, I offer a couple of Guineas for what I consider to be the most striking plot for a short story.

The scene may be laid anywhere, and only a rough outline, should be given, embodied in a paragraph of not more than a hundred and fifty words. Any number of attempts may be sent by each competitor, but each attempt must be on a separate sheet of paper, with the name and address of the sender on the back. Competitions to be enclosed in an envelope marked "PLOT," and to reach this office by Tuesday, October 30th."

PASS ON, PLEASE!

If you should be so bold as to disregard the notice at the head of this paragraph, may I ask you to remember that the first issue of Pearson's Library—a complete novel, profusely illustrated, one hundred pages, price Sixpence, entitled, "A Girl Without a Name"—is now on sale.

If you have already purchased a copy and are pleased with it, will you recommend it to your friends? But if the needful visit to your newsagent or the bookstall has not been made, let me advise you to put it off no longer or you may be disappointed.

A single copy will be sent, post free, for Sevenpence, or the twelve monthly issues for Six Shillings, post free.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault, the leading spirit of the Anarchist "Autonomie Group No. 7," meets his colleagues in a club near the Caledonian Road on the eve of President Carnot's assassination. He shoots a traitor who has almost betrayed the Group and so saved Carnot's life. Then he tells them that he is about to emigrate with a society of Socialists, one of whom, Frederick Austen, a wealthy engineer who has been converted to Socialism, takes out with him a working model of an aerial vessel. This air-ship Renault determines to steal when complete, and use for the purpose of bringing about an Anarchist reign of terror. Meanwhile, Franz Hartog is to steal a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer, which is to be built at Elbing for the Russian Government, and, with her, to levy blackmail on the Atlantic, and so raise funds to build an Anarchist aerial fleet.

On Christmas Day, 1898, the Calypso, a steam yacht belonging to Sir Harry Milton, sights an island in the South Pacific, from which an electric launch, the Mermaid, puts off and tows the yacht in. Frank Markham, in command of the launch, tells Sir Harry, with whom are travelling his sister, Violet, and Herbert Wyndham, a lieutenant in the British Navy, on sick leave, that the island is Utopia, a Socialist Colony, founded some three years before by emigrants from England. On the island Sir Harry finds Frederick Austen, an old friend of his father's, who introduces the visitors to Edward Adams and Max Renault and the rest of the Utopians, and after lunch tells them the story of Utopia. Later on, Lieutenant Wyndham describes the outrages committed by the vessel Hartog has stolen from Elbing—on the Atlantic, and Mr. Austen vows that if no one else can sink the Destroyer the Utopians will. Wyndham inspects the Nautilus, a most formidable craft. Late that night, when the Lieutenant and Sir Harry are taking a stroll upon the hills, they are astounded by the apparition of an air-ship soaring across the mountains in the interior of the island. The next morning Sir Harry and Wyndham further discuss the problem raised by the appearance of the air-ship, and the latter determines to resign his commission and throw in his lot with the Utopians; but just as he is telling Sir Harry this, Renault appears unexpectedly and interrupts their conversation. A week later, a pic-nic is held on Mount Plato. Wyndham and Violet are lost sight of during the afternoon, and, as the others are searching for them, they see the air-ship rise from the crater of Mount Orient, and as it does so something white falls from its deck down into the crater.

CHAPTER IX.

A Double Tragedy.

In breathless silence, a silence in which wonder, fear, and horror were blended, the four spectators on the crater of Mount Plato watched the rapidly played out drama in the air that could scarcely fail to prove a tragedy which should cast a gloom over the lives, not only of the visitors to Utopia, but also over those of everyone on the island.

To Sir Harry it meant a sudden, irresistible, and agonising conviction that, somehow or other, the fate alike of his sister and his friend was involved in it. Without knowing how or why, he instinctively coupled it with the unaccountable absence of Wyndham and Violet from their party. With less reason but equal conviction he jumped to the conclusion that the chief actor in it was Max Renault, the man whom both he and the Lieutenant had insensibly grown both to dislike and mistrust.

But to Adams, and possibly also to the two girls, it meant even more than this. It meant that the air-ship, the priceless triumph of the combined genius of Utopia which was to give the Utopians the command of an empire wider than the confines of earth itself, had fallen into hands that could not be anything else but traitorous and which had taken it, with all its tremendous capacity for good and evil, away from the island to employ it in work at the nature of which they could only dimly guess.

She waved her hand to them as she swerved past.

Adams was the first to recover his self-command. Like the others he had followed the swiftly moving air-ship on her seaward course until she became a speck in the distance. Then he turned to Sir Harry and said in a tone that he vainly tried to keep steady:

"Our secret is out—and lost, I'm afraid! I can't understand it yet, but we can talk about that afterwards. There has been foul play over yonder and something terrible has happened, I am sure. Come along, we'll go over to the other crater. It's no use wasting time talking. Come along—I'll show you the way! You girls had better go back and tell the others and ask them to send up what help they can. We shall probably want it. You will know where to find us afterwards."

Dora and Lucy saw at once that this was the thing to do, and they were just starting back to the party on the plateau when Lucy stopped and without a word ran back into the crater. Hardly four minutes had passed before the others heard a clatter of hoofs and saw her come tearing at full gallop up the steep path that led out of the crater seated astride the back of the Shetland pony after the fashion of the ladies of Mexico. She waved her hand to them as she swerved past, and then went away at headlong speed down the mountain path towards the plateau.

"Bravo, Lucy!" cried Dora, following her with admiring eyes. "That was a better idea than walking or even running back. She'll be there in half the time that we could have got there together in. And now I can go with you; perhaps I may be useful."

"Yes, you will," said Sir Harry, "if what I fear has happened. I hope Lucy won't be thrown or have an accident before she gets there, riding at such a speed as that."

"There's not much fear of that," replied Dora. "There isn't a pony on the island that could throw her even without a saddle, and Grey-Legs is one of the surest-footed ponies we have. I wish we had three more here and we'd soon be at Mount Mystery—which is Mount Mystery no longer. Come along, let us get away!"

A narrow barely-defined path led down the eastern side of Mount Plato into the valley which separated it from the smaller mountain, and along this the three walked rapidly, Adams leading, Sir Harry in the middle, and Dora being at the rear. As soon as they had cleared the rougher ground of the crater, they broke into a trot which soon brought them to the ascent leading up to the gap which was now plainly visible in the wall of the second crater. Here their speed was reduced to a walk again, and as they were climbing the steep ascent Sir Harry told Adams how the secret of the existence of the air-ship had been accidentally revealed to him and Wyndham a week before.

Digitized by Google

"I'm afraid that may do something towards explaining the mystery," said Adams in reply. "I wish to Heaven you had told me about it at once and then we might have taken some precautions."

"What do you mean?" asked Sir Harry.

"I can't explain now," said Adams, "and even if I could I don't suppose it would do much good. Whatever harm is done is done. Here we are. That is where the air-ship was built and where it ought to have been in hiding since you came. None of us, as far as I know, knew anything about the trip that she took on the night you speak of. She has only just been completed after numberless experiments, in her present form, and her trial trip was not to have taken place until you had left the island. That means treachery on someone's part."

The body of a man.

"And that someone is your engineer, Renault," said Sir Harry between his teeth as he followed Adams down the steep zigzag path that led to the interior of the crater.

The crater of Mount Orient, to give it the name which the Utopians had bestowed upon it in consequence of its easterly position, was a nearly circular plain with a diameter of about half a mile. It was covered with an abundant vegetation which proved it to have been quiescent longer than that of Mount Plato. The dense vegetation not only covered its floor but even robed its almost perpendicular walls with a thick leafy mass of trees interlaced with long flowering creepers.

Adams led the way rapidly down the path, but half way Dora, who was still bringing up the rear, stopped and pointing with one hand said:

"Look yonder, just by the clearing! Don't you see something white up in the trees there where that big palm is, just by the crater wall?"

They stopped and looked, and there sure enough in the rapidly fading light they made out a patch of something white showing against the dark green of the foliage.

"Come along, for God's sake!" almost gasped Sir Harry. "Heaven only knows what that white thing may be."

And before the words were well out of his mouth, Adams had sprung forward and plunged into a hidden path that ran along the floor of the crater under the trees. Sir Harry and Dora followed hard on his heels, and a few minutes' run brought them out into a little oval clearing in the midst of which stood a pallisading of palm trunks interlaced with wattles and creepers to a height of about twenty feet.

A door leading into it stood open, and as Adams ran through this he paused for a moment, uttered a half stifled cry and then ran on followed by the others. In the centre of the enclosure stood a raised platform some two hundred feet long by a hundred broad flanked on one side by a row of huts which evidently served as workshops. The platform was vacant save for a light frame-work of scaffolding which ran across its greater length, and the body of a man which lay beside it face downwards with the arms spread out.

One glance was enough to tell them that it was that of the Lieutenant. Adams and Sir Harry leapt on to the platform at the same moment and raised him very gently from the planks. His limbs were limp and inert, and as they lifted him his head fell forward on his breast.

"This looks like murder," said Adams as they raised him. "Good Heavens!—to think that we must have had a murder even in Utopia. Look there under his shoulder-blade. He's been stabbed in the back!"

"Yes," said Sir Harry thickly. "It must have been that, but perhaps he's not quite dead yet. Poor Bertie! I'm afraid that scoundrel overheard us after all, and this is the result."

"Run and get some water, Dora, quick!" cried Adams. "Have a look in the store-room and see if there is any brandy or anything of the sort there. Look sharp, there's a good girl!"

Dora without a word jumped off the platform and darted away on her errand, and meanwhile Adams and Sir Harry with one impulse tore off, the one his cloak and the other his jacket, and rolled them up to make a pillow for Wyndham's head. Then they laid him on his side and Adams, whipping out his knife, cut through his jacket and shirt and laid open a small clean-cut wound just under the left shoulder-blade out of which a few drops of fresh blood oozed very slowly.

"He's not dead yet," cried Sir Harry, "or else the wound wouldn't bleed. Thank God for that! The brute's knife must just have missed his heart."

"Yes, we'll soon have a pad over that," said Adams. "Give me your handkerchief and hold his head up a minute."

Sir Harry obeyed, and he pulled his light woollen cloak from under Wyndham's head, tore it into three or four strips and then, making a pad out of Sir Harry's silk handkerchief and his own, staunched the wound and bandaged it as skilfully and as rapidly as a surgeon could have done.

"Now we can lay him on his back," he continued. "Ah, here comes Dora with the water and a bottle of brandy. Now we shall be able to bring him to, I think."

In another moment Dora was beside them with the bottle in one hand and a water-jug in the other. Sir Harry half emptied the brandy into the water and bathed Wyndham's cold, pallid face with it. To his unspeakable relief his eyes half opened and a faint sigh escaped from his lips.

In a moment Dora had poured some brandy on her handkerchief and squeezed a few drops into his mouth. His eyes opened wider, and another sigh, this time stronger, came accompanied by a slight convulsive movement of his chest. Then Sir Harry raised him to a half-sitting position, kneeling beside him and letting his body rest against his knees.

He opened his eyes fully and looked about him with a dazed expression of a man waking from an evil dream. A faint inarticulate sound came from his lips as Adams held the jug to them. He drank a little almost mechanically, and as he swallowed it a faint shudder ran through his body. He looked at them with reason dawning in his eyes, and with a painful effort whispered:

"Where's Violet—and the air-ship—Renault?" and then his head fell back against Sir Harry's arm and he fainted.

The two men looked at each other blankly for a moment, and Dora, suddenly clasping her hands together, exclaimed in a low, broken voice:

"Oh, poor Violet, I see it now! I see what happened. Renault must have taken her up in the air-ship with him and she threw herself out. It was her white dress that we saw falling and that must be her up in the trees. Carry him to the living shed and put him in one of the berths. I'll nurse him till the others come, and you go and see if you can find poor Violet. It was an awful fall, but perhaps it hasn't killed her."

It was plainly the best thing to be done, and so they did it.

Digitized by Google

They lifted the wounded man very gently between them and carried him from the platform into one of the huts which had been used as a living room by those who had been at work on the air-ship. Here they laid him in a low, comfortable berth, first seeing that his wound had not begun to bleed again, and then, after reviving him again with a little more brandy, left him to Dora's gentle care.

The first thing Adams did was to go into another of the huts and bring out a long coil of light strong rope and a light grappling iron that had been meant for one of the anchors of the air-ship. He gave these to Sir Harry and vanished into the hut again, re-appearing this time with a couple of strong bill-hooks, a hatchet, and a bag of spikes.

"Now we're ready," he said. "Come along! If she is there we will soon have her down. I haven't been three years in Utopia without learning how to climb palm trees."

It took them nearly twenty minutes to hack and push their way through the thick undergrowth that lay between the enclosure and the tall palm by the wall of the crater which Dora had pointed out. When they got under it a single glance upwards showed them that Dora's guess had been right. Lying on the broad umbrella-like expanse of the great radiating leaves of the palm crest, more than a hundred feet from the ground, lay in a huddled heap a form which could be no other than Violet's.

The palm trunk leant outwards at a considerable angle from the crater wall, and Adams, slinging the bag of spikes round his neck and fastening one end of the rope round his waist, took out a spike and drove it in to the sloping side of the trunk as high as he could reach. Then, telling Sir Harry to keep the rope clear, he swarmed up, got his foot upon it and drove another one in about five feet above it. Then he mounted on to this one and drove in another, and so on up the tree.

Sir Harry slid and climbed with his burden down from spike to spike.

Sir Harry stood below and watched him in the dusk with straining eyes, scarcely daring to breathe in his anxiety lest the swaying of the trunk, which perceptibly increased as he got higher and higher, should dislodge Violet from the top and destroy their last hope by flinging her to the ground. Adams' last spike only carried him to within about ten feet of the top. Sir Harry could just see him stop and saw in an instant what was the matter.

"Can't you get any higher?" he shouted. "Shall I get some more spikes and bring them up to you?"

"No," said Adams, "there is no need for that. I can almost reach the top. Can you climb?"

"Yes. I can climb up there, at any rate."

"Very well then, come up. Does the rope reach to the ground?"

"Yes, and plenty to spare."

"All right, then come along and be careful."

Before the words were out of his mouth Sir Harry had got his foot on the first spike and was climbing quickly, but cautiously, up the trunk. When he reached the last, Adams, putting his arms and legs round the trunk, swarmed up until he got a hold of the root of one of the leaves.

"Now," he said, "get your foot on to the last spike, hold tight, and let me get my foot on your shoulder."

Sir Harry did as he was bidden with a steadiness that spoke volumes for his muscles and his nerves, and in another minute Adams had crawled up through the leaves and on to the crest of the tree. Sir Harry waited for a moment in agonised suspense until he heard him say:

"She's here, insensible and badly injured I'm afraid, but I don't believe she's dead. At any rate, we'll have her down in a few minutes. You stop there and get ready to take her."

Then he hauled up the rope, passed the other end round her body and made it fast in a loop under her arms. Then slowly and with infinite care he raised her from where she was lying and worked her towards the side where her brother was waiting to take hold of her. The great leaves of the palm swayed horribly, and Sir Harry expected every moment to see them both go crashing through to the ground, a hundred feet below. But Adams knew what he was about, and the expected never came.

He managed to get himself firmly planted in the crown of the tree, with his legs wedged between the leaves, and then, holding the slack of the rope in his teeth, he gradually pushed the body of the unconscious girl forward and downwards until her brother got his one free arm round her waist. Then, bracing himself in his seat, he took the rope in one hand, steadying her with the other, and said:

Digitized by Google

"Now, if you've got her, slide down to the next spike. I'll keep her weight on the rope. Don't be afraid of her falling."

"All right," said Sir Harry. "Lower away."

And then with a rustle Violet disappeared through the leaves. Tearing his clothes and his skin against the rough rind of the tree, Sir Harry slid and climbed with his burden down from spike to spike, Adams always keeping the rope sufficiently taut to relieve him of the greater part of her weight, until at length, bleeding and breathless, he passed the last spike and laid her on the ground.

"It's all right, Adams," he shouted in a hoarse, gasping voice. "Thank God she is safe so far, if she is only alive!"

"Good," replied Adams, at once lowering himself out of the top. "I'll be down in a minute and then we'll carry her to the shed."

CHAPTER X.

SIR HARRY'S RESOLVE.

By the time they got Violet back to the shed and laid in one of the berths, Lucy had returned on her pony from the camping ground with the news that Mr. Austen, with Mark Edwards, a young physician who had joined the colony with the second party of emigrants, and Doctor Roberts, the surgeon of the Calypso, a bluff, good-natured man of considerable talent and more experience, whom it has not been necessary to introduce to the reader before, were coming after her on ponies, and that her own mother and Dora's would also be there before long to take charge of either of the missing guests if any nursing was necessary.

Well, Roberts."

She was, of course, terribly shocked to learn the nature and extent of the misfortunes that had brought the day's enjoyment to such a terrible end, but, with the same promptness that she had displayed in going for help, she settled down at once to help Dora in doing what could be done for Violet before the doctors came, while Sir Harry and Adams looked after the wounded Lieutenant. In less than half an hour later the anxiously awaited assistance came, and Doctor Roberts at once took charge of Violet, who was still alive, although all efforts to restore her to consciousness had failed, while Doctor Edwards attended to the Lieutenant.

Violet had been laid in a hut by herself, and the doctor would allow no one to enter this until he had completed his examination of her injuries. Sir Harry waited outside in miserable anxiety, pacing up and down in front of the sheds with set teeth and knitted brows, thinking now of the terrible calamity which he felt sure must have fallen upon the bright young life of his only sister, and now of the scoundrel who had so wantonly wrought so much evil on those who had never harmed him.

He had not continued his walk long before Mr. Austen joined him and received from him a more detailed and coherent account of what had really happened than Lucy had been able to give him. To say that he was unspeakably distressed and bewildered by the strange and terrible events of the evening would be far from describing his true state of mind.

"I am utterly at a loss to conceive," he said after Sir Harry had told his story, "either what motive Renault could have had for committing such a dreadful crime, or what could have induced him to turn traitor to the colony, as he undoubtedly has done, and steal the air-ship from us."

"I can understand that more easily," said Sir Harry, "than I can see why such a man with a weapon of destruction like the air-ship under his command should have been content to leave the island without doing even more damage than he did. I should have thought that he could have destroyed as many of us as he chose when he was once in the air, to say nothing of blowing up the settlement and the dockyard. From what Wyndam told me, it would be perfectly easy for an air-ship to do that."

"That is very simply explained," replied Mr. Austen. "From what has happened I'm afraid there is no doubt but that he would have done so if he could, but, happily for us, we have not yet made the necessary explosives for that sort of work. You see we had no intention of using the air-ship for warlike purposes, unless, indeed, it had ever become necessary to defend Utopia against aggression or assault. We have, in fact, scarcely any weapons at all on the island, so, you see, he couldn't use what he hadn't got."

"But what about the explosive which you are going to use to work the engines of the Nautilus?" objected Sir Harry. "I should have thought that would have made the most fearfully effective bombs. It must be terribly powerful."

"So it is, but then it will deflagrate at no lower temperature than that of the electric spark. It would be tremendously effective in mines or torpedoes, but it wouldn't do for bombs or projectiles which had to be exploded by the shock of contact. If it did it wouldn't be safe to carry it in large quantities even on board a ship. It is just to that fact that we probably owe all our lives."

"I see; but then, as Renault knew that you possessed the secret of this explosive and of the others which I suppose you intended to use, as well as the knowledge of the construction of the air-ship, why did he not kill you before he left the island so as to be the sole possessor of secrets which would have placed the world practically at his mercy?"

"That," replied Mr. Austen, with a perceptible shudder, "is probably because in the first place he would have had to kill not only myself but Adams, Doctor Edwards, and our old pioneer Ambrose Miller, before he could have been sure of the sole possession of the secret of the motor-fuel, and again because I have no doubt but that the scheme that he put into action to-day was finally conceived and carried out on the spur of the moment.

"It is obvious that he intended to carry your sister off with him by force, and he must have seized some opportunity that presented itself this afternoon and which made him resolve to risk everything on the success of the one bold stroke without waiting to carry out the other designs which I daresay he had."

"You are probably right," said Sir Harry. "Now I come to think of it it has crossed my mind two or three times during the last week that the fellow was trying to pay more attention to poor Violet than mere politeness demanded. I wonder how long Roberts—ah, there he is at last! You'll excuse me, won't you; I must go and hear what he has to say at once."

Just as he spoke the doctor came out of the hut looking very serious, and asked Mrs. Merton to go in again with him for a few moments. Then, leaving her with Violet, he went to Sir Harry, who greeted him with:

"Well, Roberts, is there any hope for her? Tell me the worst at once because it can't be worse than what I have been dreading for her."

"My dear fellow," said the doctor putting his arm through his and leading him away from the others, "I'm not going to attempt to disguise from you the fact that the poor girl is very badly injured. Of course I've not been able to make a very complete examination yet, and I can't until I have the necessary instruments from the ship, but as far as I have been able to go I have found that the right leg is broken both above and below the knee, the collar bone is broken, and the right shoulder badly dislocated. So far there is nothing in that that a strong young girl couldn't get better from, but I am sadly afraid that there's serious injury to the spine as well and concussion of the brain on the top of that."

Digitized by Google

The doctor felt the muscles of Sir Harry's arm quiver as he spoke, but as he didn't speak for a moment he went on:

"So far I don't know whether or not there are any internal injuries, but of course there may be. She has evidently had an awful fall, and only being caught in the top of that palm tree saved her from being smashed out of all human shape. As it is we can only be thankful that she is alive and do our best to pull her through."

"Then that's the worst as far as you can tell me, is it?" asked Sir Harry in a hard, strained voice. "God knows it's bad enough, poor girl, even if it's no worse than that!"

"Yes, that's the worst as far as I know, but I must also tell you that there is no real reason for despairing. That young Edwards, although he's a Socialist, seems a very clever, well-informed man. In fact, he's a St. Mary's man and an M.D. of London as well, so he must be pretty good. I can't think what on earth brought him out to an outlandish place like this. Might have done splendidly in England, I've no doubt. Perhaps he had no capital, and brains won't do without that nowadays.

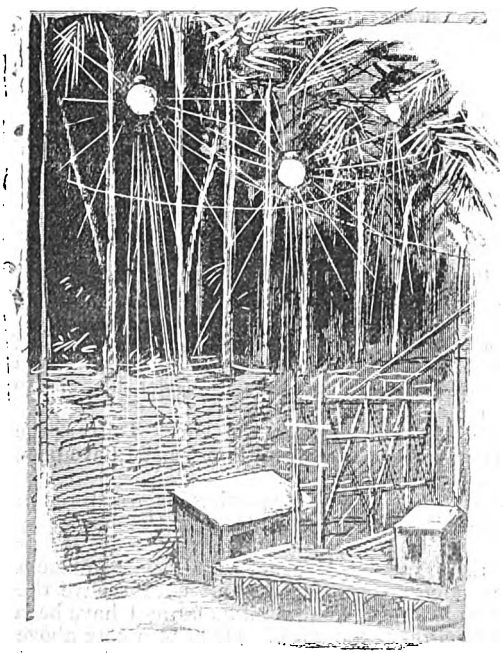
"However that's nothing to do with it. As soon as Mrs. Merton has done what I've asked her to do, Edwards and I will set the broken bones and do everything else that is necessary and can be done. For the rest we must trust to Nature and a good constitution."

"And what about Wyndham?" asked Sir Harry.

"Oh, he'll do, I think. That wound's nothing to the one he had in Africa. If the knife had gone under instead of over the rib that it struck it would have touched the heart and finished him. As it is there is nothing to stop him being about again in three months, especially in a magnificent climate like this.

"I don't think we shall have either of them moved from here, at any rate for the present. This mountain air is splendid and the valley is perfectly sheltered. Couldn't have a more perfect place for a sanatorium, so we must turn a couple of these huts into hospitals for the time being, and Edwards and I will take turns in constant attendance as long as it's necessary. You can rest assured that everything that can be done will be done."

"Yes, Roberts," replied Sir Harry, laying his hand on the doctor's shoulder, "I'm perfectly certain of that. I know you'll do your best, and God grant it may be good enough. Now can I go and see her?"



The electric lights . . . were turned on.

"No, certainly not at present," replied the doctor, shaking his head decisively. "That would do no good either to you or to her. In the first place she is unconscious still, and in the second place the moment Mrs. Merton is ready Edwards and I must set to work to reduce the fractures. Every minute is of consequence and makes successful setting harder, so you must wait until our work is done. Go to Wyndham and look after him. As soon as I can let you see your sister you shall do so. Now be off. Don't let Wyndham talk, but you can tell him that Miss Violet is still alive, and for all I know not likely to die."

So saying the doctor pushed Sir Harry gently in the direction of the Lieutenant's hut, and then entered the one in which Violet was lying.

No one left the crater of Mount Orient that night. Messengers had been despatched by Mr. Austen to the settlement and the yacht, to bring up everything that was necessary, from the doctor's instruments to provisions and tents for those for whom there would be no room in the huts. Fires were lighted, and the electric lights by which the constructors of the air-ship had worked by night were turned on. Like the other machinery used in building the dynamos were driven by water power, so the current was always ready for use.

Before ten o'clock quite a train of ponies and donkeys had arrived from the settlement, and within an hour everyone had settled down into his or her place in the impromptu camp and was doing something for the present or future comfort of the two invalids. If the welfare of the whole colony had depended upon their recovery no more could have been done for them than their kind-hearted hosts did.

No one spoke of the terrible, but not irreparable, loss that Utopia had sustained through Renault stealing the air-ship, or of the perils that might menace it if he came back armed with explosives to take revenge for his partial failure, and to destroy those who would be alone able to build a second cruiser of the air capable of opposing the one that he had stolen. For the time being the Utopians seemed entirely engrossed by the misfortunes that had befallen their guests and to have no time to consider their own.

It was a little before midnight, when Wyndham had dropped off to sleep and Violet still remained invisible by the doctor's orders, that Sir Harry, Mr. Austen, and Adams were taking a turn in the clearing before going to bed, and Sir Harry was speaking quietly, but in a voice that bespoke a resolution of no small moment;

"I have seen enough to-day and to-night," he said, "to convince me that in allying myself with you, if you will have me, I shall be doing the best thing that I can do, not only for myself and poor Violet, if she survives what she has to go through, but also for the world at large. I didn't tell you before, but I may tell you now, that when Wyndham and I first discovered that you possessed an air-ship he decided to throw up his commission in the British Navy and offer his services to you as navigating lieutenant of the Nautilus.

"If you can see your way to making him that when he gets well I think you will do well, for I know that he is a very skilful sailor as well as being as brave as a lion, and that he is really thought a great deal of by the authorities at home, especially after that last affair of his on the West Coast."

"Yes," said Mr. Austen, "I am quite sure of that, and I can tell you that he won't even need to ask for the command of the Nautilus if he is willing to take it."

"I am glad to hear it," continued Sir Harry. "Now, as regards myself, of course you know I am one of those somewhat useless creatures called gentlemen of fortune, and so I have been trained to nothing useful and know nothing useful. But I have one thing that's useful, and that's money. Happily I have plenty of that, and with your help I'm ready to devote every penny that I have got to the work of hunting down that scoundrel Renault and punishing him for what he has done to-day.

"If you can teach me to do anything else you'll find me willing to learn, but that I'm ready to do now. I can raise half a million if necessary as soon as I get back to England, and another million after that if it is wanted to build cruisers and air-ships and find the best material and talent for the work that money can buy. You can think over what I have said to-night and give me your answer in the morning."

"There's no need for that," said Adams. "If you like to join your fortunes with ours, either for good or until your object is accomplished, there is no one in Utopia who will not welcome you, and as for the help that you offer us in repairing our loss, that, too, we will accept in the same spirit in which it is made; so that is a bargain between us, either as friends for the time being or comrades for good."

Digitized by Google

"Lieutenant Wyndham has just woke up. He is much better and wants to speak to Sir Harry at once," said Dora, who had joined them unperceived while they were talking.

Sir Harry went at once and found his friend sitting in his berth propped up by pillows.

"How's Violet?" he asked, almost in a whisper.

Sir Harry shook his head.

"I don't know yet, old man," he said. "Roberts won't let me see her yet, but he tells me there is no immediate danger. What do you want me for? You mustn't talk too much, you know."

"I know," replied Wyndham. "But I've just remembered where I saw that fellow Renault, and I want to tell you before I forget again. It was nearly four years ago, when I was on leave in London. The police had raided an Anarchist club somewhere up near the Caledonian Road, and a friend of mine, a barrister, was retained to prosecute the fellows who were caught. Renault was one of them, but he called himself Louis Rolland then.

"Lieutenant Wyndham has just woke up."

"They found him with explosives in the house, just the things that the Anarchists use in making their bombs, and they also found correspondence which made it plain enough to my mind that he and the others had something to do with the murder of President Carnot. The case was as plain as daylight against them, but they had a very smart man for them, and because it couldn't be actually proved that they were using the explosives to manufacture bombs the whole lot got off.*

"Take my word for it, Renault's an Anarchist, pure and simple, and he has stolen the air-ship to go and join those fellows in the Destroyer. The Lord only knows what will happen if he succeeds."

"And Heaven only can prevent it," added Sir Harry, "for no earthly power can."

(To be continued next week.)

* [An almost identical case occurred in London only a short time ago.—AUTHOR.]

La Belle Americaine.

HER ADVENTURE WITH A SPRIG OF THE NOBILITY.

A WELL-PRESERVED elderly man, with a pleasant expression, iron-grey hair, and faultlessly dressed, might have been occasionally seen strolling along the Promenade des Anglais, at Nice, last winter. He peered a good deal under the bonnets of pretty women. But there was a demure and half-respectful expression in his glance which at once dispelled any rising feeling of resentment. His serious, sympathetic, half-smile, combined with his age, gave him a certain immunity which would not be extended to younger men. He was known in society as Mr. John P. Chase, of Chicago City.

Mr. Chase, accompanied by his daughter, arrived in the Riviera last November. He took up his abode in a small, but pretty villa on the outskirts of Nice, and signified his intention of staying the whole season. Very soon after his arrival it was rumoured that Mr. John P. Chase was a millionaire, a "king" of railways, iron, or something, rumour did not know what; nevertheless, Society received both him and his daughter with open arms. The people who benefit their health and lose their money at the Riviera are generally a nice set; so the American millionaire was soon able to number some of the best patrons of Mentone and Nice amongst his acquaintances. His conduct in public was most exemplary. That mystic word "millionaire" acted as a charm against all prejudice, and also commanded the society of a select circle of parasites.

Miss Nathalie Chase was of that type which police-court reporters would have termed "of prepossessing appearance." She was tall and graceful; too slight, it may be, to fulfil the rigorous standard of womanly beauty, but possessed a figure rounded and symmetrical as a nymph's, with the same length of limb and airiness of gesture which painters have combined to confer on those strange mythological coquettes.

They were seen everywhere. On the Promenade des Anglais in the afternoon, and in the evening at Monte Carlo, enjoying a mild game of roulette—with friends, of course. In Nice, Nellie Chase was the belle, greatly to the envy of numbers of other fair damsels who were being put up for sale in the matrimonial market by their mammon-seeking parents. The men swarmed round her to bask in her sweet smiles wherever she went, and she seemed to thoroughly relish a flirtation.

There was one youth whom she particularly favoured. He was the Hon. Bertie Mashem, whom everybody knew to be heir to the fine estates of the Earl of Slushford. He occupied one of the best suites of rooms in the Hôtel Paris, and was generally thought by scheming mothers to be a fish worth baiting for. When Chase père and fille appeared upon the scene these mothers waxed exceeding wroth, in consequence of the Hon. Bertie turning up his nose at their bargains and transferring his inconstant affections to the newcomer.

Digitized by Google

At first he set about to become on intimate terms with the millionaire, lunching and dining him at his hotel in princely style, and then by degrees he gradually grew friendly with the girl. In fact, it was he who had placed them en evidence with society, and had introduced them to all the best people.

The Hon. Bertie rather prided himself on his game of écarté, and, strange to say, Mr. Chase also estimated himself a player, so it was hardly a matter for surprise that they kept touch with the "form" displayed by other visitors, and frequently passed their evenings within the precincts of the much-abused Casino. Money passed very freely between Mashem and the American, and the game frequently ended by Bertie's victory, and some disguised chagrin on the part of his friend.

One evening Bertie and Nathalie were strolling along the terrace over-looking the Mediterranean. The gaming-room was crowded, and a walk under the oranges and palms was delightfully cool and refreshing after play, which had lasted several hours. Bertie had won, as usual, and left Chase, in order to obtain a tête-à-tête with Nellie.

They had walked some distance, when the girl said to her companion, "What a magnificent moon! We don't get such as that on our side."

"Yes," replied Bertie, "it's almost as lovely as you, my darling."

"A compliment, most truly," she said, with a smile and a mocking bow.

He paused for a moment, and raising her tiny gloved hand to his lips, said, "Nell, my darling, I love you!" Placing his arms round her neck, there in the moonlight he told her the oft-repeated story in a truly romantic fashion.

Before they again moved along over the gravelled path Nathalie Chase had promised to become the betrothed of the Hon. Bertie Mashem, and the latter had promised to "ask papa" at the earliest opportunity. They had vowed eternal affection, and the young lady had signified her intention of having "a swagger wedding," to which her adorer readily acquiesced. . . . At last she had "caught on" a good thing.

On the following morning, Bertie, after attiring himself in gorgeous raiment, and paying particular attention to the minor details of his toilet, duly appeared at the millionaire's villa, and was accorded an interview.

"Wal, you're real early this morning, Bertie," said Mr. John P. Chase, of Chicago, when his friend was ushered into the neat little drawing-room.

"Air so invigorating, don't you know. Can't sleep at night." The latter part of the sentence was quite true, for he had been awake most part of the night, thinking of the undeniable loveliness of his fiancée.

"Have a corpse reviver? Nellie isn't up yet, the lazy little puss."

"Aw—thanks, my dear Chase, I'll have nothing. I've come to talk to you on a little matter of business."

"Business, eh? What's up?"

"Well—er," said Bertie, as he took his seat, "the fact of the matter is, I want your consent that Nathalie may become my wife."

John P. Chase looked a little astonished, pulled his grey moustache thoughtfully, and said: "Hum! You surprise me very much. Out West they don't usually make matches as quick as this."

"True," stammered Bertie; "but I really love her, and she's willing to be mine."

"What is your position?"

"I'm heir to the estates of the Earl of Slushford, my uncle, which means eight thousand pounds a year."

"What's that in dollars?"

"Don't know. Always was a duffer at figures."

"How old is your uncle?"

"Aw, it's very nearly time he croaked, for he's over eighty."

John P. Chase gave a grunt of satisfaction over this intelligence, and was silent for a moment.

"Well, Mr. Mashem, your expectations ain't what we call tall, but I'll give my consent to the union providing you're willing to render me a small service."

Bertie was delighted.

"Most certainly," he replied; "I am perfectly at your command."

The millionaire drew his chair closer, and in a half-whisper said, with a stronger nasal accent than usual:

"Look here, I've been playing heavily since I've been in this 'ere place, and I'm what you may call slightly embarrassed. Only temporarily, of course, but I don't want to draw on my bankers in New York; besides it would take time."

"I understand thoroughly. Er—what amount——."

"Only a few hundred pounds."

The Honourable Bertie put his hand into his breast pocket and produced his cheque-book. His companion placed a pen and ink before him.

"Now, how much?"

"I leave it to you," replied John P.

Mashem placed his signature to a cheque, and handing it to him said:

"Fill it in yourself, my deah fellah, and don't be afraid."

The American took it with a smile, and an expression of thanks, adding that he trusted Nellie would "love, honour, and obey" him.

The Duke of Slushford's heir then withdrew, and the same evening took his future bride for a drive along the lovely Corniche road.

The next day he went over to San Remo, to make a dutiful visit to a fossilised maiden aunt, but even before he alighted from the train, he felt a longing to return to his fair American. After three days he could stand it no longer, so he returned to Nice by the rapide, and drove at once to the villa.

"Is Miss Chase within?" he asked of the servant who answered the door.

"No, both monsieur and mademoiselle left the day before yesterday, and have not since returned."

Bertie was dumfounded. He inquired if any message had been left, but, as none was forthcoming, he drove to his hotel.

"Any letters for me, Farren?" he asked of his man.

"Yes, sir, this one."

Bertie tore it open eagerly, and read. His face grew pale, and he sank into an adjacent arm-chair.

The letter ran as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—Many thanks for your cheque, which I have filled up for £5,000. I shall be obliged if you will discontinue your thoughts regarding Nathalie, for instead of being my daughter she is my wife.—Faithfully yours,

"J. P. CHASE."

"P.S.—I will repay you the loan when we next meet."

Mashem at once wired his bankers to stop the cheque, but, alas! the reply came that it had been cashed. The Hon. Bertie had been "rushed."

Next morning, happening to take up Galignani in the hotel reading-room, his eye caught the following paragraph:—

"ARREST OF SWINDLERS.—Late last night the police arrested at the Gare St. Lazare the soi-disant American millionaire, named Chase, and also his wife, who were about to proceed to London. For some time past the police have kept observation upon them, and we hear their latest victim was a young English nobleman, who is at Nice. A considerable sum of money was found upon the man, who, it appears, has practised systematic frauds."

Bertie succeeded in regaining four thousand pounds, and is now very careful about his cheques—especially blank ones. The "millionaire" and his pretty wife will live at the expense of the Republic for several years to come.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A POSITIVE REMEDY

FOR CORPULENCE.

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos.—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes:—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeed only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic troubles which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite is appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get his book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—Extract from The Million.

Digitized by Google

500,000 POPULAR SONGS

(Words and Music),

TO BE GIVEN AWAY.

2s. Post Free. "Go to Bye-Bye, Pussie," PUBLISHED AT 4s. 2s. Post Free.

Written and Composed by JOSEPH TABRAR,

AUTHOR AND COMPOSER OF

"DADDY WOULDN'T BUY ME A BOW-WOW,"

One of the Thousands of Songs I had the pleasure of Writing and Composing for Popular Artistes. I consider

2s. Post Free. "Go to Bye-Bye, Pussie," 2s. Post Free.

The prettiest of all my Compositions, and being determined to make it as Popular as

"DADDY WOULDN'T BUY ME A BOW-WOW,"

I guarantee—as an inducement to one and all—to present each Purchaser of

2s. Post Free. "Go to Bye-Bye, Pussie," 2s. Post Free.

WITH 40 OTHER POPULAR SONGS (Words and Music Complete),

Making in all 41 Popular Songs, including the following:—

DOWN THE ROAD,	CAT CAME BACK,	BUNK-A-DOODLE-I-DO,
THEY ALL TAKE AFTER ME,	SHIPMATES,	AFTER THE BALL,
ONE OF THE BOYS,	THE ROWDY DOWDY BOYS,	TWIGGY VOUS,
AND THE VERDICT WAS,	COMRADES,	KNOCKED 'EM IN CHICAGO,
HAVE A DRINK, BOYS,	HALF-PAST NINE,	'GARN AWAY,
MY FAIRY MARY GREEN,	TWO LITTLE GIRLS IN BLUE,	OO-DIDDLY-OO', ACCIDENTS,

"DADDY WOULDN'T BUY ME A BOW-WOW,"

And 19 others, making, as above stated, 41 in all. Each Parcel contains a litho photo of myself. One Parcel, Post free, 2s.; Two Parcels, 3s. 6d. (P.O. preferred.)

Address—

JOSEPH TABRAR,

168, STAMFORD STREET, LONDON, S.E.

N.B.—The above gigantic offer may sound absurd, but it is nevertheless a FACT, as the following Testimonials will prove:—

SIR,—The parcel received, which is the best 2s. worth I have ever known.—Yours, 9, Clayton Street, S.E. H. A. DUFFY.

DEAR SIR,—The forty-one songs to hand, with which I am more than delighted.
125, Westminster Bridge Road. CHAS. WILSON.

J. TABRAR, Esq.—Please send two more parcels, for which I enclose P.O.
KITTIE DEE.

J. T. MASS has received your parcel, and is very pleased with same.
13, Sharbutt Street, Poplar.

Digitized by Google

TWO GUINEAS FOR A PLOT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 303. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 20, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

One little Bottle of Norton's Pills,
Is not guaranteed to cure all ills,
But one little Bottle, beyond all question,
Will thoroughly conquer Indigestion!

Trade Mark:

One little Bottle.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH,
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.
Prepared by NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BEETHAM'S

WORLD FAMED

CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists

CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

PLUMTREE'S

HOME-POTTED

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE. MEATS

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

Digitized by Google

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc, Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,

8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

BE ADVISED

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities, as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states:—"Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA COMPANY, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 303. FOR THE WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 20, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

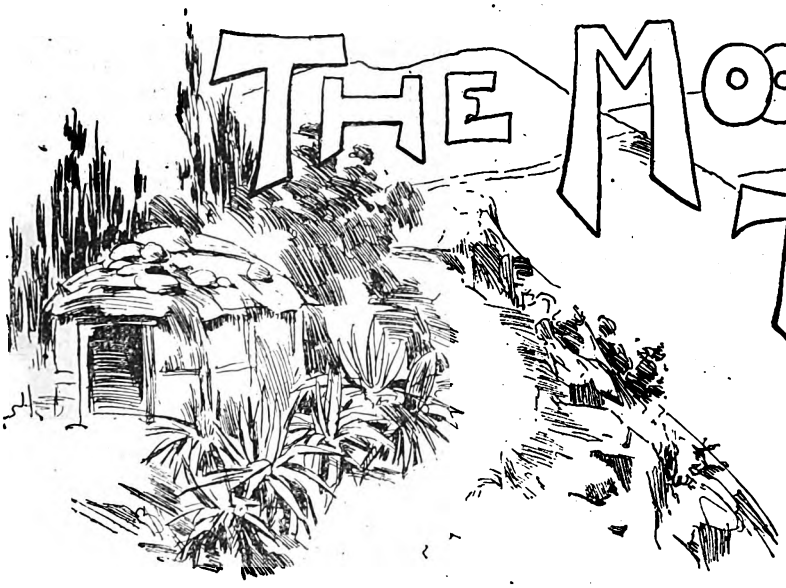
THE MOORISH TREASURE



FAR up the rocky slopes of the Montes de Toledo, off from the narrow donkey-path which zigzagged its tempestuous way up the mountain-side, stood a solitary hut. It was a rudely-constructed, one-roomed affair, with a roof of dirt and stones.

To render its isolation more complete, a hedge of aloes had been grown on the side nearest the trail. On the other side lay a small piece of tilled ground, and in a shallow furrow stood a plough, like the primitive one of Adam of old—the crutch of a tree. It was rudely shod, however, with iron. A small burro browsed beneath a clump of cypress trees in the rear.

Within the bowl-like room of the hut, upon a rude mattress, lay an aged peasant. His hollow cheeks and emaciated form told a story of sickness and suffering, and the white, pathetic face and lustreless eyes showed it was a sickness unto death. Manuel Mendez realised his end was near, and, like many another sin-burdened mortal has done, was easing his final hours by a confession of his deeds and misdeeds to a fellow-man. It was, however, more than the mere relief that comes from imparting burdensome secrets which he sought when he told the young man, who sat upon a low-backed stool beside his bed, the story of his life. Gratitude to his youthful benefactor filled the old man's heart.

An itinerant musician, whose entire worldly possessions consisted of a guitar—which he loved better than his soul—and the clothes upon his back, Juan Tejera had in his wanderings come upon the peasant while lying ill, and out of goodness of heart had remained with and taken care of him. It was to repay this labour of compassion that Manuel taxed the strength of his last moments.

"Brother of my soul," he said tenderly, "thou hast been kind to me when I had almost forgotten that man knew of kindness, so long had it been unseen by me; and befriended me when I was deserted by all others; and in recompense, thou shalt know of a treasure greater than thou hast ever dreamed of. It will make thee richer than all men. And the wealth shall be justly thine, for its owners are long since dead, and dead men have no use for gold."

He paused a moment to collect his waning strength; the young man was bending forward eagerly. Down in the valleys below them the silent forces of darkness were gathering and slowly creeping up the mountain side. As if he felt the silent forces of death were also gathering, and was fearful lest they should overtake him with his narrative unfinished, the old man hastened on with it.

"In my younger days I was noted for my skill as a stone worker, and it once happened I was brought, with a fellow-workman, to the suburb of Albaycin, to repair the fountain in the patio of the palace of the gipsy king. The trouble, we found, was at the bottom of the basin. The water was drawn off, and we had descended to make the necessary repairs. While thus engaged I discovered and called the attention of my companion to a hole at the top of the basin. It was large enough to easily admit a man, and we saw that the overhanging, fancifully carved, marble rim of the basin alike protected it from the observation of any one in the patio above, and from the water in the basin below.

"The palace had been built centuries before by the Moors, and we judged we had discovered the entrance to one of those subterranean passages which are so frequently found beneath their houses. Curious to know more about it, we procured candles and started to investigate. We found, as we had expected, a steep tunnel-like passage, down whose slippery stone floor, greased with the dampness and mould of ages, we slid with an alarming rapidity to a somewhat larger, but level, passage. Once down, the question of how to return immediately presented itself. The descent had been remarkable easy, but to slide up was another matter. Finding we were unable to arrive at any solution of the problem, we concluded to investigate further, in the hope of discovering another outlet. We proceeded along the passage cautiously, stooping low to avoid striking our heads against the rocky roof, and holding our candles before us.

"We walked thus a hundred yards, perhaps, when suddenly we came into a sort of vault, and there—ah, how plainly I can see it yet!—Dios! what a sight it was to men who knew well the pinchings of poverty. Gold! gold! gold! There, in one glittering heap, was more than we could earn in a thousand years of toil. We capered like children about the vault, hugged each other with frenzied joy, and crazily talked plans for spending our wealth.

"Then came a change. A greed possessed me. Why should I share these riches with another? I asked myself. What right had Richardo Gonzalez to the gold which I had discovered? Mine it was, and mine it should be. Like all Spaniards, I carried a knife in the folds of my woollen sash;

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

"I struck him—first."

already I saw a stiletto in Richardo's hand, but too late! I struck him—first."

The speaker had half risen upon his elbow in the excitement of his recollections, but now stopped and fell back. A moment later, when Juan touched his brow, it was already cold. Death had come with the darkness, which now mantled the mountain tops, and lowered the curtain upon an ended life.

Juan rose and passed out of the hut. He was greatly agitated by the strange story he had just listened to. Wild hopes were created by it, and a life of new expectations and new objects was opened before him. He, the strolling beggar, who most of the time was in doubt as to the source of his next meal, having expectations of wealth! How unreal t seemed.

Yet he could already see himself bearing the gold upon his shoulders from the vault; setting up a princely establishment at Madrid—yes, at Madrid it should be, that home of the luxury-loving—and Carlota. Carlota! He repeated the name with ecstasy. Even now he could see the oval face, the soft lustrous eyes, the round, white neck. Was there ever another so fair? An hour since he had scarcely dared to breathe her name, so far had she seemed above him; but now he even dared hope to win the proud señora, with all her beauty and position. With wealth all things were possible.

In the midst of these rapturous dreamings came the alarming thought that perhaps there were important details of the untimely-ended story yet untold. Manuel may have removed it to another hiding-place, or others, perhaps, had found and appropriated it. But the old careless spirit which had often before comforted him under adverse circumstances again asserted itself, and forbade him meeting trouble half-way.

He was still, however, unable to entirely dismiss his fears, for when he lay down under the stars—he could not bring himself to share the hut with its silent occupant—he dreamed he sought the treasure, but found in its place the bewitching and mocking face of Carlota, who continually eluded him as he pursued her, until old Manuel, in a suit of gold coin, laid on like fish scales, came and bore her further and further from him.

In the morning Juan dug a grave beneath the cypress trees and buried Manuel. Above the little mound of upturned earth he erected a rude wooden cross, and piled stones about its base to secure it. This last service done, he invested himself with the authority of an administrator, assumed the rights of a sole legatee, and began at once to settle up the estate in a simple and satisfactory manner. From an arbour, which had been used as a sort of open-air store-room, he brought great bunches of fragrant Malaga grapes, melons cased with straw, and vegetables of various kinds, all of which he packed in the enormous pockets of the donkey's pannier, until the little brown burro was almost hidden from sight beneath the load. In his own pannier—the alforja, or peasant's bag, which he wore slung over his shoulder—he placed those articles so indispensable to the travelling Spaniard, even though his journey be but of an hour's duration—the garlic-pot and wine-skin. Thus equipped he abandoned the little farm, and set off down the mountain to the distant town of Toledo.

Where the donkey-path joined the main highway he came up with a farmer, who, in his great hooded, two-wheeled cart—which looked from a distance, as it went nodding along behind its tandem team of burros, like a monstrous old woman's bonnet—was also bound for the market, and they travelled in company the remainder of the journey. Together they crossed the long bridge leading into the city, and jointly argued with the burly revenue official at the towered gate—a dog of a man, who tumbled out every cabbage and carrot in his search for smuggled goods in spite of their pious and tearful protestations of innocence.

At the market place Juan laid his long woollen cloak upon the ground, rolling a rim, and upon this huge plate exposed his fruits and vegetables for sale. Late in the afternoon the red flannel lining of the cloak was cleared, and upon its owner's back again, while the equivalent of its former load jingled musically in his pocket. He was now ready for his journey in search of the hidden treasure.

